Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I am uncertain whether Senator Ferguson's remarks apply to Senator Drake or Senator Dawson. I am satisfied they do not apply to me. I should like Senator Playford, after having heard the observations made by Senator Ferguson, to ask himself whether what I said last evening is not proved—that some of the drastic provisions in these standing orders to be considered later may have been prepared for our special benefit. Here an honorable senator says that the men who obstructed in Queensland are now out of the State Parliament, and we have them here. Senator Fraser has endeavoured to prove to the Senate that the majority who did an unkind thing in Queensland have been before the electors on two occasions, and that their action has been indorsed. If there is any weight in that argument there should be some weight in the argument which we use. I was not in the Queensland House at the time the eight members were suspended—I probably would have been suspended also if I had been present—but I can say that the men who voted against the gag and the closure in Queensland were returned at the top of the poll for the Senate, and the members of the party who applied the gag were left at the bottom. This discussion has been somewhat extended, because it has been necessary to bring under the notice of the Senate the practice prevailing in other Houses than the House of Assembly in South Australia. We shall commence to get tired of the continual mention of the South Australian House.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Does the honorable senator mean to say that we shall not behave ourselves as well here as members do in the House of Assembly in South Australia?

Senator HIGGS.—I consider such a question superfluous. The honorable senator has never seen anything in my conduct—and I say it with all modesty—that should bring me into trouble with any deliberative body. The standing order here proposed is in force in no other Parliament in the world. Senator Ferguson is mistaken in supposing that they have a standing order of this kind in the Queensland Parliament.

Senator FERGUSON.—I said a similar one.

Senator HIGGS.—There may be there a standing order limiting discussion. Notice may be given there of a motion that a Bill must be through by ten o'clock on a certain night, and if that is carried, though several hours may be spent in discussing the first clause, when ten o'clock is reached all the clauses of the Bill must go through without debate. I am satisfied that there are some members of the Senate who think that drastic standing orders are required.

Senator WALKER.—Was not the honorable senator a member of the Standing Orders Committee?

Senator HIGGS.—I was; but I was a "pelican crying in the wilderness." I remind honorable senators that in these standing orders there is ample provision made for dealing with honorable senators who are disposed to obstruct. I refer to Standing Order 410, under which it is provided that no senator shall digress from the subject under discussion, and to Standing Order 412, under which the President or Chairman of Committees may call the attention of the Senate or of the Committee, as the case may be, to continued irrelevance or tedious repetition on the part of any honorable senator, and may direct that such senator shall discontinue his speech. I can see what some honorable senators are driving at. They desire to have a standing order of this kind to deal with honorable senators when they try to obstruct, but the standing orders to which I have referred will meet such a case most fully.

Senator FRASER.—That would be very ungenerous.

Senator HIGGS.—I consider that it would be a mild proceeding compared with closing the mouths of every other honorable senator because one had been guilty of tedious repetition or irrelevancy. While I do not agree with the methods provided for dealing with cases of disorder, I contend that Standing Order 428 gives ample power to punish the offender, and the offender alone. It has been stated that the standing order under discussion has not been abused during the term of the Federal Parliament; but that is the contention of men who, like the Postmaster-General, are suffering from a spirit of revenge, and have sworn a kind of political vendetta, and cannot see things in their proper light. Senator Baker has a knowledge of constitutional history, and of the struggle there has been for freedom of speech, and he tells us deliberately that the two occasions on which this standing order was used last session are danger points which show us what is to be avoided in the future. Senator De Largie and Senator Stewart, when they submitted a motion under the standing order last session, however wrong they may have been—though I do not admit for a moment that they were wrong—took the responsibility for their utterances, and if the electors of Queensland or Western Australia like to take exception to their conduct, they can do so at the proper time. This is not a domestic Legislature like that of Victoria or Queensland, where each member is known to the people of those constituencies. This is a Senate composed of representatives of States which may be absolutely opposed to each other. What love is there between Victoria and New South Wales? What love is there between the leading morning newspapers of Melbourne and the leading morning newspapers of Sydney, which so largely guide public opinion? Members of a State Legislature know that their actions will be criticised by the whole people of the particular State. In this Senate, however, representatives of New South Wales care very little for the public opinion of Queensland; and I, and others who come from Queensland, freely criticise the two great newspapers, the Age and the Argus, for the reason, I suppose, that we do not care for the opinions expressed by those organs. Representatives of a State are liable to come into this Chamber and commit an injustice under such a standing order, whereas in a State Legislature the fact that the people are watching closely tends to prevent any such attempt. There is no standing order of the kind in force in the House of Representatives, and its presence amongst our rules I regard as a reflection on the Senate.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—Many senators on the public platform speak admiringly of freedom of speech, but from the tone of some of their remarks this afternoon, they are not very ardent admirers of the doctrine. Senator Fraser has made use of an argument which I cannot allow to go unchallenged. That honorable senator stated that the Queensland Government, which applied the closure under circumstances already described, have since been returned again and again by the people:

Senator FRASER.—It was the people who turned the members out of the House on that occasion.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I dispute that assertion, because the people never got an opportunity, owing to the questionable electoral laws, of expressing their opinion at the ballot-box until the Federal elections. The fact that in Queensland only one supporter of the State Government was elected amongst the six senators is one of the best refutations of the statement that that Government was supported by the people. It must be borne in mind that this is a very small Chamber, and the likelihood of any very heated discussions or turmoil is remote. For my own part, I think that a little warmth imparted into our debates would prevent our degenerating into what Mr. King O'Malley would call a "dead house," and do us all a lot of good. My contention is that until necessity arises, no standing order of this kind should be passed, because it is a reflection on honorable senators, and on the character of the Senate. We can all understand the anxiety to catch the Speaker's eye in the limited time given to discussion in the House of Commons where there are nearly 700 members, but it was not until a few years ago that a standing order of the kind was introduced there; and comparing the two Houses, I have no anticipation of any necessity for a similar rule here. I am sure every one regrets that any action was ever taken under this standing order in this Senate during last session, and I dare say that those who voted for the closure then felt ashamed. But when the standing order had been used against the representatives of the labour party we did not see why we should be scrupulous about using the same weapon. We resented the use of the standing order, and at the first opportunity gave the other side an experience of its operation. A similar set of circumstances may arise at any time, and it would be better to have no such standing order, but to allow the fullest possible freedom of debate.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—Perhaps the strongest argument in favour of the amendment was that used by Senator Baker, who, in effect, said that the two occasions on which the standing order was used last session point out the dangers which are to be avoided in the future. At all events, Senator Baker left the impression that he would not like to see similar instances of the use of the standing order in the future. Personally, I care very little whether we fix a bare majority or a majority of two-thirds, because I have sufficient confidence in the good sense of senators to believe that the standing order will not be put into operation too frequently. It is my belief that those who voted for the application of this standing order last year regretted it afterwards; but here I would call attention to the fact that had a two-thirds majority been then provided for, the danger which Senator Baker says ought to be avoided would not have arisen, because there would not have been the required majority to vote in favour of the closure. Still, we cannot forget that this Senate is composed of 36 members, with an attendance ranging from 20 to 28; and if any senator made himself obnoxious by flagrant obstruction, a majority of two-thirds would be found to apply the closure. I shall support the amendment, because I believe we shall always be able to find the required majority when a case of real obstruction arises. The amendment is a reasonable one, and will bring this standing order into conformity with other standing orders.

Senator McGREGOR (South Australia).

—I dare say there are some senators who consider that the action of those who support this amendment is objectionable. I, with others who come from South Australia, have worked under a similar rule. I confess that it was not applied except in very few cases. For many years the Parliament was a very happy family, with very few serious difficulties to contend with, and, consequently, the rule, although it is an objectionable one anywhere, might not have been very disastrous to public debate. In the Senate, however, there are conflicting interests to be represented—interests which affect different States. A time may come when a senator may speak at considerable length, and with great earnestness, in his endeavour to advance the interests of his State. The discussion may be wearisome to certain senators, who are opposed to the interests of that State, and may wish to take a vote. Although some representatives of that State, and some representatives of other States may be waiting for an opportunity to submit new points, yet a tired senator is enabled by this standing order to rise and move "That the Senate do now divide." If the motion is carried, it closes the mouths of those senators who were prepared to submit fresh considerations. I think it would meet the views of all those who wish to have a standing order of this kind, if we said that the closure shall not be applied except by the vote of a majority of two-thirds of the senators present. It is not nearly so difficult to get a two-thirds majority here as it is to get an absolute majority. How could we get an absolute majority this afternoon? How are we to get an absolute majority at any time, seeing that a large number of senators never come in at all—or, if they do, stay for only five minutes? I have seen benches empty for hours. I am prepared to adopt the standing order with that modification, which I submit ought to be conceded in the interests of those senators who have suffered from the use of a similar rule in other places. The representatives of South Australia are getting their way in having a portion of their rule adopted, while the representatives of other States are getting their way in the rule not being made so drastic as the one which has operated against them in the past. I hope that the amendment will be carried.

Amendment negatived.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia)—I move—

That, after the word “divide,” line 1, the following words be inserted—“which motion shall not be carried unless by a majority of four.”

In the recent discussion it was doubted by certain honorable senators whether it was right to require the vote of a two-thirds majority; whether in certain circumstances it might not lead to a waste of time in discussing a motion. The amendment I now propose is a compromise which, I think, every one should be willing to accept. It will not be creditable to us if we say that it is necessary, in order to control business, to have as drastic a rule in relation to debate as is in force in any Parliament in the world. It is just as drastic a rule for curbing free discussion as is to be found in the code of any Parliament where there are racial feuds and religious differences. Let me give one illustration of its drastic nature. Supposing that at the next election, and this a very improbable eventuality, the people of Queensland should give a mandate to their three representatives to re-open the question of the kanaka traffic, to demand that kanakas shall be allowed to remain in the State, and to be imported. A majority of the senators are opposed to the introduction of any more kanakas into Queensland. Would it be right directly the first speech had been delivered for the majority to decide that the question be now put, and thus stifle the expression of the views of the Queensland people on an important subject? It has always been assumed that it will be the discussion of a motion by a member of the labour party which will have to be stifled. But the rule may operate quite the other way. If, as the result of the next election Queensland should send down three representatives in favour of the views which Senator Fraser holds, he may see the very rule for which he has voted being used to stifle discussion on such an important question as the employment of kanakas, and he may find himself absolutely debarred from expressing his own opinions. This rule is not in force in the Parliament of any State except South Australia. It does not follow that because it has worked well in that State it will work well in the Senate. There will be greater divergences of opinion on subjects in the Senate than in a State Parliament. Seeing that the rule is not in force in the House of Representatives, is it necessary to retain such a drastic rule in our standing orders? I hope that honorable senators will see their way to vote for my amendment, which, I repeat, is a very fair compromise.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General). — I cannot accept this amendment. Throughout the whole of the discussion no one has expressed an opinion in favour of a proposal of the kind. A majority of four would work very inequitably. In a full House, when an opportunity might be sought of using improperly the standing order, a majority of four might represent a number that would hardly be a check; whereas, when the numbers present were few, four would represent a considerable number. However, the matter has been fully discussed.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland). — Senator Smith's amendment is so reasonable that it is difficult to understand why the Postmaster-General does not accept it. What does it mean? In a Senate of 24, 14 senators could carry the motion against 10; in a Senate of 20, 12 could carry it against 8; and in a Senate of 16, 10 could carry it against 6. If it is necessary to have a standing order of this kind, and honorable senators are satisfied that no case of injustice is likely to occur, why are they afraid of the amendment? If honorable senators will not take notice of arguments coming from this corner, surely they will give way to the remarks of Senator Baker and of Senator McGregor. Senator McGregor tells us that his experience was that there were some exceptional cases in the South Australian Parliament when the standing order was used unjustly. Senator Baker stated that the standing order "was hardly ever abused" in South Australia. We have two witnesses telling us that there were instances of its abuse. We have also the striking observation of Senator Baker that the two instances in the Senate when the closure motion was carried, were "danger points" showing what ought to be avoided in the future. I hope that honorable senators will pay attention to that view. I do not like to make myself objectionable by rising so repeatedly, and I plead in excuse that I view the proposal as it stands as one that is likely to be used in a very unjust manner. The orderly conduct of our debates is sufficiently provided for by a dozen or more standing orders that we have adopted. We can imagine a case affecting senators from Queensland. There was, as honorable senators know, prior to the establishment of Federation, a strong agitation in Central and Northern Queensland for separation from the South. If that State progresses as it is likely to do, before many years are passed we shall have there a very large population. The resources are so great that we may have at any time in Queensland a population approaching that of New South Wales or Victoria in numbers. I do not say that we shall have half-a-million in the north or in the centre, but we shall almost certainly have a sufficient number of people there to persuade the Commonwealth to grant them the rights and privileges of a new State—by which I mean representation in the Senate and House of Representatives. Possibly the representation here may only amount to three senators. What will the senators from Victoria or Western Australia—and there is a pretty liberal sort of representation from that State—care about the three senators from Central and Northern Queensland if they are modest and retiring members like those who already come from that great State? It is an unfortunate circumstance that there should be such opposition to this reasonable amendment. I thought that the good sense and justice of the Senate, which have been so much lauded, were keen enough to give way on the point, but I find that the "keen sense of justice," of which we have heard so much, is of a limited quantity this afternoon. I am sorry that some of those who voted in the last division have retired from the Chamber. I should have liked to make some remarks in their presence expressing my opinion of their conduct. I should have expressed it pretty clearly.

Senator DONSON. — Let us have the benefit of it.

Senator HIGGS. — I do not care to attack a man behind his back, but I should have liked to express my opinion about one of them—a senator who should come into this Chamber with bowed head and humble voice—coming amongst respectable men—men who have not been convicted of any crime—and voting in favour of the "gag." I am not going to allow that kind of thing to pass without the freest discussion. If honorable senators object to what I am saying, it is extremely bad taste on their part, particularly as they pay no attention to the highest constitutional authority in this Chamber.

Senator FRASER. — It may be very good judgment, though.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator is a good judge of many things—of station properties and so forth.

Senator FRASER.—A fairly good judge of men.

Senator HIGGS. — He was, I suppose, when he took an interest in the Victorian railway strike, and helped to bring it to a close. This is an important proposal that ought to be considered without heat. It is most astonishing to find a member of the Government supporting this standing order—especially a man whose past experience of the injustices which Senator Dawson has described, should have led him to take a different line. Where is the democracy of this Chamber and of the Government—a Government which professes to represent the democratic instincts of the people better than any other Government that has ever held office in Australia? I believe that as a whole the Government does so, and that the majority of its members will not be found supporting a proposal like this. Is this the way we are going to “build up a great nation,” to use the phrase which the Prime Minister has employed so frequently? Is it by stifling discussion, and by refusing to note what the President of the Senate has said, that the two instances in which this standing order was applied are “danger points” showing what ought to be avoided? I ask Senator Drake to forgive this corner, and those honorable senators who were responsible for ruffling his feathers, if I may so express myself. We plead guilty and apologize, and having apologized, we ask the honorable and learned senator to abandon his vendetta, and give way. It is possible that I shall have a few more remarks to make when I have heard what is to be said in reply to those I have just made.

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN TRANS-CONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. E. SOLOMON.—I wish to know if the Prime Minister has received an interim report respecting the Western Australian transcontinental railway, and, if so, whether it will be published?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I yesterday laid upon the table two interim reports from the engineers engaged upon the work.

TELEGRAPHIC DELAYS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON. — Is the Prime Minister in a position to make any definite statement as to the possibility of affording increased facilities for the transmission of telegraph messages between the Eastern States and Western Australia?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have conferred with the Postmaster-General and with the general manager of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company on the subject, and I think that an arrangement will be come to, whereby, by paying something more for the transmission of their telegrams by the cable instead of by the land line, the business people affected will be able to secure the facilities they require without prejudice to the revenue of any of the States concerned.

Mr. WATSON. — Is that a temporary arrangement only?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is a temporary arrangement.

Mr. KIRWAN.—What about the improvement of the line?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is a matter into which inquiry is being made, with a view to ascertaining whether the inconvenience which has arisen is due to the present position of the line, or to some other cause.

ACQUISITION OF DUTCH AND GERMAN NEW GUINEA.

Mr. KIRWAN (Kalgoorlie)—I move—

That, as the Commonwealth is undertaking the control of territory in New Guinea, with an exposed frontier of about 900 miles to German and Dutch territory, the Government should, in the opinion of this House, intimate to the Imperial authorities that it would be gratifying to the people of the Commonwealth if the Imperial Government availed themselves of any opportunity that might arise to secure, by exchange of territory or other peaceful means, Dutch and German New Guinea, or either, so as to lessen the danger to the peace of Australia through foreign powers controlling countries adjoining Commonwealth territory.

The object of this motion is to bring about the acquisition of the whole of New Guinea by Great Britain, and I think it is scarcely necessary for me to say much to commend it to the good sense of the House. Several honorable members who have spoken to me about it have expressed their approval of it, and I am sure that there are very few who will not at any rate favour the end which I have in view. No doubt some honorable members were not agreed as to the advisableness of the action which was taken by this Parliament in deciding to accept the control of British New Guinea, but now that that control has been undertaken by the Commonwealth, anything which can be done to further by peaceable means the vesting of the control of the whole island under one authority should, in my opinion, be undertaken. The position of affairs must be fairly well known to honorable members. New Guinea is at present controlled by three powers—Holland, Germany, and Britain. The territory under the control of the Netherlands Government forms the largest portion of the island, and embraces over 150,000 square miles, while Germany controls something like 70,000 square miles on the mainland, and about 20,000 square miles in the Bismarck Archipelago, which is virtually part of New Guinea. The British territory in New Guinea embraces about 90,000 square miles. The native population of the island is very considerable, but variously estimated, because it is almost impossible to arrive at a correct estimate of it. It is believed, however, that there are something like 350,000 natives in British New Guinea, about 115,000 in the German possessions on the mainland, and 200,000 in the Bismarck Archipelago, and about 200,000 in Dutch New Guinea. The white population in British New Guinea is about 500. The difficulties which the Commonwealth will have to face in administering our portion of New Guinea are, under the present circumstances, very considerable. The native tribes vary greatly in their manners and customs, and it is difficult for civilized races to properly understand their ideas, superstitions, and habits. But if the whole island were under one control, those difficulties would be no greater, because the problems which have to be dealt with in British New Guinea are much the same as those which have to be dealt with in the German and Dutch possessions.

Mr. Kirwan.

Undoubtedly, however, one administration would be beneficial to both the native and the white populations, and, in the interests of internal administration and good government, it is desirable that the island should be under the control of one power. Although we in this Parliament are all representatives of the British race, I think it may be said without egotism, that the control which would be productive of the best results, is that of the British, exercised through the Commonwealth. We know that Great Britain has been the most successful colonizing nation in the world. No other nation has spread itself over the globe as ours has, in India, in Africa, in Canada, in the United States, in South America, and in other places. It would, of course, be idle to deny that mistakes have been committed, and acts done by our people of which we have no reason to be proud, but taking everything into consideration, the British rule has been more successful, and more productive of good for humanity than that of any other nation which has attempted to colonize. Even in New Guinea to-day the benefits of British rule are observable when our operations there are compared with those of the Germans and the Dutch. We know that the administration of British New Guinea has been virtually starved for the want of sufficient revenue. Yet the results obtained there are undoubtedly more satisfactory than those which have been obtained in either German or Dutch New Guinea. A recent visitor, writing of his experiences there, says—

At Meruke, the Government station for the southern division of Dutch New Guinea, £78,000 was spent there alone in eight months. In German New Guinea the cost of government is greater than in the British portion, and yet neither can show anything like the same amount of good solid work.

Therefore, in the interests of the internal administration, of the natives, of the European population, and of the development of the island generally, it is advisable that the whole of New Guinea should be under the control of one power and that that power should be Great Britain. Beyond these considerations there is a far more important reason why the Commonwealth should endeavour to obtain control of the whole of New Guinea. We shall have a territory in that island with a frontier of 900 miles to the possessions of two foreign powers, Germany and Holland.

Mr. EWING.—Is not that frontier practically inaccessible?

Mr. KIRWAN.—A great portion of it is, but some parts of it on both the Dutch and German border lines are accessible to the residents on each side. If relations became strained between the powers controlling the island, international complications might be very easily brought about. There is always a risk of tribal raids from one territory to another, which might cause trouble of even alarming proportions. Besides that, there is the possibility of a valuable gold-field being discovered at any time. There is no doubt that valuable auriferous deposits exist in the island, and if a gold-field were discovered close to the border line, between British territory and that owned by Germany or Holland, it is easy to imagine that we might be dragged into a very serious quarrel. In connexion with the Klondyke gold-field some trouble occurred between Canada and the United States owing to the difficulty of delimiting the territories under the control of the respective Governments, and that trouble was increased by reason of the high value given to the land in the locality by the discovery of gold. There is at present in New Guinea one gold-field situated at Gira, very close to the border of German New Guinea, and others may be discovered in the near future. There are also difficulties attendant upon the navigation of some of the rivers. For instance, the Fly River flows partly between the Dutch and British territory, and the navigation of that stream is free to the subjects of Holland and Britain alike, except as regards warlike stores, and no duty is imposed upon goods conveyed into the island by that route. Here we have another possible source of complications in the future.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—That is certain to lead to trouble.

Mr. KIRWAN.—In addition to the matters mentioned, we have to consider that there is always a danger of Great Britain being engaged in war with one or other of the powers interested in New Guinea, and of our being called upon to defend that portion of our boundary line which would be open to attack. The proposal contained in the resolution I have brought forward is that the Commonwealth should approach the Imperial authorities with the suggestion that by an exchange of territory or other peaceful means, Great Britain should endeavour to acquire control over the whole island. It is not for this Parliament to suggest to Great Britain what territory should be given in exchange for the Dutch or German possessions in New Guinea, but any honorable member who has given the matter consideration must know that there is in Africa a large tract of land adjoining German territory which might form the subject of exchange, with great advantage, not merely to Great Britain, but to Germany. In the desire for expansion which seems so general amongst the nations of the world, a preference is naturally shown to proceed upon the lines of the consolidation of territory rather than the possession of dominions scattered all over the globe. For instance, Russia has been endeavouring to gradually consolidate her territory by extending her annexations towards China, and in the direction of Turkey and Persia. Other Powers also recognise that the consolidation of their territory must tend to lessen the chance of friction between the nations, and thereby make for the continuance of peace. The strongest reasons that can be advanced to justify the action of the Commonwealth in approaching the Imperial authorities in this matter are contained in the history of New Guinea itself. The British Government have consistently ignored the advice offered by Australian statesmen; otherwise we should not have been called upon to consider such a proposal as that now before the House. They have been urged over and over again to assume control of the whole island. As far back as 1874, the late Sir Henry Parkes, who was then Colonial Secretary of New South Wales, through the Governor of that State, made what seemed to be almost an appeal to the Imperial authorities to undertake the control and colonization of New Guinea. The appeal was sent to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, but was ignored, and, so far as Great Britain is concerned, nothing was heard of New Guinea for many years. In 1883, however, a very important step was taken by Sir Thomas McIlwraith, at that time Premier of Queensland. He undertook to annex New Guinea for reasons very clearly set forth. The first of these was—

That its possession would be of value to the Empire, and conduce especially to the peace and safety of Australia, the development of Australian trade, and the punishment of crime throughout the Pacific.

The second reason was—

That the establishment of a foreign power in the neighbourhood of Australia would be injurious to British and more particularly to Australian interests.

Sir Thomas McIlwraith instructed Mr. Chester, who was then resident magistrate at Thursday Island, to proceed to New Guinea, and take possession of the whole of the territory not then under the control of the Netherlands Government. Mr. Chester carried out his instructions by hoisting the British flag, and formally proclaiming British control over the whole of that portion of New Guinea now held by Great Britain and Germany. The circumstances were duly reported to the Imperial Government, with a request by the Queensland Government for approval of the action taken by them. In this, Queensland was supported by the other Australian Governments, exception being taken only to the proposal that New Guinea should be annexed to Queensland, the other Australian Governments considering that it should be taken over and administered by Great Britain. The Council of the Royal Colonial Institute also appealed to the Imperial authorities to indorse the action of Sir Thomas McIlwraith, but the British Government seemed strongly averse to doing anything of the kind, and after the negotiations had proceeded for some time they sent a despatch to the Queensland Government to the effect that Sir Thomas McIlwraith's action was unwarranted, and could not receive Imperial sanction. That action on the part of the British authorities, I think it will be generally admitted, was a great blunder. They utterly failed to foresee the value of acquiring as much of New Guinea as they possibly could. In the following year, 1884, they made a rather feeble attempt to retrieve their error by despatching some war ships to the southern coast of New Guinea, and formally proclaiming a protectorate over that portion of the island, thus leaving quite unprotected the territory which was subsequently acquired by another power. A month later, Germany despatched some vessels to the northern coast of New Guinea, hoisted the national flag, and took possession of that part of it which now comes within the sphere of German influence. In 1887, a colonial conference was held in London, at which the question of the control of New Guinea was considered. The Australian people, through their representatives, evinced dissatisfaction with the position occupied by Great Britain in that island. They endeavoured to induce the Imperial authorities to take possession of that portion of New Guinea which was then a British protectorate, and the representative of Queensland guaranteed the payment of £15,000 annually towards the expenses of its administration. But although that amount was guaranteed by Queensland, New South Wales and Victoria each pledged themselves to contribute £5,000 annually towards its payment, so that the expense of administering the affairs of British New Guinea was equally shared by Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria. Subsequent to the arrangement which was made between the Australian authorities and the British Government, the latter formally annexed what is now known as British New Guinea. In taking possession of the portion of the island which is at present occupied by Germany, that nation undoubtedly acted in contravention of an agreement which at the time existed between itself and Great Britain. That understanding was to the effect that neither nation should take any step involving annexation of the still unoccupied portions of New Guinea without first opening up diplomatic negotiations on the question, but notwithstanding this agreement the Germans acted secretly. Strange as it may seem, no successful protest was made on behalf of the British authorities, but two years later the Imperial Government recognised the action of Germany by arranging that the boundaries between British and German New Guinea should be defined. In all that has been done in connexion with British New Guinea, the Imperial authorities have acted in defiance of the wishes of Australia. In the first place, when the late Sir Henry Parkes desired that the island should be colonized by Great Britain, his advice was ignored. Later on, when Sir Thomas McIlwraith recommended that New Guinea or such portion of it as had been annexed by Queensland should belong to Britain, the Imperial authorities, in defiance of the wishes of the Australian Governments, repudiated the action of the Queensland authorities. A year later the British Government proclaimed a protectorate over the southern portion of the island instead of the whole of it which was not then under the control of a foreign power.

Mr. EWING.—The Germans did not touch New Guinea till Great Britain had proclaimed a protectorate over the southern portion of it.

Mr. KIRWAN.—The Germans proclaimed a protectorate over the northern portion of the island a month after similar action had been taken by Great Britain in regard to the southern portion.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—When was the understanding made between Germany and Great Britain to which the honorable member has referred?

Mr. KIRWAN.—I do not know the date, but it is generally admitted by those who are in a position to offer an opinion upon the matter that the action of Germany was in defiance of an express understanding with Great Britain. Under these circumstances, I think that if such a resolution as I have submitted were adopted by this Parliament, it might receive more attention at the hands of the Imperial authorities than have previous representations from Australia concerning the annexation of New Guinea. Possibly it may be urged that the motion goes too far in suggesting an exchange of territory. But if we cannot obtain the object of the resolution—in other words, if we cannot secure either an exchange of territory or the control of the whole of New Guinea—we ought to endeavour to obtain the next best thing, namely, a preemption over German and Dutch New Guinea, or either. That is to say, if either Germany or Holland desires to part with the territory at present occupied by them in New Guinea, the British Government should receive the first offer of acquiring it. That is a common arrangement between nations, and possibly some agreement of the kind might be arrived at.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—I do not intend, like the honorable member who has just resumed his seat, to traverse the ground of what may have been past mistakes with reference to the acquisition of territory in the Pacific. Many of us, no doubt, entertain decided opinions that not only in the case of New Guinea, but in that of other portions of the Pacific, timely action in the past might have secured for the Empire territories which are valuable to-day either in a commercial sense or in the sense of being strategic positions by the possession of which its defence against aggression might be facilitated. But I have to appeal to my honorable friend opposite not to press this motion for reasons which I will give, although I must confess that I am hampered in giving them. In this connexion I desire to say that in confidential correspondence which cannot—at any rate for the present—be laid before Parliament, the Government, since its assumption of office, have been untiring in urging the interests of the Commonwealth in the Pacific. It would please me very much if I were able, beyond giving my mere assurance, to lay before honorable members the evidences of that fact, because it would put an end to many complaints, which the confidential nature of that correspondence forbids me to answer. At the same time, the honorable member may rely that the Commonwealth Government are not asleep in regard to this important matter. I share the opinion that in 1883, when Mr. Chester made, perhaps, an irregular and technically informal annexation of New Guinea on behalf of the Queensland Government, it might have been well if the Government of the United Kingdom of that day had recognised the aspirations cherished by that State, which, as there is plenty of evidence to show, were shared in common by the rest of Australia. At the Conference which was held upon the subject of the control of British New Guinea at the beginning of 1883, and at which, it will be remembered, resolutions were adopted which led to the formal constitution of the Federal Council of Australia—as honorable members who choose to look up its proceedings and to read the papers placed before it will see—the position was clearly put before the British Government of the day. To that extent I am wholly with the honorable member, and the evidence which is available demonstrates that fact. But, speaking with all respect, it is true that the Minister, who was then at the head of the Colonial office, did not fully appreciate the importance of the acquisition of the territory which was suggested. Had he done so an annexation or a protectorate having due international force would then have taken place, and the question now under discussion would never have arisen. Unhappily that was not to be. But the honorable member may rely that any objection which I have to this motion being proceeded with does not arise from want of sympathy with him, but from reasons connected with what I have already put before the House, and which I think will be sufficiently apparent to obviate any necessity on my part to make a fuller explanation. Of course we must recognise one great fact, that in urging the Imperial Government to acquire further territory in the Pacific, we are to a certain extent accepting a heavy responsibility for ourselves. The result of annexation in the case of British New Guinea has been already to lay upon us a burden of £20,000 a year. That, however, is only £5,000 per annum more than the sum which the three States originally concerned were paying prior to Federation. Should other annexations occur, they will probably not be made except upon the terms that, whatever burden may be undertaken by the Empire in respect of acquiring any territory that it might be possible within reason to acquire, the Commonwealth shall undertake the cost of administration. If the British Government, for instance, went so far as to saddle the Imperial funds with the acquisition of any greater portion of New Guinea than is already possessed by the Empire, the responsibility, and the responsibility for all time, of managing and paying for the management of the land so acquired would no doubt fall upon the Commonwealth, especially if such steps were taken at our instance. Therefore, I desire that honorable members who advocate these matters, as to which I, myself, am fairly keen, shall remember that when these acquisitions of territory are made we must look forward to the undertaking of a serious monetary responsibility on the part of the Commonwealth, and that the monetary responsibility will represent new expenditure, no matter what portion of the Commonwealth may be contiguous to the territory so annexed, and most benefited by the acquisition of it. But this is by the way. I rose specially for the purpose of suggesting to the honorable member for Kalgoorlie that, the matter having been brought fully before the House, it is desirable, even in the interests of the view that he holds and the purpose he favours, that nothing should be put on record in regard to it as the deliberate determination of this Parliament. The position in respect of these affairs should be allowed to remain as at present, upon the assurance of the Government that so far from being neglected, they are being dealt with in the best interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KIRWAN (Kalgoorlie).—In deference to the suggestion made by the Prime Minister, I beg leave to withdraw my motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

COMMONWEALTH COINAGE.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).

—I move—

That the report of the Select Committee on Commonwealth Coinage brought up, and ordered by this House to be printed, on 4th April, 1902, be now adopted.

I think I may be excused for entertaining the belief that this subject is a very important one, and the hope that the House will approach its consideration with some determination to come to a conclusion upon it. To me it is a very practical matter. It is one in which I have taken a personal interest for some time, and I have the further excuse for the idea of its importance which I entertain, that the question of decimal coinage has been favorably considered for many years in the old country by business people of all shades of political opinion, by philosophers, and by publicists. Although the difficulties of making the desired change there have been so great, and the time of the Legislature has been so much occupied with other questions which demand its attention much more than do social and business reforms, it is generally acknowledged that there is a vast preponderance of opinion in the United Kingdom in favour of that change. The report to which we are inviting the attention of the House, proposes now to make a saving of some £35,000 per annum to the people of the Commonwealth, and, in doing so, to introduce a reform which, in itself, I believe will ultimately mean a saving of over £1,000,000 to the States and the people of this Federation. It will also be the means of facilitating the introduction of a still greater reform, which will yield even more beneficial results in the economical working of both the private and public affairs of the nation. I shall endeavour to prove that the adoption of the reform recommended by the Committee in regard to the money of the Commonwealth, would very much assist the acceptance of a similar reform in the mother country. The inquiry which was made by the order of this House was one of the most impartial with which I have ever had to do, or of which I have ever read. In the first place, the honorable members to whom it was intrusted held opinions which at the time were totally unknown to each other. The House had only recently assembled, and it was impossible to arrive at any conclusion as to the views held by honorable members on such an abstruse subject as decimal coinage. The Committee was brought together in an almost haphazard fashion. It included some who had taken great interest in the question, and others who, while interested in it, had admittedly failed to give the subject any consideration. Having gone into it, however, it was found that the subject was a very engrossing one. I believe I am perfectly correct in saying that the whole of the members of the Committee became interested in it, and interested in the very best possible way. They became imbued with the desire to arrive at the truth of the matter, and to decide it in the best interests of the Commonwealth. I regret that the overtures which I made at the outset of the inquiry to secure the Treasurer as a member of the Committee did not meet with success. It had not been the practice in Victoria for Ministers of the State to take part in these inquiries, and for that reason the right honorable gentleman did not consider that he should become a member of it. In other States, however, Ministers take part in inquiries of this kind, and I am quite sure that if we had had the assistance of the Treasurer it would have vastly helped us in bringing up our report, and assisted us probably in carrying this matter to a legislative conclusion. I was hopeful that there would have been some reference to this subject in His Excellency the Governor-General's speech. Although the matter had not been dealt with in any way by the Government or in this House, it was supposed that the keen outlook which the Treasurer has always maintained—both in State and Federal politics—for possible means of effecting savings would induce to regard this question in a practical way. I therefore thought it was extremely probable that we should have some intimation in the Governor-General's speech that the subject would be considered in some definite form by this House during the present session. We did not have the assistance of the right honorable gentleman in pursuing our inquiry, but I am perfectly sure that we shall receive from him that valuable help which his knowledge and position will enable him to give us in our endeavour to obtain from it some result which, if not in the full direction contemplated, will be attended, at all events, with profit to the community, and assist in introducing the decimal system. The evidence obtained by the Committee, and the report based upon it, were secured in the most impartial manner that the members could devise. So far as I know, not one case occurred in which evidence was invited from men who were known to take a strong view either on one side or the other. It is a peculiar circumstance that in every case in which evidence was invited we did not, in the first instance, know the view which would be expressed by the witness. In most cases requests to give evidence were sent to the holders of offices, and not to persons—to associations rather than to individuals. We endeavoured, as far as we could, to obtain the opinions of people who, by reason of their position, were qualified to speak of the opinion of the community. There were many difficulties in the way of obtaining the opinions of some of these representative bodies, by whom we desired to be guided. For instance, when we applied to the Chamber of Commerce in the capital of one of the large States to place their views before us, we were met by the fact that the Chamber was probably divided in its opinions, or had not had an opportunity of discussing the matter so as to come to a decision as to the views that should be advanced before the Committee. Consequently we experienced considerable difficulty in securing the attendance of representatives of these bodies, from whom I must confess the Legislature should look for some light and leading in this matter. We had replies, however, from many of these bodies, and on the whole, as I shall be able to prove, by an analysis of the evidence, they were decidedly in favour of the adoption of the decimal system of coinage for the Commonwealth. The question of the currency, we must admit, was practically a new subject in the politics of Australia when taken up by the Committee. Still it was not altogether new. We had some trouble in regard to currency in the early days of the colonies, but it was not of such a nature that its history would assist us. It was a subject which necessarily had slept here for many years, because our currency was provided for us by the Imperial Government, and was satisfactory within the limits of its system. The whole question had never been a matter for legislative consideration, or one to which politicians had devoted more than a passing thought. Consequently we met with a very great confusion of ideas respecting the subject of the inquiry. As soon as it was said that we should consider the question of a Commonwealth coinage, many people went to the absurd length of attributing to the proposal another desire on the part of Australians to "cut the painter." That is a most ridiculous way of looking at the matter, but no doubt such opinions did exist. There were some slow conservative minds who looked upon the fact that the Commonwealth was considering the question of establishing a coinage of its own as suggesting some means of setting up a free and independent existence. Further than that, we were met with applications from persons whom, with no desire to say anything derogatory of them, I must describe as "cranks." We had applications from silver men, bi-metallists, and men believing in some form or other of State banks or paper money. We had to carefully steer clear of some of these idiosyncrasies, or the Committee would have been deluged with them. If anything of the kind did obtrude itself, we endeavoured to keep it out as much as we could, and there is very little evidence of it in our report. If we analyze the evidence we shall find that there is a preponderating body of fact and opinion sustaining the report. I chiefly value the opinions of the foreign residents of the Commonwealth, and I desire to call attention to the views expressed by some of them. These gentlemen—mostly foreign Consuls living in our midst—are not only practically acquainted with the decimal systems of currency which prevail in their own countries, but as merchants here have an intimate knowledge of the British system, and they have unanimously expressed the opinion that the Commonwealth should adopt the decimal system as the best on economic grounds, and as a forward movement in every respect. I will briefly quote the views of some of them, to show the tendency of their opinions upon the subject. Mr. Orlando Baker, the Consul for the United States, who resides in Sydney, concluded his evidence by saying—

If the world be progressive, it seems to me that it is only a matter of time when all nations will adopt the decimal system for counting money; and if Australia would maintain her reputation as a leader in progress, I think she will throw off the pounds, shillings, and pence system, and adopt a currency based upon the decimal system.

Monsieur G. Biard D'Aunet, Consul-General for France, said—

The Government of the Commonwealth could make a trial in this direction, and if the experiment succeeds, which appears probable, it would open the way to the reform of the British monetary system, which is desired in the general interests of international commerce.

Monsieur W. L. Bosschart, Consul-General for the Netherlands, replied to the question whether he thought the decimalization of money should precede the decimalization of weights and measures—

Yes. The two changes would really mean only one change of system, the blessing and boon of which would soon be recognised. I most sincerely recommend them for the good of Australia.

Mr. Stanford, Vice-Consul for the United States, residing in Melbourne, gave a description of the benefits of the decimal system. He said that the change is one which could be initiated at any moment without inconvenience, and would have no disturbing effect upon our trading relations with Great Britain. One gentleman, a merchant in the city, whose name I do not now recall, told the Committee that he was in Australia when the Austrian system of coinage, which was a heterogeneous one like our own, was changed to a decimal system. He said that there was a little friction at first, which lasted for a few months, but that after that time no one felt any great inconvenience, and before the end of the year every one was glad that the change had been made, and would not hear of returning to the old order of things. Similar evidence was given with regard to the introduction of the change in Italy. American witnesses when asked if there was any idea in America of improving the system, or of going back to some other, said that it was the natural and best system, and could not be improved, so that there is not the slightest idea of adopting any other, or of altering the existing system in any respect. Three of the witnesses examined before the Committee had no views to offer on the subject, two of them being called to give evidence of a technical character. Eight were opposed to any change, three were in favour of a change, but thought that the Commonwealth should await the action of England, and thirty-one were in favour of the adoption of a decimal system. Of those thirty-one, seven favoured the adoption of any decimal system whatever, because they thought any decimal system better than the present. But the general opinion was that if we adopted the decimal system we ought to retain the sovereign as our standard. Thirteen witnesses held that view, while five advocated the adoption of the 10s. unit, and four others the adoption as the unit of a coin worth 4s. 2d.—the American dollar unit. Therefore the weight of evidence was in favour, not only of the adoption of the decimal system, but of the adoption of the decimal system which the Committee recommended. When the Committee had finished taking evidence there was considerable difference of opinion amongst its members as to what system should be recommended. The evidence was very carefully weighed, and a great deal of discussion, both formal and informal, took place before a decision was arrived at. Some of the witnesses, several of them trained men, reported very strongly in favour of a ten-shilling unit, with the retention of the sovereign as a coin of the value of two such units. Calculations could then be made in sums of ten shillings, and the unit would be divided into ten shillings, and each shilling into ten pennies. The shilling would therefore be retained at its present value and under its present nomenclature, but there would be a far greater disturbance in the bronze coinage than the Committee would like to see made. A great deal is to be said in favour of the adoption of the American dollar unit. There is on the other side of the world a very large nation, whose people are destined to become even still more numerous and powerful, and they have adopted the dollar worth 4s. 2d. as their unit. This coin must necessarily dominate more or less the American trade, while our trade with America, as the two peoples speak the same language, and have much in common, and for other reasons, must necessarily increase year by year.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—They have the dollar in Canada also.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Canada has been forced by its nearness to the United States to accept the coinage of that country, so that money coined in the United States passes current in Canada. The Committee had seriously to consider whether these facts would not justify the recommendation of the American dollar as the unit for our coinage. The adoption of that unit would make no disturbance in the value of our half-penny coinage, and it is very desirable to make no change, inasmuch as stamps, tram-fares, and many small articles are largely bought for small copper coins. When we looked further into the matter, however, we found that, in view of the position of the British sovereign, the wide-world respect which it has won, its great history and traditions, there would inevitably be a strong resistance to its abolition here, and that the adoption of any other unit would greatly diminish the chance of getting a decimal system adopted in Great Britain. The Committee, therefore—rightly, I think—finally decided to recommend the sovereign as the unit, and to decimalize it down to its one-thousandth part. That would give the most workable money system the world has yet devised. Under that system, a florin would be the coin of account. I noticed in the minds of some of the members of the Committee that there was a disposition not to recognise the florin as the coin of account for fear of the popular prejudice against the adoption of a silver basis. But it will be seen that the basis recommended is not a silver, but a gold basis. In my opinion, it is inevitable that the florin—the tenth part of the pound—will become the coin of account. The honorable member for North Sydney has pointed out that the American dollar, which is the unit of the United States coinage, is hardly ever seen in that country, and that the half-dollar, because of its size and convenience, is the coin which is most carried. There are very good reasons for adopting as the coin of account the coin which is in general use in everyday transactions.

Mr. WATSON.—If the florin were chosen as the coin of account, very large figure columns would be required for account books.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Not such large figure columns as are required where the franc is the coin of account. A millionaire in France who counted his wealth by francs would be a mere nobody in Australia. The Committee, in recommending the adoption of the florin as the coin of account, took the happy mean between the American and the French systems. Another reason for the adoption of the florin is that it is the coin in general recognition in the Pacific, where we hope to see the influence of the Commonwealth become dominant. It is the dollar of the Pacific. Our two-shilling piece is exported in large quantities to the islands, where it is used as the money of account, and also for the purposes of currency. Altogether, it will be seen that the florin, which was introduced, as honorable members are aware, as the first step in the decimalization of the English system, is probably the most convenient coin in the world, both as a unit of currency and as a unit of money account. A further argument in favour of the decimalization of the sovereign is to be found in the fact that quite recently the Peruvian Government adopted the British sovereign as the basis of their new coinage. In the last report of the Deputy-Master of the Mint, which we had not received prior to the drafting of the report now before honorable members, the following statement occurs:—

A law was passed on the 13th December, 1901, for the establishment of a gold standard, the unit to be the Peruvian gold pound, a coin 22 millimeters in diameter, weighing 7·988 grammes and eleven-twelfths fine, identical with the English sovereign. Silver and copper coins issued under the law of 14th February, 1863, and article 7 of the law of 30th December, 1872, are to be fractional parts of the pound at the rate of 10 sols to the pound. Gold is to be unlimited tender, silver being restricted to 100 sols and copper to 10 cents.

Further than that, I see that a similar coinage has been adopted in Ecuador. The point I wish to impress upon honorable members, is that if these countries, existing within what may be called the trade dominions of the United States, prefer to adopt the English sovereign and decimalize it, there must be some virtue in the system in favour of which the Committee have reported. I see that virtue displayed in three ways. First of all, we have the world-wide integrity of the British sovereign, and the world-wide knowledge and appreciation of it. It has been said that people far away in the East, in China and India, and in Egypt, put away sovereigns or hide them in the earth for years; and whatever may happen to disturb the values of currencies, the British sovereign is always worth its weight in gold. In the second place, the tenth part of the British sovereign is the most convenient, as the largest silver coin of account or currency, and when it is further decimalized by tenths and hundredths it furnishes coins which will answer all reasonable requirements. The lowest coin is something less in value than the farthing. Although we do not use farthings very much—and I hope we shall never have occasion to do so—they are found to be of great value in the economics of the poor in the old country. Ecuador and Peru have shown themselves to be appreciative of the value of the sovereign by adopting it as the gold standard of their currency.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—They do most of their trade with Great Britain and Europe.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—But the United States does a great trade with them, and as there is Monroism in trade as well as in politics they must look forward to doing a large trade with the United States. If, in the face of this fact, they favour the adoption of a different coinage, there must be some inherent advantage in the system adopted over that of the United States. There is a large profit to be derived from the legitimate issue of silver tokens of currency—I am not considering in this connexion what might be done by an unscrupulous Government. To obtain the profit that is to be legitimately made, we must coin money strongly differentiated from that of Great Britain, because it must be made so distinct from the coinage of Great Britain that it will not go back to the old country to be redeemed. We must take the responsibility of renewing the currency as it wears down, and also stand behind it if the circumstances of the world at any time demand that we should redeem it. Therefore if we want to get the profit, and it is just and reasonable that we should, we must distinguish our coins from those issued by the Imperial Government. This brings me to the question of the system which we should adopt. I think that it is generally conceded that the decimal system is the most natural and the best in the world, and there can be no better time than the present for adopting this system in the Commonwealth. The time for adopting a new coinage is at the beginning of our national career, and the decimal system is undoubtedly the best. If we start our coinage upon the same basis as that of England, we shall have very little opportunity of adopting anything else, unless Great Britain initiates the change. We could adopt the proposed new system without any fear of trade friction with Great Britain, and we might very well take the step contemplated in consideration of the profit likely to be derived, and in view of the advantages to be conferred upon the nation. The reference to the Select Committee was extended, at the instance of the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, to include gold within the scope of the inquiry. Personally I did not intend to include gold, because, as the inquiry has since proved, there was no necessity for us to enter into the existing relations with regard to the gold coinage. However, the Committee went into the question, and, as I have previously stated, decided to report in favour of the retention of the sovereign and of maintaining the existing relations between Australia and the Royal Mint in connexion with the branches of that establishment in our midst. Many other points with regard to gold cropped up. The branches of the Royal Mint in Australia are kept going by guarantees furnished by three of the States Governments; £15,000 is contributed by New South Wales, a like amount by Victoria, and £20,000 by Western Australia. This money is advanced by the State Treasurers to carry on the work of the Mint, and when the year's work is completed, the Mint authorities return any difference of receipts over expenditure to the States Government which has indemnified it. In Victoria, also in New South Wales, some slight profit is made, but in Western Australia there is a loss, and the net result is a loss to Australia. It is inevitable that under the Constitution the Commonwealth Government shall take the place of the States Governments in their relations with the Royal Mint. Then we have to consider the question whether the Mints could be so managed as to obviate loss to the Australian people. The loss incurred in the past has been something substantial, because it is only quite recently that any profit has been made. One of the points that seemed to demand some further inquiry was the large export of minted sovereigns to other parts of the world, notably to America, which, in some years, reaches £5,000,000. These sovereigns are exported to the United States, and on arrival are required by the law of that country to be put into the melting pot and reduced down to their original form of molten gold. This seems to be a piece of altogether unnecessary extravagance. In the coinage of sovereigns, every 100 ozs. of gold yields only 45 ozs. of coin, the other gold having to be re-melted and re-coined. This trouble might be well compensated for in the case of sovereigns which are to have their legal life of eighteen or nineteen years, but it seems absurd to go to all the present labour and expense in order to send sovereigns to foreign countries where they are immediately melted down. I believe that the Mint authorities have recommended a form of gold bar, weighing about 10 ozs., for export purposes. In every piece of gold out of which sovereigns are stamped, there is a large quantity of waste in the interspaces between the discs. The weighing of the sovereigns by an automatic machine further reduces the coin ultimately produced. The sovereigns are automatically discharged, those which are too heavy or too light being separated from those which are of the proper weight. The proportion of coins which have to be returned to the melting pot and the waste, make up the large percentage. Improvements in machinery are reducing this proportion, but results so far have not reached any better average than 45 ozs. of coin for every 100 ozs. of gold. If we wish to obtain the profits that are derivable from a silver token coinage in our midst, Great Britain will probably tell us that we shall have to make good the inevitable depreciation of our gold currency. We have it on the authority of bankers, and other gentlemen of experience, that the condition of our gold coinage is anything but satisfactory; that, in fact, as much as 50 per cent. of the gold currency is below the limit of tolerance. I do not say that we should begin by restoring the present gold coinage to its proper condition, but some system should be agreed upon between ourselves and the authorities of the Royal Mint, for restoring the coins now in circulation to the limit of tolerance, and we should afterwards be charged with the average loss of gold. A large number of these gold coins do not go into ordinary circulation, because I believe that in one case alone hundreds of thousands of them are put into a vault in one of the banks and kept there as a sort of guarantee fund in connexion with the balance operations of the banks. In 1889 the British Government found its gold coinage in much the same condition as that of Australia at the present time, and it was then estimated that it would cost £650,000 to restore it to a satisfactory condition. I think we shall find that quite a relative proportion of that sum will be required to bring our gold coinage up to the standard. From the details supplied by the Master of the Mint, it is apparent that, having once placed our gold coinage in a proper state, we can thereafter maintain it in a satisfactory condition for about £3,000 per annum. The Committee had also to consider whether it was desirable to establish one central Mint for the Commonwealth, in lieu of the three existing Mints, and whether we ought not to obtain our silver coins from Great Britain, at any rate at the beginning. The Committee finally decided in favour of obtaining the silver coinage from Great Britain, leaving the establishment of a central Mint open to further consideration hereafter. I think it is inevitable that the expense of maintaining the three Mints—none of which are working at their full capacity—must be considerably in excess of that required for the maintenance of one Mint capable of performing the whole of the work. I know it is said that these Mints—and particularly the one at Perth—are of great value to the gold producers.

Mr. FOWLER.—If one central Mint were established, the Western Australian gold would probably find its way to Great Britain. A great deal of it does now.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes, a great deal of it does now. But if sufficient gold were not supplied at the central Mint to enable it to undertake all the coinage which could profitably be undertaken, it would pay the Commonwealth better to purchase the requisite gold in Western Australia, and to incur the risk involved in transferring it to Melbourne or the Federal capital, or wherever the central Mint was established. In proof of that statement, I would invite the attention of honorable members to the cost involved in the production of the three Mints at present in existence relatively to the cost of the output of the Mint in Great Britain. I have no desire to touch upon details, but I wish to explain that in Great Britain the charges include many items which are not considered in the working expenses of the Australian Mints. For example, in the working expenditure upon our Mints, no charge is made for rent or interest upon the buildings occupied, the construction of which cost £60,000 or £70,000; whereas in Great Britain a sum of £12,000 is set down as a payment to the Board of Works for the use of the buildings and taxes—£10,000 evidently representing interest upon the construction of the buildings occupied by the Mint, and the balance whatever taxation those institutions have to pay. In 1900, I find that in round figures the cost of the Mint in Great Britain was £84,160, whereas the cost of the three similar institutions in Australia was £47,019—a difference of £37,141. In Australia, the Mints produced approximately 13,000,000 gold pieces, whilst in Great Britain they produced 10,000,000. But in this connexion it must be remembered that Great Britain also produced 41,000,000 silver pieces, 51,000,000 copper pieces, 25,000,000 colonial coins, and supervised the minting of 54,000,000 coins, which were struck at what is known as the "Royal Mint," Birmingham. Honorable members, therefore, will see that, relatively to its cost, the Mint in Great Britain performs much more work than do the three Mints in Australia. Of course, the fact must be considered that the whole coinage in Australia is in gold, which is the most expensive form of coinage that can be undertaken. But even allowing for that fact, the difference is very much greater than it ought to be. It is necessarily caused by the smaller quantity of work which is done by each of the three Australian institutions compared with that which would be accomplished if one Mint only were in existence. In the first instance, the report of the Committee recommends that we should take advantage of the facilities offered to Canada and other British possessions to obtain their currency coins either at the Royal Mint or at one of the Birmingham institutions under the charge of the Royal Mint. According to the Deputy-Master of the Royal Mint, the Government of Canada has expressed the wish to erect a mint for the coinages which they require, which have hitherto been executed there, and which have not been very extensive. Honorable members will recollect that I account for the limited extent of the Canadian currency coined in Great Britain, by the fact that the American token coinage is current in Canada. The Deputy-Master adds—

They also desired to coin sovereigns, and in this case the new mint will have to be a branch of the Royal Mint.

I have since ascertained that Canada has already established a Mint for the coinage of gold, but I cannot find that any steps have been taken for the coinage of silver there. There is a vast difference of opinion amongst those who are considered experts upon this question, as to the quantity of silver currency required for Commonwealth purposes. Mr. Coghlan, the Government Statistician of New South Wales, estimates it at something over £1,000,000; Mr. Von Arnheim, of the Royal Mint, Sydney, at £1,000,000; Senator Walker at £1,500,000; Mr. Henry Gyles Turner, who is well known in Melbourne, at £1,700,000; and other authorities at £2,000,000. Personally, I think the amount is in excess of £2,000,000, and I base my opinion upon the quantity of loose money which the Australian people carry in comparison with those elsewhere. Another test is to be found in the fact that the regulations under the German Imperial Act to prevent over-issues are based on 15 marks (15s.) per head. That would be equivalent to about £3,000,000 for the Commonwealth. In making that estimate as the basis of an Imperial Act, great care would naturally be taken to insure accuracy. If we assume that the amount required would be £2,000,000, I find, on the basis that 66 shillings may be minted out of every pound troy of silver—which was that fixed by Lord Liverpool's celebrated letter in 1815—we should require 606,060 lbs. troy weight of silver. This, at 2½s. per ounce—which is to-day's quotation for silver—would cost £731,059. If we allow the sum of £30,000 for the coinage of this silver, the cost will be increased to £761,059. That would cover both the cost of the silver and of the coinage. A coinage currency of £2,000,000 would, according to the figures of experts, represent more than 40,000,000 pieces of money. In Australia we can coin 5,000,000 pieces of gold for about £15,000, notwithstanding all the processes involved in coining, checking, weighing, and remelting it. Great Britain, however, coins 120,000,000 for an expenditure of about £84,000. About half of those 120,000,000 coins consist of three-penny and six-penny pieces. These are struck off almost as rapidly as are brass buttons and, of course, it necessarily follows that there are fewer rejected pieces as they come down in the scale of value. The rejected pieces of gold average about 15·31, those of Imperial silver 3·33, those of Colonial silver 1·55, and those of copper 1 per cent. The first issue of such a coinage, therefore, would provide the Commonwealth with £2,000,000, less the first cost, namely, £761,059. That would leave a gross profit of £1,238,941.

Mr. SPENCE.—Is that under the present system?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It does not make the slightest difference under which system it is. If we add to the gross profit I have mentioned, the net profit on bronze coin, which would be, approximately, £31,059, it will be seen that there would be a total profit on the adoption of this system of currency by the Commonwealth of £1,270,000. Although we have allowed £30,000 for coinage, we do not propose that we shall coin this ourselves. That estimate of cost was decided by reference to results obtained at the Royal Mint. If we employed others to carry out the work for us in the first instance—and I think that the Committee's proposal that we should do so is a wise one—we should have to allow for charges which the Royal Mint imposes for supervision or for the work of coining. We should have to allow for interest in respect of the silver advanced for coinage purposes, and for something in addition to the labour cost. If the work were done by Birmingham firms, for example, they would certainly require something more than the working cost of doing this minting for us. After careful consideration of the figures, I have put this down at £70,000. That leaves £1,200,000 as the original profit or seigniorage of the Commonwealth, which at 3 per cent. would give £36,000 per annum. When the Committee was considering if this large profit, or seigniorage, should be funded some of the conservative witnesses suggested that there was no necessity for the adoption of any such course. I think that Senator Walker, who may be considered a careful authority, expressed that opinion; but I do not feel satisfied that we can look forward complacently to the maintenance of the existing ratio of value between silver and gold. We have to look forward to possible upheavals in the relative values, and to trouble in regard to metallic coinage generally. The safest course would be to fund this difference, and use only the annual interest, which might be added at once to the consolidated revenue. In support of this suggestion, I would invite the attention of the House to a statement which appears at page 42 in the annual report of the Deputy Master and Comptroller of the Mint for 1901. I confess that I cannot clearly understand certain figures which are given there, in regard to the coinage of silver at Calcutta and Bombay. If the figures are as they appear to me to be, they show a profit of £4,500,000. That, however, I think, must be wrong.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Perhaps the honorable member has applied the wrong decimal.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No; the figures are plainly given, and I shall read them to the right honorable gentleman. The receipts of the Bombay Mint for 1900-1 were 32,779,064 rupees, that represents £3,277,906, while the expenditure was £128,072. At the Calcutta Mint the receipts for the same year amounted to 14,810,320 rupees, and the expenditure to 1,044,801 rupees. I cannot help thinking that those receipts were swollen by the sale of some silver coined in previous years. It is utterly impossible that such results should be shown on the extent of the work done. But I wish specially to point out the statement made by the Deputy Master, with regard to the profit derived from this coinage. He sets forth in a footnote that—

The net profit of the rupee coinage was transferred to the Gold Reserve Fund in the accounts of the Government of India.

This shows that they have taken care in India to guard against any possible dislocation of the currency by reason of an altered relative value between the two metals. I think the Commonwealth would act wisely if it adopted the same course. It must also be remembered that with a silver currency we should have to provide for the wear and tear of coin from year to year. My own opinion is that for many years after the establishment of the system it would not be necessary for us to take that matter into account in calculating what we were likely to obtain each year. I think the natural increment in the demand for our currency, if silver did not materially advance, would be sufficient to pay all losses experienced in the restoration of worn coin. In England in the year 1897-8, the loss in this respect was £28,563; in 1898-9, £55,313; in 1899-00, £27,457; in 1900-1, £31,129; and in 1901-2, £23,419. That gives an average of £33,000 per annum. The coin which we should issue, however, would be new; some twelve years would elapse before it would begin to wear to a point at which it would be necessary for us to renew it. After the lapse of some years we should probably require to expend £4,000 per annum in the restoration of silver coinage. I have already referred to the probable expenditure of £3,000 per annum which we should be called upon to pay in making good the wear and tear in respect of gold coinage, so that we should have a total outlay of about £7,000 per annum in respect of coinage restoration. That would be about the average on the present figures of population and currency.

Mr. BAMFORD.—But it would not be incurred for twelve years after the introduction of the system.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—That liability would not occur in respect of new coinage until that period had elapsed. The average life of silver coin is about thirteen years. The honorable member will recollect how often we used to see coins in a very good state of preservation which had gone all round the world, perhaps, and had been coined 50 or 60 years before. Mr. Wardell, the Bullion Master of the Mint, says in his evidence that the Commonwealth is not justified in commencing a coinage with this enormous seigniorage. He was cross-examined on that point, while other witnesses were approached in regard to it, and I think the Committee were quite satisfied that Mr. Wardell was over scrupulous, and rather pedantic, in this matter. In my opinion the Mint officials generally are extremely conservative. As England commenced with a proportionate ratio of thirteen to one, between gold and silver they consider that it would be radically wrong to commence with a different ratio. Other witnesses like Senator Walker informed us that with an honest Government behind it, that seigniorage was quite the proper thing. This profit is taken by Governments such as that of Great Britain, and utilized by them. Great Britain the year before last passed nearly £1,000,000, representing the profits derived from coinage, into the Exchequer. Last year a further addition of about £500,000 was made in this way, while the average for the last twelve or thirteen years has been something like £500,000 per annum. The profits show a tendency to grow larger, because the price of silver has been steadily coming down. I do not think there is any probability of the Government of the Commonwealth ever incurring the risk of an over issue of silver coin. An over issue of silver coin is one of those curses which always come back to roost, and every country that has ever issued has experienced that result in a very bad form. If it is desired to guard against such a possibility, the lawyer's maxim of ex abundanti cautela ought to be adopted. A safeguard is offered to us in the principle which has been adopted by Germany. Under the German Imperial Act it is provided that the Mint authorities shall not issue token money except in exchange for gold; they issue it to the banks and other private institutions in exchange for gold. When a Mint issues its silver only in return for gold there can never be an over issue. The financial corporations will never apply for silver unless there is some special trade demand for such coinage; and if they have to purchase it with gold they will take only sufficient to satisfy their requirements when there is any danger of it dropping. If we fund the difference or seigniorage, and issue currency money only in exchange for gold, we shall not run any risk. With our English reputation behind us, and with the high standard of financial morality exhibited by the Governments of the States, there is no possibility of danger. The question of coining silver was considered years ago by politicians in these States. It was raised in the first instance, I think, by one of the Premiers of Victoria, and a correspondence was carried on by Premiers of New South Wales. The Treasurer himself took part in this correspondence. The price of silver dropped. At this time the Colonial Governments, having experienced an actual loss in the coinage of gold, could not understand why they should continue to coin it at a loss, while Great Britain was exhausting her energies in pouring out silver at a profit; they naturally demanded that some of the profits should come to them. The correspondence, which is interesting, will be found as addenda to the report. From the first the British Government recognised—as an honest British Government always will do—that it had no claim to the seigniorage which was made on the quantity of silver currency used in the Australian States. But they were confronted with many grave difficulties. They realized that they could not give each of the States the right to coin silver, and they had to consider which should be given that privilege. If it had been proposed to give it to Queensland, for example, Western Australia would naturally have objected, and if it had been suggested that it should be given to Victoria, New South Wales would have opposed such a proposal. They remitted the question from time to time to Australian statesmen, and requested them to come to some agreement under which the colonies could establish one coinage system, and divide the profits amongst themselves. There was the further great difficulty of so distinguishing the coinage turned out in Australia from that coined in the mother-land that it would be possible to saddle the State issuing the coinage with the responsibility of restoring it as it wore out. That was the gravest difficulty of all, and it constitutes the chief reason why we should have a currency for the Commonwealth. It was thought that the difficulty might be met by having a mint mark; that we should be able to coin half-crowns, and place upon them some distinguishing mark by which it would be possible to tell that they had been coined in Australia. But honorable members will recognise that those marks would be obliterated in many instances; that the half crowns, by the issue of which we had made 1s. 3d. per coin might be redeemed at 1s. or 1s. 2d. each in England, and that we might go on re-coining them and continually making 1s. 3d. per coin. The Imperial Government could not face a set of circumstances in which that would result. No way out of the difficulty could be seen, but when federation was approaching, the suggestion was made, that as the Commonwealth Parliament would have power to deal with questions of coinage and currency, the whole matter should be allowed to stand over for the consideration of the Legislature. The Federal Parliament has met, and honorable members are now invited by the report of the committee to consider whether we should not have the profits to be derived from the currency; if so why we should not have a system, and if we are to have a system, why it should not be a decimal one. Still the advantage of a profit I look upon as the very least of the advantages to be secured, though I regard it as a great lever in commanding attention to the importance of the subject when addressing popular audiences. But there is a great disturbance throughout the country because it is proposed to spend £30,000 upon establishing a necessary institution, and the public mind is similarly agitated whenever any other expenditure is talked of. Surely then an opportunity to save £30,000 by any means by which it may be honestly and justly saved, should command attention. If only to increase the national sentiment we should have a coinage of our own. The sentiment of America, in many respects, centres more round the dollars and the dimes than round the stars and stripes, and a national coin, with a national emblem upon it, must contribute as much to national sentiment as does the national flag. The great advantage to be gained by the adoption of the decimal system is the saving of trouble which it brings about in every department of trade and commerce—in buying and selling, in calculating, in bookkeeping, in accountancy, in insurance, and in professional work. An instrument which produces the best results with less labour than is necessary to produce them in any other way must add to the national wealth, whether that instrument be an intellectual one like the differential calculus or a material one like a sewing machine. The decimal system of coinage is something partaking of the nature of both. It is a system by which we buy and sell, count, and regulate our affairs in the smallest space of time, with the least trouble, and with the least chance of error. The chances of error when the decimal system is employed are much fewer than under our present system, and the troubles of the Minister for Trade and Customs would have been much lessened if the merchants whom he has persecuted for their small mistakes had been allowed to utilize the decimal system. Various estimates have been made of the saving in the national education bill which would follow from the full adoption of the decimal system; but I am unable to deal now with the application of that system to weights and measures, because it was not part of the subject referred to the committee for investigation. In the opinion of some skilled experts, however, the full adoption of the decimal system in our schools would save two years' schooling in every child's career, while no skilled witness has estimated the saving to be less than one year. Surely such a saving would greatly reduce the education bill of the country, and would be still larger than the gains of seigniorage or the profits upon the first issue of the coinage. The chief reason for which I advocate the adoption of the decimal system is that it is a simple one, and will save one to two years' schooling to every child in the community. I do not know if honorable members have ever compared the simple arithmetic text-books which are used in the junior forms of our State schools with similar books used in America. If they have, they will know that, whereas in our text-books the children commence to deal first with questions of enumeration, and then go on to problems in figures, and, later, to the pence, shillings, and pounds tables, and so to problems in money, in the American books they deal first with questions of enumeration, and then go directly to the consideration of problems of money, because under the decimal system there is no difference between a money problem and a figure problem. In America a child proceeds from the enumeration of figures to problems involving money, and so on to other problems, right up to the highest scientific calculations. Having pointed out some of the advantages of the decimal system, I know that I shall be asked by many what objections can be raised to its adoption. I shall try to review a few of these objections, and endeavour to briefly answer them. The main objection is that the adoption of the decimal system would mean the disturbance of our present condition. Honorable members know what it means to alter the state of affairs to which people are accustomed. Objection on that score has been taken to every reform which has been advocated from the very dawn of civilization. What we are used to we regard as satisfactory. If we had always slept on boards, a board would be held to be as comfortable to us as a feather bed. But any one who brings his mind to bear upon the two systems must inevitably be led to the conclusion that the decimal system is the better. Then he must ask the question—"That being so, why should we not adopt it?" Here we are met with a further objection, which I hardly like to call the "Yes, Mr. Chamberlain" objection, but which is largely founded upon the idea which that phrase suggests—I refer to the opinion that in this, as in other matters, we should await and obey the dictation of the Imperial Government. Now, in a matter like this, which has nothing to do with our loyalty to Great Britain, an objection like that should have no effect. If a reform is good for us, all we have to ask ourselves is can we adopt it without any serious disadvantage to our trading relations with the mother country.

In support of my assertion that we can adopt the decimal system without any such disadvantage, I would point out that Canada has a coinage which differs more from the English currency than that of Australia would differ, and yet Canadian business men tell us that they experience no difficulty in trading with Great Britain. I, as an experienced business man, trading with the United States, know that there is less difficulty in dealing with invoices and statements coming from America, with the amounts set out according to the American monetary system, than there is in dealing with invoices and statements from Great Britain. One knows whether an American invoice is right or wrong merely by looking at it. There is no need to take up a pencil to make a calculation to ascertain its correctness. I cannot see any reason for anticipating obstacles to the freest and fullest trading between the Commonwealth and Great Britain if we adopt a currency slightly different from that of the old country.

MR. BAMFORD.—There is a possibility of England herself adopting the decimal system.

MR. G. B. EDWARDS.—I intend to refer to that. Very many people speak and write upon this subject without being able to fully understand the arguments advanced on each side, and the adoption of the system is frequently condemned for reasons which really show no objection to it at all. For instance, one of the writers in the daily press asks how, in England, would people understand a quotation of Australian butter at 25 cents per lb.; or, supposing we had adopted the decimal system, how would our people here understand a quotation of butter in England at 12½d. per lb.? The man who asks a question like that should ask himself another question—"How is it that business men who buy goods from the United States or from countries like Germany understand the quotations sent to them, and how is it that foreign merchants understand our quotations?" An American merchant never finds any difficulty in doing business with England, although the monetary systems of the two countries are different. Of course, a person who has nothing to do with trade, if he were suddenly asked what the price of a pair of gloves costing 3s. 6d. in English money would be in the American currency, would be puzzled by the question; but in actual trade relations there is no difficulty. What we have most to fear is the friction which will be created amongst our own people by the change. An argument that used to be advanced against the decimal system as adopted in France, and which appeared, I think, in the first edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, but has since been dropped, was embraced in the statement that, if an article were quoted at 1.25 francs per lb., a poor person who wished to purchase ½ lb. would be victimized, because, since there is no exact binary division of such a sum which could be expressed in the coinage, he would be compelled to pay about ¼d. more for the article than its exact price. The fallacy of such an objection has often been exposed and ridiculed. If an article were quoted in a Melbourne shop at 12½d. per yard, the person buying half-a-yard would probably be required to pay 6½d. for it. It is notorious that articles are frequently quoted in drapers' shops at prices like 1s. 11½d. a yard, for which, of course, the purchaser of half-a-yard must pay 1s. But prices will always accommodate themselves to the money system prevailing in the country, providing that that system offers anything like the necessary facilities, and the decimal system gives a greater variety of subdivisions than any other. The chief objections to the system were very ably expressed by Mr. Thodey, the commercial editor of the Argus, than whom I do not think any one more capable could be found to summarize the arguments for and against the proposed change. But some of the witnesses examined by the committee raised very strange objections. Mr. Wardell, for instance, asked a very strange question, which was repeated by others, and therefore requires an answer. He asked how the wife of a mechanic, unacquainted with the decimal system, could satisfactorily perform her marketing under that system? But what do French women and American women know about the decimal system in the abstract? In America the children solve these questions while they are at school, because they get toy money; and a practical experience of the coins used under the decimal system would soon teach any person, however uneducated, its possibilities. I might very well ask—What does the wife of an English mechanic know about the quarto-duodecimo-vicesimal system under which she does her marketing? Of course, she never even heard the term. People learn how to spend their money to the best advantage by practical experience, and in that way they would soon learn to use the coins of a decimal system. A contributor to the Sydney Daily Telegraph, who is a very able writer upon commercial questions, objects to the proposals of the committee because they disturb the existing value of the penny, and that is without doubt the most serious drawback to the system now advocated. If, however, we desire to decimalize our monetary system we must disturb something. We might disturb a great deal, but we could not disturb much less than is proposed by the committee. No difference whatever is made until we get down below the sixpence. The present sovereign is maintained at its full value; the half-sovereign is preserved; the two-shilling piece is also to retain its present value under the name of florin; the shilling is preserved under the name of half-florin; and the sixpence under the name of a quarter florin. Below that the coins have to be altered, because they do not very closely approach the values of the coins which have to be substituted under the decimal divisions. After a very careful consideration of the interests of the poorer classes, and of the buying classes generally, it was decided to adopt the four-mil piece, which is only 4 per cent. less valuable than a penny. The same writer complains that the system proposed by the committee does not divide the coins evenly, one into the other; that, in fact, it does not provide for a binary division under which each coin would be exactly half the value of the one immediately above it. Theoretically that system is right, and one of the best witnesses who appeared before the Coinage Commission in England, Mr. Frederick Hendricks, proposed a system practically the same as that which we are now advocating, except that when he got below the florin in the silver coinage he proposed a 40-mil piece, a 20-mil piece, and a 10-mil piece, thus providing for the binary division of the smaller silver coins. In copper coins, he proposed four-mil, two-mil, and one-mil pieces. No doubt his system is the best for an ideal currency under which the sovereign is retained; but when it comes to be regarded practically, it must be seen that the 40-mil piece would not correspond with any coin in our present system. Although Mr. Hendricks' system is theoretically much better than that proposed by the committee, and would be the best to adopt if we had no history, and were dealing with a perfectly new set of circumstances, we think that the modifications proposed by us would make the new system more convenient of application in so far that it would prove less disturbing. So far as the smaller copper coins are concerned, it might perhaps be desirable to strike more than we have recommended. I acknowledge that, in this respect, some reconsideration is desirable. I do not think we shall require the one-cent piece for the purpose of currency; and if we do not coin it, except as a curiosity, we shall want a three-cent as well as a two-cent piece in order that we may be able to make up every variety of change in connexion with the use of ten-cent pieces. To adhere to the present system, in view of the fact that we have a favorable opportunity of adopting a better one, would be to place ourselves in a position similar to that which would have been occupied by Europe if it had continued to use the Roman numerals instead of adopting the Arabic system of notation. I think it was Macaulay who suggested that a great amount of interest might be caused by representing the present multiplication table in Roman numerals, and it would, no doubt, be very interesting to see an attempt made to multiply MDCCLXXXIV. by XIX. I cannot imagine how the Romans worked out their sums, because it seems impossible, without the use of the Arabic system, to carry out such calculations as we have to make. I have read a statement regarding a gentleman in China, who, by using numerals in the alphabet instead of the signs which have been availed of there for so many years, succeeded in teaching blind Chinese to read within a shorter space of time than that occupied under the old system by Chinamen in the full possession of their sight. Under the decimal system of coinage, we should be able to do more work with less energy and at less cost. It is said that we should await action on the part of England; but did we wait for England in regard to the ballot, or the adoption of the Real Property Act. If we wait for England to take action, and if I have the honour to remain a member of this House for so many years that I become its father, I dare say those who are then sitting here will see a tottering old man moving an annual motion with regard to decimal coinage, and being met with the rejoinder—"Wait for action on the part of England." I do not think we should wait for England to take the initiative. We are not likely to gain any time by doing so, but, on the other hand, if we make a start in what we believe to be the right direction, we may give strenuous assistance to those who are advocating the adoption of the decimal system in the old country, and thus more rapidly bring about an Imperial reform. If the decimal system is ever adopted by Great Britain, it will be upon the lines advocated by this report. No other has been supported in Great Britain, and the only alternative to such a system would be something after the nature of the universal currency scheme, which was recommended at the Convention which met in Paris in 1867. After a very protracted discussion on that occasion, it was resolved to recommend the use of the French franc as a universal standard of currency. Of course this coin differed from the English sovereign and the American half-eagle, and the Convention necessarily came to nothing. When the subject was considered in America, Mr. Dunning, a gentleman who seems to know a good deal about the subject of coinage, suggested that the difference between the French 25-franc piece and the British sovereign, amounting exactly to 88-hundredths, should be met by the reduction of the English sovereign by 44-hundredths, and the increase of the French 25-franc piece by 44-hundredths, bringing each to the same value. I believe that he also suggested that the British sovereign might be changed to only half the extent indicated, and that the other half might be retained as seigniorage, such as is claimed in respect to the French 25-franc piece, but not in connexion with the British sovereign. Then it was proposed that the Americans should change their half-eagle to the extent necessary to bring the three systems into accord. Nothing was done, but if anything is ever done in the way of arriving at an international standard of currency, it will be in the direction of Mr. Dunning's suggestion, because it is useless to expect that the United States, with its possible 100,000,000 inhabitants in the near future, will give up its large currency to adopt any other system, or that the Latin races, with hardly less people, will abandon theirs. If we follow the recommendation of the committee, and a universal currency is afterwards adopted, we shall suffer no more disability than if we adhere to the present coinage. I believe the committee have in their report afforded the House an opportunity of doing something practical, and that their recommendation is in the direction of progress, enlightenment, and economy. Therefore I have great pleasure in submitting it for the consideration of honorable members.

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—I have great pleasure in seconding the motion for the adoption of the report of the select committee, of which I was a member. I think it is only fair to say that the members of the committee, and I think also honorable members generally, owe a great deal to the honorable member for South Sydney, for the care and patience he has displayed in connexion with this important subject. I do not know of any work which he has not read, or of any utterance which he has not studied, and he has brought the weight of his interest to the committee, and has helped it materially in its deliberations, and in arriving at the determination now placed before the House. To-day he has given further evidence of his knowledge and ability. The subject dealt with is one that is very difficult for most persons to follow, and in which no great interest can be worked up. Whilst, however, it is not likely that many people will become enthusiastic over the proposal, there are many practical considerations connected with it which deserve the attention of honorable members. Nearly all those who have studied the subject recommend the adoption of some form of decimal coinage, and it is very significant that at the present time that system has been adopted in every country of the world, except four, namely, the United Kingdom, South Africa, India, and Australia. Therefore we have the full strength of precedent to urge us on in the path of reform. I have not heard of any country which desires to abandon its decimal system; but, on the contrary, we are well aware that attempts have been made in Great Britain to substitute for that which is now in vogue the decimal system of currency. The first recommendation of the committee is that the seigniorage or profit resulting from coinage for the Commonwealth should belong to the Commonwealth.

When the present Treasurer filled the office of Treasurer of Victoria, I remember that he almost succeeded in inducing the Premiers of the different States to agree to a similar proposition, and I am, therefore, at a loss to understand why the coinage of silver has never been undertaken in this State. But even though the effort in that direction has hitherto failed, no one can question that sooner or later it must be successful. Consequently, I do not propose to direct my remarks to that branch of the subject. I take it for granted that the Government intends to obtain for the people of Australia any profit which may result from the coinage for the Commonwealth. Regarding the system of decimal coinage, I have previously observed that every country in the world, with the exception of about four, has adopted it. We have, therefore, an excellent lead, if we feel disposed to follow it. Those who have studied the question agree that so much can be said in favour of the system that there is no need for me to dwell upon its disadvantages, if it has any. The honorable member for South Sydney has ably combated most of the objections which are usually advanced against its adoption. This is not a matter which involves any international complications, and I do not see any reason why we should hesitate to adopt the system until some move in that direction is made in the United Kingdom. Unquestionably, by establishing it we should facilitate our international trade, besides effecting a considerable saving. It is, perhaps, worth while pointing out that, although the witnesses who appeared before the committee were drawn from all sections of society, the great majority of them supported this system. Those witnesses included bankers, financial editors, accountants, the representatives of chambers of commerce, of insurance institutes, and of the Trades Hall, and almost without exception they favoured the adoption of some system of decimal coinage. It is also worthy of notice that after giving the matter most careful consideration, the chief objection raised against it has been met by a recommendation in favour of decimalizing the sovereign. The committee always kept in view the fact that the bulk of our trade must be done with the Empire itself. By retaining the sovereign as the unit, and by decimalizing it, I feel that the chief objection which can be urged against the system has been overcome. It is all very well to say that we should wait until Great Britain has adopted this scheme, but I do not believe in any conservative delay. So many trivial objections weigh with those who have not studied the subject, that it is the duty of the Government to place it before the public in such a way that they can fully understand it. I am prepared to admit that to a certain extent it would be idle to decimalize our money unless simultaneously we are prepared to decimalize our weights and measures. Some of the witnesses examined by the committee thought it was not absolutely necessary to touch our system of weights and measures, and that we should deal with our money first. Personally, I think that the two are so intimately connected that a movement for the decimalization of money ought to carry with it the decimalization of weights and measures. One reform without the other will confer very little advantage upon us. Modern requirements demand that our methods of conducting our business should be as rapid as possible. In the United States the whole desideratum is to get through business quickly and accurately. By adopting a decimal system for weights and measures as well as for money, that country has facilitated its business in a way that the people of Australia can hardly realize. The saving of time in connexion with these two matters is so great that all minor difficulties can be set aside. I have nothing further to add at this stage. I believe that it is to the benefit of Australia and the trading community generally that the report should be adopted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—There is no doubt that this subject is one of the most difficult and intricate with which any body of men can be called upon to deal. I agree with the honorable member who has submitted the motion that it is a very interesting one, and I think I should be wanting in a sense of duty if I did not congratulate him upon the able manner in which he has placed it before the House. He has evidently bestowed upon it many years of consideration, and I must thank him for the great and honest enthusiasm which he has displayed in this connexion—an enthusiasm which, I venture to think, had a great deal of influence upon the other members of the committee. To some degree I am entirely in sympathy with him, though

I cannot see my way to go to the length of carrying out in their entirety the recommendations of the committee, especially so far as they relate to the adoption of a decimal system of coinage. I have come to that conclusion after reading the evidence. I have perused that testimony with very great interest, but I hope that, under similar circumstances, the secretary of any committee or commission will in future be directed to prepare an epitome of the evidence, so that persons interested may be spared the trouble of having to read a mass of questions and answers which have very little relation to the subject with which they are supposed to deal.

Mr. THOMSON.—There is an epitomized index.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That is not of much use. Concerning the question of the coinage of silver, I am entirely with the honorable member who acted as chairman of the committee. For many years that matter has been one of controversy between the Imperial authorities and the States Governments, and more especially the Government of Victoria. It has been urged time and again that the States should have the right to coin their own silver, but the utmost that the British Government would concede was to hand over to the States the profits made upon their coinage. The latter, however, did not care to accept that profit as a gift. Shortly before I vacated the office of Treasurer in this State, I practically succeeded in making an arrangement by which we should have obtained permission to coin our own silver. The various Premiers in conference assembled had agreed to the proposal. There were two Mints in Australia at the time, and one difficulty to be decided was whether the coinage should be undertaken by one or both of those establishments. But we should also have had to redeem our own worn coins, and that fact raised another difficulty. However, it was overcome by an arrangement to have a mark sunk deeply into our own coins so as to make them distinguishable from others. But the real reason urged by the British Government against conceding to the States the right to mint their own silver was that they might be tempted in time of necessity to over-issue, in order to gain the profit resulting therefrom. We replied pointing out that only a certain amount of silver could be used by the people, in addition to which we were willing that the quantity should be restricted to that issued during the two or three previous years, and that it should be done under arrangement with the associated banks. Then Federation took place, and shortly afterwards I asked the Prime Minister to re-open negotiations with the Imperial authorities. Unfortunately, by some mischance a request by the Commission which was intended to elicit what the Imperial authorities were prepared to do in regard to the adoption of the decimal coinage system, became mixed up with the other matter, so that whilst those authorities dealt with one subject, they did not with the other, which I think was of far greater importance. Negotiations are now pending.

Mr. THOMSON.—For a silver and copper coinage?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We were chiefly directing our attention to the coinage of silver; the amount of copper coined was not very great. When we come to terms we shall probably be able to arrange for both a silver and copper coinage. At the outset, I felt strongly that we should carry out our own coinage work, but further inquiries and careful consideration have impelled me to the conclusion that it would be much wiser for us to request the Imperial authorities to do for us for some years, at all events, what they have done for Canada—that they should have our coins minted for us, allowing us any profit over and above the actual expenditure. That allowance should not be made as a grant to relieve us from the loss which we have suffered in connexion with the coinage of gold, but should be quite a separate transaction. My honorable friend has referred to the immense profits that are likely to be derived from the adoption of a Commonwealth system of coinage. The honorable member shows that they would be something like £1,250,000.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is not the amount mentioned in the committee's report.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—At all events, it is said that it would be over £1,000,000. When I first saw that statement, I felt that we should be prepared to suffer almost any inconvenience in order to obtain so large a sum of money for the Commonwealth. But when we look carefully into the question, honorable members must see that we could not hope to obtain anything like that profit unless it represented the earnings of a considerable number of years. Whether we had a system of decimal coinage, or adhered to the existing system, there would be no difference so far as that matter was concerned. The profit in either case would be exactly the same. The honorable member for South Sydney has referred to the cost of the three Mints in the States, and the question whether it is wise to maintain them all. That, however, is not a matter which we have at present to consider. No doubt attention will be given to it, but strong objections would be raised, particularly by Western Australia, where a branch of the Mint has only been established of recent years, to any proposal to close them. It was thought that it was only right that in a great gold-producing country like Western Australia, proper facilities should be given for the coinage of its gold, and that State would naturally object to the removal of the local branch. The changing of coins into bars is a very intricate matter to deal with. Doubtless millions of sovereigns, coined at great expense by us, are sent away and immediately melted down. My recollection of the evidence relating to this subject is that some objection was raised to the proposal that these bars should be merely marked. It was thought that bars marked in that way could not be dealt with so readily as coins, nor would they be acceptable to those who would have to take them. We have to consider whether that expense of minting cannot be saved. My recollection of the evidence, together with what the honorable member for South Sydney has told me, is that the coining of a sovereign costs about 1d. With regard to the proposed profit by minting the silver, I take it that it cannot be intended that we should request the British Government to immediately call in the whole of the existing coinage so as to enable us to issue new coins, and in that way secure the profit of £1,000,000 or £1,250,000, to which reference has been made. Our issues would have to go out as the old coinage was in due course called in. The evidence seems to show that the outstanding silver coinage represents something like £2,000,000, and that the annual silver issue is about £60,000. On that issue, the profit, we will say, would probably be about £30,000. Against that, however, we should have to provide for replacing old and worn coins by new ones. We should also have to provide for any loss that might be incurred in renewing our gold issues, so that the profit would be reduced probably to £20,000 or £25,000. That, however, is a return that we might well seek to secure. We should be justly entitled to it, and if capitalized it might be useful for the purposes named by my honorable friend. In years to come, indeed, it might serve to assist in paying off our national debt. I do not agree with that portion of the report which says that the interest obtained from the fund should go into the consolidated revenue; as it is entirely a new source of revenue. The interest should be capitalized, and after the lapse of ten or fifteen years the fund would be so largely increased that it could be used to good purpose. I do not propose to deal further with the question of silver coinage. It is not one in which we are particularly interested at present; the main question is whether we should alter our existing system of coinage. In dealing with that matter we have to consider whether the undoubted advantages that would be derived from the change would not be counterbalanced by the greater disadvantages which, to my mind, would result from putting the system into operation, and which in the old country have prevented successive Chancellors of the Exchequer from carrying out the various proposals submitted to them. Perhaps it is fortunate for the committee that I was not associated with it, because the weight of evidence appears to me to be against the conclusions arrived at in regard to two subjects of the inquiry. I do not think that the decimalization of our coinage could properly take place before we had adopted the metric system in regard to weights and measures, while the other point on which I disagree with the findings of the committee is the question whether the Commonwealth should undertake this change before it has been brought into operation in the mother country. On both these points I differ from the finding of the committee, and I differ from it because of evidence which I have found in the committee's report. Theoretically I am somewhat in accord with the views of the honorable member for South Sydney, but I see such practical difficulties in the way of dealing with our coinage as proposed by the committee that I cannot support the report. I would be prepared to do so if I could, indeed, I should be prepared to go some distance in helping the honorable member to carry out the object which he has had in view for many years past. What are the benefits which it is claimed would accompany the change? The chief ones are that it would simplify calculations, and lead to greater simplicity in book-keeping. These advantages, however, would apply only to a certain portion of the community, rather than to the great masses of the people.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—They would apply to all classes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I think not. The minority, a large minority no doubt, of the people are employed in directions which necessitate an elaborate system of book-keeping, and require them to enter into intricate calculations. Those people would certainly be benefited by the adoption of the system. It would simplify their work, and also lead to greater accuracy in their calculations. I occasionally use the decimal system when I have to work out percentages; but I think that the vast majority of the people find it just as easy to work under the present system of pounds, shillings, and pence. The primary object of coins, as has been pointed out, is not for the purpose of calculation, but for payment or exchange, and therefore we must dissociate those two matters. Whether we apply the decimal system to our coinage or not, those who desire to use it in working out their calculations will be at liberty to do so. They can make their payments under our existing system, even if they work out their calculations under the decimal system. Their accounts can be decimalized without difficulty.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Think in German and express in French.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It would be more difficult for the general body of the people to think in pounds shillings and pence, and to calculate at the same time under the new system which my honorable friend is so anxious to bring into operation. The committee propose to adopt nearly all the existing coins; but they suggest certain new ones, and that is where great confusion would undoubtedly arise. I deeply regret that the committee have found it absolutely necessary to recommend that that useful coin, the threepenny bit, should be abolished under their scheme. That coin would be reckoned as worth only 2 2-5d. We know what a serious loss that would mean to our churches, and to other institutions which occasionally benefit, when we have 2,000 or 3,000 people gathered together, by contributions which generally average 3d. per head. As the Prime Minister reminds me, the change would also make a difference in the hospital collections. The honorable member for South Sydney omitted to point out that numerous Commissions have dealt with this matter in Great Britain. Those which sat prior to 1859 reported in favour of a change, but the only step which was ever taken in that direction was made in 1849, when the florin was introduced. The last Commission, which sat in 1859, took further evidence, and although they had the reports of previous Commissions before them, and investigated the subject fully, they reported against any alteration. That seems to be the last occasion upon which the matter was investigated in Great Britain, although different motions relating to it have been moved in the British Parliament.

Mr. THOMSON.—That was one Commission against several.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It was the last, and it had the benefit of all the evidence taken by other Commissions, in addition to the fresh evidence that was forthcoming. We are told that this question has been dealt with and changes made in the coinage of other countries; but the most striking feature of the matter is that all these countries have dealt with it in a different manner. We cannot reconcile the German, the French, and the American systems. They are on varying bases, and the evidence shows very conclusively that in every case the change was made because the many varying systems within the country rendered a uniform coinage absolutely necessary. The States of the German Empire had a varying coinage. Evidence given before the committee shows that the same state of affairs existed in Bavaria, while in Canada, under what was termed the Halifax coinage, 4s. worth of English money was worth 5s., while an English shilling was worth 1s. 3d. No doubt, the people of Canada were closely associated with the United States in business relations, and naturally they adopted the coinage system of that country. Let me say that among all the schemes I have seen I think the American is the best and the simplest. There can be no question as to its simplicity. If any change were made I should much prefer the adoption of the United States of America's system to that proposed by the committee; but we cannot do away with the sovereign. In the United States they have 5, 10, 25, and 50 cent. pieces, while the dollar piece, which has been mentioned, is not very often used. They work out their calculations at so many dollars and so many cents, and the whole system is very simple. It has been well put by some of the witnesses, whose evidence I shall quote for the benefit of honorable members—because I do not expect that they will read the whole of the report—that the changes made in other countries were due to the fact that the existing systems were unsatisfactory, and because it was desired to standardize the confused currencies of those countries. If we could have a uniform coinage throughout the world, it would, undoubtedly, be an immense advantage, and although such a state of things may not come in our own time, I hope it will come eventually. It may be that the Western world will insist upon retaining its very simple system, and the Eastern world will have to devise some scheme for making its differing currencies uniform. But I do not know that that change can be looked for in the immediate future. It has been pointed out by the honorable member for South Sydney that an immense saving in the time taken to educate our young people would be gained by the adoption of the decimal system; but I venture to say that such a contention is without foundation, and that, instead of any saving, there would be a loss in that respect, if we adopted a decimal system.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The right honorable gentleman does not find that opinion stated in the evidence.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The evidence shows that in France and in America, people went on using the system to which they had formerly been accustomed for a generation after the change was made, and one witness stated that people would go on for three generations using an old system after the adoption of a new.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—In their literature only.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—And in their actual money transactions. Unless the decimal system is adopted by Great Britain as well as by Australia, our young people will have to be educated in both the present system and the decimal system. It is not the "Yes, Mr. Chamberlain," reason, or any such absurdity, which induces me to object to a system which is different from that of Great Britain; my great objection to the change is that if our system is not the same as that of the old country, our children must unquestionably be taught two systems, the British and the Australian, so that they may be fitted to deal with both when they enter upon the business of life. Quite apart from any question of sentiment, or the advisability of making changes here before they are adopted in the old country, I think that the objection which I have just stated is a very strong one. In my opinion, the reason that an alteration would remove many inconveniences which are admitted on all hands, is not strong enough to counter-balance the inconveniences which a change of system at the present time would bring about.

Mr. PAGE.—How does Canada get over the difficulty?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not know; I think both systems are taught; but Canada was forced to adopt the decimal system because of her nearness to the United States, and the importance of her trade relations with that country.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—One hardly sees a British coin in Canada. Nearly all the coins in use there are American.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes; but my point is that if Australia adopts the decimal system, and Great Britain does not, our children will have to learn both the British and the Australian systems to enable them to deal with the accounts which pass between the two countries.

Mr. THOMSON.—It is only necessary that they should know how to decimalize vulgar fractions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It will still be necessary to use fractions, because in many cases it is easier to make calculations by using fractions than by using decimals. For instance, one witness points out that it is very easy to ascertain the seventh part of any sum by the use of fractions; but as the decimal equivalent of 1/7th is .142857 recurring, it would be very difficult to divide a sum into sevenths by the use of decimals.

Mr. THOMSON.—The great saving in the education of children to which the honorable member for South Sydney referred depends upon the adoption of the metric as well as the decimal system.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No doubt if both systems were adopted, and we had not to take account of any other, there would be a great saving; but if we are to continue our trade relations with Great Britain, and all the figures used in that country are arranged according to one system, while the figures used in Australia are arranged according to another, no time would be saved in the schooling of children, because they would have to be taught the two systems instead of one as at present. If we could induce the Imperial Government to adopt the decimal system, many of us would be prepared to advocate the change here, because the difficulties then resulting would be only such as could be eventually overcome. There was an extraordinary conflict of opinion on the part of the witnesses who were examined by the committee. Some of them referred to the present system as absolutely perfect, and seemed to think that to get rid of it would be to bring about the greatest misfortune that has occurred since the burning of the library at Alexandria. But the witness who made that statement had himself a pet scheme which he wanted the committee to adopt, in which the half-sovereign would be the unit of value. Every scheme brought forward was condemned by other witnesses as utterly unworkable. The witnesses ridiculed each other's proposals, and showed the weak spots in them. The great difficulty which the committee had to face was the need for retaining the pound for use in large transactions, and the penny for use in minor retail transactions. That seems impossible under any system of decimal coinage. At the best there must be a difference of 4 per cent., which, of course, would amount to a good deal in a great bulk of transactions. In all probability the difficulty would not arise in large transactions, but only in small retail transactions.

Mr. WATSON.—How often would it affect the purchases of a housekeeper? If she bought so many yards of any material, she would not lose 4 per cent. on every yard. At most she would lose only on the fractional price of the last yard.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The loss would occur chiefly in transactions like the buying of stamps, the purchase of tram tickets, papers, and in petty matters like that. Somebody must lose, and, of course, some one will gain. The loss to the Post-office would be considerable, but no doubt the public, as they would not have to make it good directly out of their own pockets, would not trouble much about it. The Treasurer for the time being would be blamed for a decrease in the revenue, and that would be all. I admit that the difficulties which a change would create would in time gradually disappear. I should be in favour of the change if I could see that it is practicable at the present time, and could be made without injuriously affecting our people. The witnesses who spoke in favour of the decimal system were to a large extent citizens of countries which have adopted that system, and they had therefore been brought up in familiarity with it. Mr. Bray very fairly stated that it was not right to expect him to give an impartial opinion upon the subject, because he was naturally imbued with the idea that the system in vogue in his own country, and with which he had always been familiar, was the best to be adopted. Other witnesses were probably in the same position. A great many of those who were witnesses before the committee were people who desired to air their peculiar views. I was surprised at the want of evidence from representative commercial men. It is not the fault of the committee that that evidence was not obtained. They tried to obtain it, but they complain in their report that they had very few responses from quarters from which they expected a great deal of assistance. All manner of units were suggested for the coinage—£1, 10s., 5s., 2s., 1d., $\frac{1}{2}$ d., 25s., and 20s. 10d. The last was evidently suggested so that $\frac{1}{2}$ d. might be the exact one-thousandth part of £1. The position of the British Government is that there is no general demand for a change, and that it is hardly right to make a change which would so largely affect the whole people until they had expressed the opinion that they desired it.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Did the masses call out for a reform of the calendar? Did they not rather object to it?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—At any rate, there is no popular demand for a change in the coinage system. The honorable member for South Sydney has stated that only a few commercial men came forward to express their views against a change, but, no doubt, if public interest on the subject had been aroused, more objections would have been offered to the proposal than opinions expressed in favour of it. The people do not want the change. There has been no agitation for it. The honorable member for Bourke and the honorable member for South Sydney tell us that we should not wait for the example of the old country: that we did not hesitate to make changes in regard to the franchise, and to adopt the Torrens title system, long before the old country did anything in the same direction. But those were changes which affect only ourselves; they do not interfere with our relations to the old country. I have looked at this matter impartially, and I cannot get away from the fact that, if we make a change compulsory upon the whole population, it will create immense inconvenience and annoyance, and a certain amount of loss, for some portion of the community. The only benefit that I can see to be derived would be that the merchants would be able to make their calculations with, perhaps, more accuracy and with less labour. The change, however, would be a great hardship to the public generally; they would be puzzled and annoyed by it. It is all very well to ridicule the idea of a mechanic's wife being at a disadvantage in her marketing through having to adopt a new coinage, but the trouble which a change would create in small transactions such as hers would be very considerable. People are accustomed to see prices expressed in the value of certain coins, and if the coinage is altered, it means great inconvenience to them, and some loss either to the shop-keeper or to the purchaser.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That will always apply to the change.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am prepared to go the length of advocating the adoption of a new system if the public evince a strong desire for it, and if we can, at the same time, secure uniformity with Britain and the other parts of the Empire.

Mr. PAGE.—The artisan's wife would fancy herself a millionaire under the new system.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—She would find it very difficult to calculate in decimals.

Mr. THOMSON.—There would be no need for that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Then the people in the shops would have to do the calculating.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The shepherd counts his sheep in decimals, but he does not know it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—But he has done that all his life-time. It is not as if he had been in the habit of calculating his purchases in £ s. d., and had been suddenly called upon to give up his life's practice, and make his calculations according to a system of which he knew little or nothing.

Mr. PAGE.—How did the right honorable gentleman manage when he was travelling?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I gave what I was asked, and did not know whether it was right or wrong. I know that when I left Italy I carried away with me nineteen lire; but I do not know how many I left behind me. Mr. H. G. Turner, in giving his evidence before the select committee, pointed out that no demand had been made by the great London clearing houses for a change of currency. He referred to the immense sums of money which passed through those institutions in one day, and stated that they were able to make all their calculations within a few hours without any difficulty. He also mentioned that the Banker's Institute in England had not made any demand for the change.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Still he is in favour of the system.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes, under certain conditions which take away the whole value of his evidence so far as my honorable friend's case is concerned. The proposal for the adoption of a decimal currency was brought before Mr. Gladstone, and also before Mr. Goschen, in 1887, and before Sir William Vernon Harcourt in 1893, but they all took up the same position that I feel forced to adopt.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—They always had the Irish question, or some other of equal importance, to engage their attention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I think that the weight of evidence undoubtedly substantiates the proposition that we have no right to put our people to the inconvenience and loss which must result from a change of currency, unless there is a much stronger demand for it than is apparent at the present time. I quite admit that a discussion of the matter may arouse interest, and bring forward enthusiastic supporters of the proposal, and that the public may be taught that the benefits to be derived from the simplicity of keeping accounts, and the lesser schooling required, will compensate them for the losses to which they will have to submit in the first instance. But, at present, they do not take that view. I welcome this discussion because, I think that it will prove useful, and it may help forward the end which my honorable friend has in view.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The Australian Natives Association, which is a representative institution, has declared itself in favour of the decimal system.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That may be ; but even the members of that body would no doubt much prefer to have the scheme brought forward in connexion with the other features to which I have referred. Without any reference to Mr. Chamberlain I contend that we should not alter our system unless the British Government can also be induced to alter theirs. At present they are apparently not in favour of a change, but if there were a strong expression of opinion from the people of Australia they might be led to take action in this matter, as I believe they undoubtedly will in connexion with the metric system.

Mr. THOMSON.—That will involve a much greater disturbance.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The Imperial Government are much more favorable to adopting the metric system than a new currency, and in spite of the report of the committee, I think that offers a much more ready means of saving the time of school boys and girls, and of simplifying the operations of business. If the metric system were adopted, I believe it would prove of great convenience. The Prime Minister, when he attended the Premiers' Conference in London, was in favour of that system, and drafted resolutions, now in my possession, which he desired to bring before the House for the purpose of giving effect to a recommendation in that direction.

Mr. THOMSON.—The coinage would have to be altered if the metric system were adopted.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—A great many authorities think that the metric system should precede decimal coinage.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I think that the evidence available to us shows that the metric system is of far greater importance than the question of altering the currency. As one witness, whose evidence I shall quote, says, "it will be putting the cart before the horse" to adopt the decimal currency before the metric system.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The French Consul holds the contrary opinion, and Senator Walker also.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No doubt varying evidence has been given on the matter, but Senator Walker is not favorable to my honorable friend's contention. After reading the evidence I fail to see how the committee could have arrived at their decision. I think that my honorable friend must have imparted a considerable amount of his enthusiasm to his colleagues. That is the only way in which I can explain the result. One of the witnesses, Mr. McBride, who is apparently the general manager for the Massey Harris Co. in Australia, is among the witnesses, most of whom had particular ideas of their own, who came before the committee. Mr. McBride says—

I do not know whether there would be any particular saving there. Your text-books of course would have to be changed to the decimal system. In the Canadian schools children are taught both the decimal and the pounds, shillings and pence systems. I suppose that the same thing would apply here.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Hear, hear ! I had to learn them there.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—At a later stage, speaking with regard to the mil, Mr. McBride says—

I think that would be awkward for all time to come, because you would be establishing a different value for your coinage from the values in Canada and the United States.

Evidently Mr. McBride is permeated with the system to which he has been brought up from his childhood. Mr. Wardell, the superintendant of the bullion office of the Mint, goes very fully into the matter, and says—

The chief argument against its adoption in England was the undesirableness of making a change in the habits of the people unnecessarily. Mr. Gladstone, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, considered "it a very serious matter indeed, and one which ought not to be undertaken on any mere abstract opinion." It was pointed out that the primary purpose of coins was to facilitate payments, not calculations. Coins are instruments for adjusting the retail transactions of the market ; therefore, the greater the divisibility the better. . . . The chief obstacle to the adoption of the decimal system in England appears to be that no Government has yet cared to face the unpopularity of making a change in the habits of the people, there being no demand outside certain circles for the alteration. . . . It must not be forgotten that a very large number, probably a great majority if we include ladies, who would be largely affected by any change of the coinage, are unaccustomed to the use of decimals. The question is asked by the committee—"Does the decimal system of coinage possess such undoubted advantages as to render its adoption desirable, even in the face of the difficulties occasioned by any alteration in the value of the coins by which calculations are made, and values expressed." I cannot bring myself to think so. In making calculations, it is undoubtedly much simpler than our present system, but it seems to me that calculations of value, and the coins we use for payment, are largely distinct from one another.

He also says—

So far as I can trace, no country has deliberately set itself to alter its coinage unless the existing conditions were unsatisfactory and an alteration urgently needed, except perhaps in France, when the Revolution suggested changes in everything. But even as to France there is evidence before the Decimal Commissions to show that the currency was not satisfactory. I confess that I cannot see any great advantage in altering the present system of coinage to which we are accustomed, and which suits our requirements. There is no coin at present in use which could be dispensed with without much inconvenience.

In the Mint we use the decimal system for weighing and calculations, but the money results are expressed in sterling. I do not see how we could gain anything. Values in pounds, shillings, and pence are so easily added up, and so easily understood, that I doubt whether we should gain anything by expressing them decimally.

There is no purely decimal system possible which would retain both the pound and the penny, and so many of our values are expressed in either one or the other that great confusion would attend the abolition of either.

That is what presses upon my mind, and evidently pressed upon the minds of the members of the committee and of the witnesses, because a strong effort was made to arrive at a new coin, which would be worth £1 Os. 10d., without getting rid of the vereign. With regard to the metric system, Mr. Wardell says—

It seems to me that it would be putting the cart before the horse to introduce a decimal coinage system before decimal weights. I have shown that the object of a change in currency in any country has generally been to standardize confused currencies. Our currency is not confused. What is confused is our system of weights and measures, and if it is desired to make any alteration, the first step would appear to be to standardize them. If, after this has been done, it should be found inconvenient to make payments in existing currency—for the facility of making payments is the only use of subsidiary coins—then a good case might be made out for altering the coinage to suit conditions which had been found to be inconvenient.

He also remarks—

The vast majority of the people in the country have never worked a decimal sum in their lives. Ladies would certainly be largely affected by the change. Fancy a mechanic's wife going into a butcher's shop on the Saturday night, and having to work out calculations in decimals. Of course, instructions would have to be given in our schools as a preliminary.

Sir George Turner.

My honorable friend may be able to show us that all this would be absolutely unnecessary, but although I followed him very carefully, he has not said anything which removes the difficulty which was in the minds of some of the witnesses, and is also in mine.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—In America the dollar is the unit.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I cannot get away from the simplicity of the American system, but that now recommended by the committee is more complicated to my mind than that under which we are working.

Mr. THOMSON.—There is no difficulty in connexion with the new system.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—There is a great deal when you go below the sixpence.

Mr. THOMSON.—The difficulty in connexion with the American system is in working the dollar into pounds.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I have been making extensive quotations from the evidence in order that honorable members may have an opportunity of studying it. Mr. Wardell further remarks—

It seems to me that the time to alter the currency is when the shoe pinches; when the existing system is inconvenient.

Mr. FULLER.—The shoe pinches now!

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I cannot agree with that, because, except for some purposes of calculation, our system is a good one and works satisfactorily.

Mr. FULLER.—It might be improved.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No doubt; but I think that by improving it we might create more difficulties than by allowing matters to remain in abeyance, unless we can at the same time make other changes with regard to our measures, and induce the Imperial authorities to join us. If we could do that I should support my honorable friend in bringing about the suggested reform. Mr. Wardell continues—

As I have said, the only reason in the past for any alteration in currency in any country, as far as I have been able to ascertain, has been that the authorities of that country desired to put things right and to avoid confusion.

It cannot be said that there is any confusion in this country. The witness continues—

They have never deliberately started a new currency from any prospect of advantage in the coinage of it. The great point to consider is that existing values should be altered as little as possible. If you adopt a different system of currency you have to alter everything.

Later on Mr. Wardell says—

If the decimalization of anything is required, the first thing should be to decimalize our weights and measures, and then see whether our coinage would fit in with it.

The honorable member for South Sydney has referred to one of our bank managers, Mr. Henry Gyles Turner. That gentleman seems to have pretty clear ideas upon this matter. It is significant that some of the witnesses who came forward with written statements, which were utterly opposed to any change in our present system were, after undergoing examination at the hands of the chairman, rather disposed to think otherwise.

Mr. WATSON.—That shows the value of cross-examination.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It shows the influence which my honorable friend had upon them. Mr. Henry Gyles Turner says—

Speaking theoretically, it appears to me that in its educational aspect a good decimal system would immensely abbreviate the scholar's time devoted to arithmetic; but a uniform metrical system of weights and measures seems a far more crying need. As far as I can judge, without the knowledge of an expert, I should say that, of the existing systems, the dollar and cent of the United States is the best, the smallness of the unit in that of the Latin union being cumbersome for the gigantic operations of British commerce. But even the dollar is not free from that objection; therefore I have no doubt that in any alteration which may be made in England the pound sterling will be retained as the unit. I think there can be no doubt that a change to a distinct decimal coinage in the Commonwealth which was not adopted by Great Britain would be productive of great trouble and confusion, and would seriously intensify the difficulties of bookkeeping and for a time derange commercial operations. It would be better, before taking so important a step, to ascertain whether the agitation for this change, which has been going on intermittently for 40 years, is likely to be successful. It has been advocated by combined Chambers of Commerce and other influential mercantile bodies, and has been resisted by more than one Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the ground that the general public were apathetic where they were not hostile. Mr. Goschen was emphatic on one occasion, in 1887, in saying that while he could not deny that it was a matter of great importance and prospective benefit to the foreign commerce of the country, no Government would dare to propose such a change without a distinct mandate from the people that they really wished it, and were ready to submit to some loss and much inconvenience to bring it about. On another occasion, in 1893, Sir William Harcourt, in reply to a very influential deputation, while admitting the theoretical advantages, dwelt at great length on the practical difficulties, and the injuries which it would probably inflict on the working classes and small tradesmen.

The witness then points to the case in which cheques, promissory notes, and bills of exchange all expressed in pounds, shillings, and pence, and representing a total of over £82,000,000 sterling, were paid in six hours of one day without the intervention of a single coin. No difficulty was found in making the necessary calculations under our existing system of coinage. Mr. Gyles Turner was then asked—"Do you think it likely that that mandate will ever come from the people?" to which he replied—"I do not." That is the opinion of a gentleman who has had very large experience throughout the whole of Australia. Then we have the testimony of Mr. Charles Frusher Howard, author of a new system of reckoning. He wipes the committee out altogether. He says our present system is absolutely the best that could be adopted, and that it would be a crime to alter it. Then he brings forward his own proposal by which he desires to have ten shillings made the basis of our calculations. I really do not know from where my honorable friend managed to get some of these witnesses. Then Mr. Thodey, who has evidently studied this matter very deeply, deals with the objections which have been raised against the system. He says—

The principal recommendation of the decimal system is that some calculations of an ordinary kind are greatly facilitated. It is, within limitations, an instrument for the calculator. Should it be introduced, operations in international finance and commerce would practically continue to be conducted as at present. Education as regards the subject of arithmetic would become more troublesome, for the pupil would for a long time to come have to be taught both currency systems, the new and the old. Only after more than half a century of the decimal system did the French Government prohibit the teaching of the old system in the teaching of elementary education, but up to some years ago (I cannot speak of the present position) the requisition of a knowledge of the old system by advanced students was regarded as proper. No difference would take place with regard to teaching vulgar fractions, the decimal system being hopelessly and absurdly inadequate to express fractions. A child can easily be taught that one-seventh means one of seven equal parts of a whole, but what can he make of $\cdot 142857$ + repeated for all eternity, the decimal mode of expressing one-seventh? School exercises in pure arithmetic will not be shortened, and the study of complex numbers will be augmented by the necessity of learning two monetary systems instead of one. Currency relations furnish matter for calculation, and once a rate of exchange is given no difficulty need exist. But additional work would be occasioned by the conversion of a distinctive Commonwealth currency into the currency of the country with which it is most closely connected in trade and finance—the United Kingdom.

I think great difficulties would arise if the penny with its present value (that is 1-240th part of the British sovereign) were not retained. The retail trade, the transactions of which form by far the largest proportion of the total number of transactions, would be universally affected. Then various Australian products, such as wool, butter, leather, &c., are sold at so many pence per lb., both here and in England. The difference between 1-240th and 1-250th of a pound in low prices would be so small, and so awkward to adjust, that the purchaser might easily gain the advantage.

That would be to the disadvantage of the producers of this country. He points out that under the decimal system the rates for freight would continue to be quoted in sterling—a difficulty which seemed to strongly impress the chairman of the committee as one which it would be hard to overcome. He continues—

It would be far better to remain in close touch with the currency of the country with which Australian trade and financial relations are the greatest, than to adopt either the Latin Union or American currency system. I do not think that the adoption of a decimal system of coinage would facilitate the adoption of a metrical system of weights and measures. They can be introduced concurrently, or either may be introduced after the other. But if the change is to be made, and as the only accruing advantage would consist in facilitating certain kinds of ordinary computations, it would be as well to introduce both together.

Then he points to the varying coinage systems. In this connexion, he says—

There is no accord between existing systems. There is the German system, which is a decimal system, the mark being divided in that way, and the mark differs completely from the franc, which is also divided into hundreds, while both systems differ completely from the American system. So that, if a desire arose for an international currency, every country would have to give up something, unless they all agreed to adopt the United States dollar.

He also says—

All accounts in the United Kingdom and Australia are stated in £ s. d., and, if they are to be intelligible to people coming after, those people must learn the present system as well as any new system that may be adopted. Take a case like this: You go into an auction room and buy ten bales of wool at 6-78d.; if you alter the penny you will have to go into a calculation to find out how many Commonwealth pence and fractions of a penny you would have to give. That would be very inconvenient.

Then Mr. Harlin, who appears to be a journalist, and was previously a school-master, deals with the subject. His examination is reported as follows:—

You think there is no advantage in having a decimal relation?—I think there is an advantage in one direction only—in facilitating computation; but there are endless disadvantages in other directions.

What form do those disadvantages take?—The number 10 is a number which admits of only two factors, namely, the factor two and the factor five. The number 12, which is our basis for retail trade at present—being the parts of a shilling—admits of four factors, two, three, four, and six. As Herbert Spencer pointed out some years ago, if we exclude the factor five and the factor six as of little value, it remains that our existing division into twelve is three times as valuable as the division into ten would be. The question, as regards wholesale trade, is of very little importance indeed. The importance, to my mind, is in providing facilities for retail trade, and the number which admits of the largest number of divisions is, to my mind, a better number than the number which admits of few divisions.

Would there be any advantage in making the new coins on the decimal system?—Again I want a little more definition than is given in the question put to me. You say—“If we had to commence a new system.” I take it that we are part of the British Empire, and that our coinage must be more or less similar to the coinage of the British Empire. If the system adopted in England is the system we have at present of the sovereign, the shilling, and the parts of those coins, unless very good reasons are shown, indeed, in favour of adopting, say, the sovereign and something equivalent to a franc, we had better stick to the shilling.

Then the Deputy Master of the Mint, Mr. von Arnheim, deals with the subject. He says—

I do not think that any system has been received with favour by the British people. I think it would be impossible to establish a decimal system in England now.

Mr. Rix, another witness, also has a scheme of his own. He says—

It would be unwise for Australia to take independent action in endeavouring to bring about international uniformity of coinage. The British Government has not yet seen its way to adopt any of the proposed international units, viz. the 25 franc unit, the ten franc unit, or the farthing (the Anglo-Saxon unit), because each one involves a change in the British gold standard of value. This is a matter for Imperial action, and Australia can do little more than urge upon the Home Government the desirability of agreeing to some international unit of value, because of the immense commercial advantages it would give to the whole Empire. But we should consider the wisdom of adopting any practical proposal to decimalize our existing coinage. During the past half-century only one such proposal has been seriously considered, and agreed to by financial authorities as the most feasible, viz.—To keep the sovereign as the gold standard of value, and decimalize it. This is usually known as the “pound and mil” system, and has been taught in the elementary schools of Great Britain for the last 30 or 40 years, in order to familiarize the people with it. In 1849, the florin, or tenth of a pound, was first minted, avowedly to pave the way for this reform in coinage and computation. But these efforts have been fruitless, and for the following reasons:—People do not think of the florin as the tenth part of a pound, but as a two-shilling piece. They do not reckon up small purchases in florins, but in shillings. The shilling is the people's unit of value and of account in the transactions of retail trade. The florin is only half-a-century old, while the shilling is many centuries old, and among the most conservative of peoples it will continue to hold the field against the newcomer. In several of the United States, notably in New York, the "shilling," equal to twelve and a half cents, is still employed as a unit of value in trading, though no coin of that name has been minted there for over 100 years. The attempt to introduce the "pound and mil" system is, therefore, I think, doomed to failure.

He is one of the witnesses with whom my honorable friend does not agree.

Mr. MAUGER.—Is not that on account of the man's training?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The same remark is applicable to the witnesses who expressed themselves in favour of the system. They have become accustomed to it, whereas our people are not accustomed to it.

Mr. MAUGER.—We have to decide which is the better system.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Exactly; and which is the more convenient for the use of our own people. I hold that, without having consulted them upon the matter, it is premature to adopt the report of the committee. Such a step would necessarily mean the introduction of a Bill to carry out the recommendations embodied in that report without the people themselves ever having had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the matter. For that reason, I desire to place before the House the adverse testimony of certain witnesses, in order that the chairman of the committee may satisfy me that I am absolutely wrong. I am perfectly open to conviction. The editor of the Bankers' Magazine, Mr. Davis, who was also called, said—

While it must be admitted the decimal system is attractive apparently in reckoning, we fear in division into fractions, say, thirds, it would be awkward, and it would have a very upsetting effect on small retail traders, and would also be difficult to arrange in settling for fares for trams, &c., newspapers, stamps, and articles of service now purchased at $\frac{1}{4}$ d., $\frac{1}{2}$ d., $\frac{3}{4}$ d., 2d., and for payment of wages. Taken altogether, we do not, at present educated, favour the change.

This gentleman appeared to be an ardent supporter of the proposals put forward by the committee, but evidently he was expressing in the magazine what he believed to be the opinion of his patrons. That is to say, he was voicing the view which is entertained by bankers of this particular system. Then Mr. Palmer, who is a Master of Arts, says—

At the same time, if the decimal system is not to be constructed on a scientific basis, if it is not to be constructed in such a way that it would fit in with all other weights and measures, then I think it would be very undesirable to adopt it.

Another witness called was Mr. Peter Madden, who said—

To adopt the present sovereign as the decimal standard would create a rebellion in every household, and give endless trouble to every baker, butcher, grocer, and draper in the labelling of their saleable goods, and would not give any satisfaction for years.

His system, I think, was based on the farthing.

Mr. MAUGER.—Who is he?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—He is described as a retired head teacher of a large State school—"1st class, Dublin; science certificate, London; chemistry, Melbourne."

Mr. MAUGER.—That ought to be good enough.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It should carry conviction to the mind of my honorable friend. Then Mr. Pinschof, Consul for Austria-Hungary, was called, and his evidence is reported as follows:—

How does the British system of coinage work amongst the continental nations. Have you heard any complaints about it?—No.

Does it work smoothly at present?—I suppose so. There is no difficulty at all.

No difficulty in international commerce?—Not for the foreigners. That is why we do not object to the thing being kept.

So far as our commercial relations with foreign countries are concerned, he sees no necessity for a change. The honorable member for South Sydney has said that if the system proposed by the committee had been in force here, the Minister for Trade and Customs would not have had so many unpleasant tasks to perform. From my short experience of the Customs Department, however, I am able to say that a very considerable number of the mistakes made there are explained by the fact that the varying systems of coinage of other countries have to be taken into account in the transactions of the Department. Varying coinages have to be changed into our money. Now we are asked to add another to the many varying systems by decimalizing our coinage—by adopting a system which would not agree with any of the other systems of decimal coinage with which the Customs clerks have to deal.

Mr. THOMSON.—They agree, in that they are decimal systems.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—They agree only in name. I think the shipping clerks would find it much more difficult to convert the coinage of other countries into the system of decimal coinage proposed by the committee than to convert it into the existing system.

Mr. WATSON.—Not while the sovereign is retained.

Mr. MAUGER.—I think the right honorable gentleman is wrong. He is picking out all the evidence that is against the committee's recommendation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I cannot find very much in favour of it. The chairman of the committee communicated with a large number of institutions, and obtained some replies to his inquiry as to the views which they held on this matter. With the exception of the Consular bodies, nearly the whole of these representative institutions sent answers which are against the proposals contained in the report. Mr. Fenton, the Victorian Government Statist, of course would naturally desire to have the decimal system for his own purposes, but he says—

I am strongly of opinion that Australia should be slow to add another to the already too numerous currency systems of the world, or to depart materially from the system which prevails in the United Kingdom, with which the bulk of our monetary transactions are carried on. But, if a system could be devised for internal purposes, by which the use of current coins of the realm could be used, it would be desirable, and a step in the right direction.

The Chamber of Commerce at Adelaide replied to the inquiry of the committee that in their opinion—

It would not be to the advantage of the commerce of Australia, and it would be a great inconvenience to traders, to adopt a system of coinage different to that which exists in Great Britain.

The Chamber of Commerce at Melbourne said that they agreed with the evidence given by Mr. Turner, which I take it was the statement submitted in writing. The Incorporated Institute of Accountants, from whom one might have expected a favorable reply, said that—

Any change was undesirable, unless as a part of an Empire scheme; and unanimously that any change to a decimal system of coinage would be ineffective and undesirable unless accompanied by the introduction of the metric system in connexion with our weights and measures.

The Brisbane Chamber of Manufactures replied to the committee's inquiry—

That, in the opinion of this Chamber, it is not advisable for the coinage of coin on the decimal system in the Commonwealth of Australia, unless first adopted by Great Britain; at the same time we approve of the coinage of coin in the States of the Commonwealth.

It will thus be seen that the leading commercial institutions expressed the opinion that this change should not take place unless as part of an Empire scheme. Senator Walker, who is also looked upon as an authority, said in regard to this matter—

I think we should certainly wait the decision of the Home Government before adopting the decimal system, while Mr. Teece, the well-known actuary of Sydney, expressed the opinion that—

It would be useless to attempt the introduction of the decimal system unless Great Britain took the lead, as it would lead to great confusion for these States to have a coinage differing from that of Great Britain.

Mr. Swan, member of the Suffolk Bar, Massachusetts, wrote as follows:—

I believe that any decimal system which proposes to proceed by dividing the sovereign into decimal parts and to alter the penny, will place a serious obstacle to the attainment of a desirable international coinage, for the reason that it would imply an invitation to the United States to debase its dollar to the value of only 4s.

No doubt there are many other parts of the evidence to which reference might be made. I have gone carefully through the whole of it; I have read and re-read it with a view of coming, if possible, to the conclusion arrived at by the committee. But the evidence I have read, together with other portions of the evidence given before the committee, has forced me to the conclusion that we should not be justified in making this change, unless for reasons stronger than those which are now put forth. We should not be justified in making it unless we knew that the majority of the people were prepared to put up with the admitted inconvenience which such a system would entail.

Mr. WATSON.—What is the present attitude of the British Government? It was sympathetic.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—According to the last letter on this subject that has been received from them, the Imperial authorities would be averse to this proposal.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS. — They simply said that they did not think the question was ripe for practical consideration.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — The following extract is from a letter sent by the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury in reply to an inquiry whether the question of decimal coinage, or any system of international currency, was engaging, or was likely to engage, the attention of His Majesty's Government :—

In reply, I am to request you to inform Mr. Secretary Chamberlain that, in the opinion of this Board, the difficulties connected with any change of our coinage system are so great that there is no likelihood that the question will engage the attention of His Majesty's Government in a practical way.

Like myself, the Imperial authorities are apparently in sympathy with the movement, but do not think it is so urgent that it should be enforced upon an unwilling people. While I do not think we ought to go to the length of saying that we should have a coinage of our own — a coinage different from that of the mother country — I believe it is well within our province to say that we, as a Parliament, consider that some changes should be made in our system of coinage, and also in our weights and measures system. We might even go the length of urging the British Government to reconsider the question, and see whether a change could not be carried out. I would support a proposal of that kind. I hope that this matter will be fully discussed, both in Parliament and in the press, and then we shall be able to obtain some idea of the general trend of public opinion. Personally I am sympathetically disposed towards the proposal; but while I might use the new system, there are tens of thousands who would not be able to do so with readiness. There are thousands who would be confused and irritated by and who would possibly derive no practical benefit from it. The only real benefit claimed for it, so far as I know, is that it would simplify the keeping of accounts. As against that it seems to me that it would be absolutely necessary for us to keep both the old and new systems in force for many years. The rising generation would have to be taught both systems until the time arrived when the old method might be wholly superseded by the new one. I believe that that time will come. The difficulties would gradually disappear.

Mr. THOMSON. — They disappear in a month when a man goes to the United States.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — My own experience is that people who go to the States do not trouble very much about the system of coinage there. They are told that they have to pay so much, and they pay it without making any calculations as to whether the charge is right or wrong. The evidence given before the committee shows that when the present system was introduced in the United States great difficulty was experienced in preventing people from continuing to use the old methods, while in France some 50 years elapsed before any attempt was made to make the decimal system compulsory. I do not know whether the committee would say that at the end of two years the decimal system should be made compulsory. If such a course were adopted, it would cause a great outburst of public feeling against it, and unless the change were made compulsory many years would elapse before it came to be generally adopted. In these circumstances, I cannot support the adoption of the report. I feel strongly that the system, if adopted, should be brought into operation in conjunction with the metric system of weights and measures, and that, if it could be avoided, it should not be accepted unless as part of an Empire scheme. I, therefore, move, as an amendment—

That all the words after "that," line 1, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words—"in the opinion of this House any change to decimal coinage by Australia should, in order to confer in any great measure the benefits expected from it, be preceded by its adoption in the United Kingdom, and if possible be accompanied by the metric system of weights and measures. That in view of the fact that the time has not, in the judgment of the Government of the United Kingdom, arrived for the substitution of the decimal system for the existing coinage, it would not at present be advisable to initiate the system in the Commonwealth."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Put that into three words, "Yes, Mr. Chamberlain."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — I have already dealt with that old gag, in the absence of my honorable friend. If the honorable member for South Sydney thinks that the course I have suggested would further the object he has in view, I shall have no objection to an amendment of the amendment providing that the Imperial authorities be strongly urged to reconsider the whole matter, and, if possible, to effect a change by adopting a system simpler than that which the committee have brought before us. My sympathies are with the honorable member; but, like those who have had to deal with this matter in Britain, I fear that the advantages would be comparatively few, while the disadvantages to the bulk of our people would be great. I have pointed out the objections raised by the witnesses, in order that the matter may be fully considered. I have an open mind on the subject, and I have been guided only by the evidence which has been put before the committee. Upon that evidence I feel that I cannot support its conclusion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am not at all sure that I can accept the amendment. When the House met this morning the honorable member for South Sydney gave notice of a motion which, I think, covers practically the whole subject dealt with in this amendment, and though that motion is not literally upon the notice-paper at the present time, I think it must be held to be in the possession of the House. If I accept the amendment it will be placed upon the notice-paper, and the motion of the honorable member for South Sydney will also appear there, so that we shall have two notices on the business-paper at the one time dealing with practically the same subject. I ask the Treasurer therefore to let me look again at his amendment, and also at the motion of the honorable member for South Sydney. If upon further consideration I find that they do not conflict, or cover the same ground, both will appear, but if the reverse is the case the motion of the honorable member for South Sydney, having been given notice of first, will be placed upon the notice-paper, and I shall not be able to accept the amendment of the Treasurer.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—If you, sir, come to the conclusion that the amendment and the motion conflict, it will be necessary to omit only that portion of the amendment which refers to the metric system to enable it to be placed upon the business-paper, because the other portion of it does not conflict with the motion of the honorable member for South Sydney. I should like to have the whole amendment placed before honorable members if that can be done, but otherwise I should like only that portion of it to be struck out which conflicts with the motion of which notice has already been given.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am bound to carry out the standing orders, and I cannot, therefore, allow two notices dealing with the one matter in practically the same way to appear on the notice-paper at the one time. If the motion and amendment are in conflict, the latter cannot appear; but if they are not in conflict they will both appear.

Mr. THOMSON.—Will the adoption of the amendment, or its acceptance as an amendment, in any way curtail the discussion on the main question?

Mr. SPEAKER.—In no way.

Debate (on motion by Mr. THOMSON) adjourned.

At a later stage—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have again read the notice of motion of the honorable member for South Sydney, and I see that there is no such conflict between it and the amendment of the Treasurer as will prevent both from appearing upon the notice-paper.

CUSTOMS PROSECUTIONS.

Ordered (on motion by Mr. G. B. EDWARDS)—

That a return be laid upon the table of this House giving, in tabulated form, the under-mentioned particulars of all prosecutions under the Customs Act from the coming into force of the said statute to 30th May last—

- (a) Name and address of defendant.
- (b) Date of hearing.
- (c) The offence charged.
- (d) The amount of duty (if any) involved.
- (e) The penalty (if any) imposed, or the manner in which the case was disposed of.
- (f) The costs (if any) awarded.
- (g) The legal costs (if any) incurred by the Department in such prosecution.

PRIVATE TELEPHONES.

Ordered (on motion by Mr. HARTNOLL.)—

That a return be laid upon the table of the House showing the number of private telephones in each municipal or police district in Tasmania (only excepting the cities of Hobart and Launceston) which have been relinquished since the regulations issued by the Postmaster-General came into force.

House adjourned at 3.37 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 16 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

SERBIAN INSURRECTION.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister if he has received any official information concerning the alleged murder of the King and Queen of Servia by savage military officers? Does he propose to communicate to the Imperial Government the abhorrence of Australia at this brutal crime, and the hope that the murderers will be brought to justice forthwith? Does he intend, in accordance with precedent, to propose a vote of condolence with the relatives of the murdered royalties?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answer to all three questions is No.

DUTY ON WORKS OF ART.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Some trouble having arisen in South Australia with regard to the payment of duty upon a work of art—a statue of the late Sir Thomas Elder—and the matter having been referred to the Minister for Trade and Customs, I should like to ask him if he has arrived at any decision in respect to it?

Mr. KINGSTON.—No; but I will do so speedily. I was advised of the matter only this morning.

NEWSPAPER MISREPRESENTATION.

Mr. FOWLER.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister whether he intends to take notice of the policy of misrepresentation of this Parliament which is being prosecuted so vigorously in this city?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I believe there are in this morning's newspapers reports, which I have not had time to read through, of a meeting which was held in Melbourne last night, and I shall take into consideration the question whether it is necessary to make a counter-blast to what is described to me as a very gross misrepresentation.

APPOINTMENT OF NEW GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Mr. CROUCH.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister if it is true that the name of the Duke of Connaught has been suggested as that of the new Governor-General of Australia? If so, will he take up the position that the Government of Australia must be consulted in regard to any new appointments; and will he give this House an opportunity of considering any proposed appointment?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I cannot say whose name has been mentioned in connexion with this matter, or by whom. Mention has been frequent and various; but no official communication has been made on the subject, either to the Governor-General or to myself. It is hoped that an intimation will be given to this Government before any new appointment is made; but I hesitate to say that the question of such an appointment should be brought before this House before it is sanctioned.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Why "hesitate to say"?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I hesitate to say that it should be brought before the House. I might have no hesitation in saying that it should not.

PAPER.

Sir PHILIP FYSH laid upon the table—

Tasmanian Post and Telegraph Offices—Return to Order dated 2nd October, 1902.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN FEDERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. POYNTON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

When does the Government intend advancing the 6th and 4th classes of South Australian Federal officers who have reached the South Australian State maximum of their class from the intermediate grade salary to an equality with other Federal officers at the maximum of the Commonwealth 5th and 4th classes, and will such advance date from the coming into operation of the Commonwealth Act?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

The remuneration provided under the Commonwealth Public Service Act and the South Australian Public Service Act for the several classes of the clerical division varies in many particulars, and there is no 6th class in the Commonwealth Public Service, while there is in that of South Australia. It is not possible to bring the salaries into accord until after the work performed by each officer has been valued, and the classification of the whole service has been completed. Any changes made can only date from the issue of the classification.

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN RIFLE CLUBS.

Mr. MAHON asked the Minister for Defence, upon notice—

1. Has his attention been drawn to the unnecessary delay experienced by rifle clubs in Western Australia in obtaining from Melbourne the necessary rifles?

2. To obviate such delay in future will he direct that a moderate supply of Martini-Enfield rifles be kept in stock in Perth?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

Rifle clubs in Western Australia have not hitherto been formed under regulations, and rifles have been supplied from Melbourne, where there was a stock on hand. The rifle clubs in Western Australia will be brought under the new rifle club regulations, and arrangements will be made for keeping Martini-Enfeld rifles in stock for sale.

OFFICERS: GENERAL DIVISION.

Mr. HUME COOK asked the Attorney-General, upon notice—

With reference to remarks made by him, as reported on page 2076 of Hannard of last session; what provision has been made for the promotion of officers of the general division who passed State clerical examinations?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows :—

It is intended to declare a specified number of vacancies in the 5th class to be filled by officers who may be found suitable, and who have qualified by passing the State clerical examination.

ENGLISH LETTER RATES.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

Whether it has not been agreed between the British and Commonwealth Governments that letters from England bearing the full postage at the 1d. rate prevailing there shall be received in Australia as sufficiently stamped, and, if so, by what authority are such letters surcharged by the Postal Department of the Commonwealth?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows :—

No such agreement has been arrived at between the British and Commonwealth Governments.

VICTORIAN

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Mr. SALMON asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is the Postmaster-General aware that serious loss and inconvenience are being incurred by residents in the country districts of Victoria owing to the curtailment of postal facilities?

2. Is it a fact that this matter depends on the re-creation of railway services?

3. If so, will the Postmaster-General take means to bring under the notice of the State Premier the urgent need for immediate action in cases where it has been decided to increase the number of trains where it is not necessary to wait until the complete time-table is prepared and adopted?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. The Postmaster-General is aware that inconvenience has been caused to residents in some of the country districts of Victoria owing to the reduced number of mails.

2. The reversion to the former number depends upon the restoration of the railway services.

3. The matter will be brought under the notice of the State Government.

EAGLEHAWK TELEPHONE LINE

Mr. CHAPMAN (for Sir JOHN QUICK) asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether complaints have been received from subscribers to the telephone at Eaglehawk respecting the obstruction to communication with Bendigo, consequent on the operation of the electric tramway which runs adjacent to the telephone wires, and what action is proposed to be taken to restore proper telephone communication between Eaglehawk and Bendigo?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answer to the honorable and learned member's question is as follows :—

Complaints have been received. The matter is under consideration with a view to the adoption of the best means of removing the interference with the telephone wires, and also to ascertain whether in accordance with section 142 of the Post and Telegraph Act 1901, the tramway authorities have adopted all known and reasonable precautions to avoid injurious affection.

COMPILATION OF ELECTORAL ROLLS.

Mr. HUME COOK asked the Minister for Home Affairs, upon notice—

Whether it is true that the police who collected the names for the Federal rolls have not yet been paid; and, if true, when will they be paid?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows :—

I presume the honorable member refers to the Victorian Police. The accounts received from the Commissioner of the Police have now been dealt with, and it is anticipated that the accounts for the eight districts still remaining will be paid before the end of this month.

SUGAR BONUS BILL

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 11th June (vide page 795), on motion by Sir GEORGE TURNER—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—When I moved the adjournment of the debate last Thursday, I did so, not altogether with the object of affording myself an opportunity to speak upon the Bill, but in order that the promise of the Treasurer might be carried into effect, and that other honorable members, some of whom had left for their own States, might have an opportunity of discussing the measure at its second-reading stage, as I knew they desired to do. However, being called upon now, I will say what little I have to say on the matter at once. It seems to me, after a perusal of the figures put before us by the Treasurer, that there are only three adoptable means for arriving at an Inter-State settlement in connexion with the rebate which this Parliament has decided shall be given upon sugar grown by white labour. The first of these means is the adoption of the production basis, under which each producing State would be debited with the whole amount of the rebate paid on the quantity of white grown sugar which it produced. I think it will be recognised at once that such an arrangement would be unfair to Queensland, and to New South Wales, or to any other producing State. Furthermore, in dealing with this matter, we must not confine our attention to the present producers, because the Excise Tariff Bill provides for the granting of a rebate upon beet sugar grown by white labour, and at some future time beet sugar may be produced in States which are not now affected by our decision. If the amount of sugar produced were taken as the basis upon which rebate should be charged, this is what would happen. If the excise were to be collected as it is at the present time, and the consuming States got credit for it, while the producing State was debited with the amount paid for rebate, certain States would be getting £3 a ton upon the sugar consumed by them and grown in Queensland or New South Wales, while the two producing States would be paying £2 a ton in rebate upon that sugar. But if the adjustment were not made in that manner, and the rebate were simply debited to the producing State, on the amount of sugar produced by white labour, then, if the quantity of sugar so produced in Queensland increases, as it was anticipated by those who supported the arrangement in the first place that it would increase, that State may be called upon to pay £200,000 or £300,000 in support of the policy adopted by Parliament to procure a white Australia. I do not think Queensland could afford to make such a sacrifice for the Commonwealth. Thesecond method of adjustment would be upon the basis of consumption, and if I could see a reasonable way of adopting that method, I should be inclined to advocate it. We now credit the States with the amount of the duties collected upon the goods which they consume, and if it were possible to do so, I think it would be in keeping with that system to debit them with any rebate of duties upon such goods. But that would be very difficult. In the first place, as the Treasurer has pointed out, it is very hard to trace white grown sugar after it has left the State in which it was produced. Some of it leaves that State in an unrefined condition, and enters the refineries of another State, is frequently mixed with black-grown sugar, and is then transferred to other States, where its origin is absolutely untraceable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It cannot be traced after it goes to the mills.

Mr. THOMSON.—Quite so; there is no distinction between the two classes of sugar, and it is therefore impossible, without hampering trade operations to an extent that would be very undesirable, to trace the source from which the sugar comes when it reaches the ultimate point of delivery. There is also this consideration to be taken into account. Any State, by arrangement with its refiners, could decide which other States would have to pay the rebate on the white-grown sugar. It is perfectly certain that if New South Wales or Queensland found that by consuming their own white-grown sugar, they were losing the £2 per ton rebate, they would try to come to an understanding with the refiners that the white-grown sugar produced by them should be used to supply the requirements of other States, which would, therefore, lose the £2 per ton. If the sugar-producing States did not take any such step it would be still more objectionable to leave the refiners to decide which States should pay the rebate. I should hesitate to give to any firm or company the decision of such a question, and yet this would be the result if we adopted the consumption basis of adjustment. If it could be proved that those who consumed the sugar received an advantage of £2 per ton in the price they were called upon to pay, no adjustment would be necessary, because the £2 paid in the form of rebate would be balanced by the reduction in price. But the weakness of the protectionist argument in regard to the operation of duties is shown most distinctly in the application now being made to the House for a different method of adjustment. It is quite evident that the price of sugar in each State is regulated, except to the extent of a slight shade of difference, by the cost at which similar sugar from abroad can be landed, duty paid. There is practically no difference in the price charged in the different States, because refined sugar from abroad can be landed in almost every one of them at the same price.

Mr. WATSON.—That only applies to conditions in which the production does not overtake the demand.

Mr. THOMSON.—The honorable member has anticipated what I intended to add. Any one in favour of protective duties would say that the present production of sugar is much below the requirements of the Commonwealth, and that different results will follow when local consumption is overtaken; that as soon as the local production rises to an export level the price will come down to the value of the article for the purposes of export. It has been proved, however—for the sugar industry is not a new one—that cane sugar cannot be grown here at a profit in open competition with the imported article. When locally-grown sugar is exposed to free competition with sugar from abroad, and has to come down to world prices, production is immediately checked. We cannot escape this fact in connexion with our sugar industry. On the other hand, when this check operates, and as soon as the production drops to any degree below the requirements of the Commonwealth, the price of the local article immediately rises to the value of the imported sugar after payment of the duty.

Mr. WATSON.—That has not been proved with regard to white-grown sugar.

Mr. THOMSON.—If it is necessary to give a rebate of £2 per ton in order to encourage the employment of white labour in sugar growing, and it is considered desirable that all sugar should be grown by white labour, that affords sufficient proof that local growers cannot compete with the black-grown sugar produced in other countries.

Mr. WATSON.—The rebate is intended simply to enable the growers to get over the transition period.

Mr. THOMSON.—I do not think that the difficulty will be felt during the transition period only. I do not suppose that the honorable member for Bland believes that after the transition period has passed we shall be able to grow sugar with white labour in free competition with the imported article.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I wish to point out that the only question raised by the Bill under discussion is whether the sugar rebate shall be charged to the States in one way or another. The fiscal question, or the desirability or otherwise of the white Australia policy, or any matters connected with either of these two questions, are not raised, and therefore I could not permit the discussion of them under the Bill.

Mr. THOMSON.—I should not seek knowingly to raise a question that is not in order, but I wish to point out that I am introducing this matter in a way that makes it entirely relevant to the point at issue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I waited for some time in order to ascertain the trend of the honorable member's remarks.

Mr. THOMSON.—What I said was that if it could be shown that by the protection given under the Tariff the internal price of sugar would be reduced by £2 per ton, there would be no necessity for an adjustment, because the rebate the consumer would be called upon to pay would be balanced by the reduction in price.

Mr. SPEAKER.—So far as the honorable member was proceeding on those lines, of course, I raised no objection.

Mr. THOMSON.—Continuing that line of argument, I submit, with all due deference to you, Mr. Speaker, that I had to show that it was not likely that such a result would follow. However, I only wish to point out, further, that we are at present losing through the excise duty and the rebates, as compared with the import duty, £336,000 per annum. If the excise duty, and consequently the rebate, are removed in 1907, and only white-grown sugar is produced and consumed in Australia, we shall then lose an additional £787,000, or in all £1,123,000 annually, representing a capital value of £22,460,000, at 5 per cent. That is a tremendous price to pay for the industry. However, I shall now leave that branch of the subject. Coming back to the other argument, which I was at first inclined to favour, that New South Wales and Queensland would gain an undue advantage under the arrangement proposed. I find there is no such advantage.

Mr. CONROY.—That might apply to this year, but not to subsequent years.

Mr. THOMSON.—The amount might vary, because, of course, the more production there is the greater equality there will be. Admittedly, refined sugar produced within the Commonwealth is sold at practically an equal price in all the States, because, as I have already pointed out, the price is influenced by the cost at which refined sugar can be introduced from abroad. The result, therefore, would be, that the consumers in any one or more producing States would get an advantage if the amount of duty paid into their States Treasuries per ton of sugar consumed under the new arrangement were out of proportion to the amounts realized in other States. I find that, according to the Treasurer's figures, the duty realized upon the sugar consumed in the Commonwealth averages £4 2s. per ton. This includes the consumption of both home-grown and imported sugars.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Is that with or without the rebate?

Mr. THOMSON.—That is after each State has been debited with its share of the bonus. The actual amount left in the New South Wales Treasury after its share of the bonus has been paid is £3 3s.; in Victoria, £5 5s.; in Queensland, £2 15s.; in South Australia, £5 12s.; in Western Australia, £4 17s.; and in Tasmania, £3 19s. per ton. These will be the amounts left in the Treasuries of the various States under the proposal of the Treasurer.

Mr. GLYNN.—Or, rather, under the Excise Act as well.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes; under the adjustment proposed, and under the Customs Duties Act and the Excise Act.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Of course, those amounts may vary next year.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes, of course; according to the amount of sugar produced. But I do not think that the figures I have given will vary very much if the production is the same, because the growers of New South Wales and Queensland sugar naturally seek their nearest markets, unless they are forced to the other States, in order to make those States pay the rebate.

Mr. FISHER.—That could be done by arrangement.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes, as I pointed out before. The consumers of sugar in all these States will pay the same price for what they use, and will receive in revenue the varying amounts which I have mentioned. That being the case, it will be seen that New South Wales and Queensland will still be at a disadvantage even if this Bill becomes law. Under these conditions, I see no other course than to accept the proposal of the Treasurer. I do this reluctantly, because I should have preferred to fix the payment of the rebate on a consumption basis, and because the rebate will, under the proposed arrangement, become a bonus; and I object to bonuses. Of course, I am aware that another proposal has been made, which practically amounts to a distribution of the payment upon the basis of consumption. It has been suggested that instead of granting any rebate or bonus, we should levy an excise duty of £1 per ton upon sugar grown by white labour, and impose an excise of £3 per ton upon that produced by black labour. That, however, amounts to the same thing as the payment of the rebate upon the basis of consumption.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That proposal is impracticable. We cannot levy an excise duty until the sugar has actually been produced.

Mr. THOMSON.—I know there are some objections which can be urged to that proposal, inasmuch as it would be difficult to decide where the sugar is consumed. For instance, Queensland and New South Wales would be induced to export their white grown sugar—upon which they would receive an excise duty of only £1 per ton if it were consumed within their own borders—to the other States, whilst they would consume the sugar produced by black labour which would return them £3 per ton.

Mr. FISHER.—Quite right.

Mr. THOMSON.—No doubt it would be right if the law permitted that practice to be adopted. But I object to a system which would allow that course to be pursued, and therefore I will support the proposal which the Treasurer has embodied in this Bill.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—I take it, sir, that you have ruled that in your opinion—which of course controls the situation—the matter before the House does not involve the important question of a white Australia, or of the extent to which the legislation of last session has proved beneficial; but that it is purely a question of whether this is a State or a national matter. Am I right thus far?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I certainly have not ruled, nor should I rule, that the question before the House is one of whether this is a national or a State matter. I merely called attention to the scope of the Bill, and intimated that I should be obliged to rule throughout that in discussing it honorable members must not go beyond its scope.

Mr. EWING.—This matter originated in a protest from the Premiers of New South Wales and Queensland against the method adopted by the Customs Department for the payment of the sugar rebate. Stripped of all technicality, it is perfectly clear that, had the original proposal of the Government been persevered in the payment of that rebate to secure a white Australia would have partaken of the nature rather of a State matter than of a national one. It is now proposed to pay the rebate out of the consolidated revenue upon a population basis. I wish to direct the attention of honorable members purely to that aspect of the case. The honorable member for North Sydney made a reference to the similarity which exists between the consumption of sugar by the States throughout Australia. But I would point out that the consumption per head of the different States varies very considerably. It is remarkable—possibly honorable members may be able to furnish their own explanations for the difference which obtains—that whilst New South Wales consumes 107 lbs. per head, the consumption in Victoria is only 93 lbs. per head, whilst in Queensland it is 123 lbs. per head.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Those figures are merely the result of guess-work. The States deducted from their total production the quantities exported, and concluded that they had consumed the balance.

Mr. EWING.—The figures which I am quoting are taken from Coghlan. South Australia consumes 100 lbs. of sugar per head of the population, Western Australia 114 lbs., and Tasmania 90 lbs. The mean consumption of the Commonwealth, therefore, is 103 lbs. Honorable members will observe that, at first sight, these variations appear somewhat remarkable. But they are not difficult of explanation, although, in deference to Mr. Speaker's ruling, I must not attempt to furnish that explanation. It will be noted that in Tasmania the quantity of sugar used falls 10 per cent. below the mean consumption, whilst in Queensland it is 20 per cent. above it. If, therefore, it is conceded that this is a national, and not a State matter, it would not be possible to secure a more satisfactory method for distributing the rebate than that which is proposed under the Bill. Let us turn to another aspect of the case. Every honorable member is familiar with the population of the various States. In New South Wales it numbers 1,350,000, in Victoria 1,200,000, in Queensland 500,000, in South Australia 360,000, in Western Australia 180,000, and in Tasmania, approximately, 180,000, making a total of 3,800,000. The annual consumption of sugar within the Commonwealth is 177,000 tons. If, as the honorable member for North Sydney mentioned, the States paid an import duty of £6 per ton upon their total consumption, the revenue thus derived—assuming that no sugar were produced in Australia—would be approximately £1,100,000. I ask honorable members to note the enigmas connected with the sugar trade which are brought about by the overseas trade, by the contiguity of the producing States, by production, and the presence of refineries. If Australia received the revenue I have indicated from the sugar required for its own consumption, and that revenue were distributed amongst the States in proportion to their population, the New South Wales Treasury would benefit approximately by £390,000; that of Victoria by £360,000; Queensland by £150,000; South Australia by £108,000; Western Australia by £54,000; and Tasmania by £54,000. That is how the figures would work out, approximately, assuming that none of the States were producing sugar, but all were importing it from abroad. I am leaving out of consideration what may be termed the "accidents" of trade. But what is the present position? Instead of receiving these amounts the revenue upon imported sugar benefits the New South Wales Treasury by only £66,000, instead of £390,000; Victoria by £282,000, instead of £360,000; Queensland by £6,000, instead of £150,000; South Australia by £96,000, instead of £108,000; Western Australia by £42,000, instead of £54,000; and Tasmania by £21,000, instead of £54,000. Honorable members must see at once that, if there were no sugar produced in Australia,

New South Wales would receive £390,000 as revenue from that source, and Victoria £360,000; whereas New South Wales receives only £66,000, and Victoria £282,000. These facts conclusively prove that this is a special matter, and one which requires special consideration. Let us take the case of one State as an example. I have seen it asserted by a South Australian that this is purely a State matter, and that the Commonwealth has no right to pay the sugar rebate out of the consolidated revenue. That statement was made by a representative of a State which—although its population is one third less than that of Queensland—receives a revenue of £96,000 from imported sugar as against £6,000 received by Queensland from that source. Yet, despite the great disadvantage under which the Treasury of Queensland is placed in regard to import duties, that State is coolly informed that the payment of the sugar rebate is purely a Queensland matter, and should not have come before this Parliament. Regarding that phase of the question, I submit that this never could have been a State matter. The whole question of the rebate is controlled—and the payment of a bonus, also, must ever be controlled—by the Commonwealth Parliament. The action which the Treasurer has taken is the only one possible under the provisions of the Constitution. If a High Court had been in existence, the right honorable gentleman could not have saddled the sugar-producing States—and that would have been the result of the action previously contemplated by him—with more than their fair share of the payment of the rebate upon the basis of population. To me that point appears perfectly clear. Sub-section (3) of section 51 of the Constitution says that the Parliament shall have power to make laws "with respect to bounties on the production or export of goods, but so that such bounties shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth." The power to pay these bounties, therefore, is specifically taken away from the States. All the States must be treated upon an absolute equality. Had the Treasurer—influenced by any of the States—been sufficiently mean to suggest that the payment involved was a State and not a national obligation, it would have been speedily ruled that such was not the case.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member think that the States which produce the sugar should alone bear the burden of the payment of the rebate?

Mr. EWING.—I am endeavouring to deal with that aspect of the case. I have already pointed out that under the Constitution all power in connexion with this matter has been taken from the States. When the people of the Commonwealth approved of the Constitution, they approved of a Constitution which makes it clear that all bonuses or rebates must be paid by the Commonwealth Government and not by the States. Any attempt to saddle any State with special responsibility in connexion therewith must be constitutionally wrong. I hope that the honorable and learned member grasps that point.

Mr. CONROY.—That being the case, why did the honorable member support the original proposal of the Government?

Mr. EWING.—The question then involved was one of whether any rebate should be paid. I supported that proposal in the first instance, because I believed—as I still believe—that it was the right policy to adopt. But this is a question of the method in which the payment shall be made. It is a question of whether the burden shall be distributed upon a national or State basis.

Mr. CONROY.—Over twelve months ago the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and myself pointed out the trouble that was bound to ensue.

Mr. EWING.—Some people are under the impression that New South Wales has had nothing to do in order to obtain the payment of this rebate, but that State is as much concerned in the matter, in proportion to the area of land under cultivation with sugar-cane, as is Queensland. According to the number of acres under cultivation with sugar-cane, the number of coloured men employed in Queensland is 1 to 8·7, and in New South Wales it is about 1 to 8·8. The New South Wales people therefore on the face of it would appear to have as much to do with this matter as the Queenslanders.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—With black labour?

Mr. EWING.—In proportion to area under cultivation we had, and that is sometimes forgotten.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Then both deserve to be punished.

Mr. EWING.—And we are being punished. That is exactly the position. The Federal Parliament informs the sugar grower that he must use white labour, that he must substitute for the kanaka, costing 2s. 4½d. a day, white labour. That is the mandate of the Federal Parliament, and we have said to the grower of sugar with white labour that if he does that we will give him a rebate. The growers of sugar are very much concerned in the matter, so much concerned, indeed, that some people engaged in the industry in the State of Queensland protest very loudly that the proposals which have been made will ruin the industry. It must be remembered therefore that the sugar-growers are not getting this rebate for nothing. The mandate of the Federal Parliament is that they must get rid of black labour, and that the people of Australia are willing to aid them in doing so.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes; we say to them —“We give you a protection of £6 per ton to get rid of it.”

Mr. EWING. — When the honorable member refers me to the duty of £6 per ton upon sugar, I may be permitted to mention that with the exception of starch, sugar is the only article in ordinary use upon which we have thought fit to impose an excise duty. We have an import duty of £6 per ton, with an excise duty of £3 per ton, and, therefore, at best, it can be considered a protection of only £3 per ton. The giving of a bonus where white labour is substituted for black puts a different aspect upon the case altogether. Though we have informed the sugar-growers that they must get rid of black labour, there is still a considerable difference of opinion as to this proposal. What does it amount to? According to the Treasurer's figures, it amounts to 3d. per head of the population. From one aspect of the case, the re-adjustment proposed might be said to be effected at a cost of 1¼d. per head, but I prefer to set the amount down at 3d. That is the price that the people of Australia are called upon to pay.

Mr. GLYNN.—To-day; not next year.

Mr. EWING.—We are dealing only with to-day. The honorable and learned member and myself might not be here next year. Any prophesy with regard to this question involves an “if” or an “about”. We have certain figures before us, and they are the only figures to which we can direct the attention of honorable members as having the significance of facts. The proposal will mean about 3d. per head of the population of the Commonwealth. In dealing with the question whether this is a State or a national question, I would ask what it is proposed that this bonus should be given for? The honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, will grant that it is given for the substitution of Australian workmen for alien workmen. I have no desire now to discuss the protective policy at large, but when that policy was before us for discussion, what was the basis of the whole of the arguments submitted in support of that policy? Was it not that it was intended to substitute the work of Australian workmen for that of the workmen in other parts of the world? Is that a State or national matter? Honorable members know that we never asked whether certain industries were established at Footscray or Hobart. Possibly, with the one exception of the salt industry, no one ever asked where any industry was carried on. We regarded the question as a national one, and protective duties were agreed to in order to secure the substitution of Australian for foreign labour. The same argument applies in this case. When the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, voted for protective duties, he did so with that end in view. He agreed that it was a national matter, and that it should be our object to establish Australian workmen here, and to do away with the work of the alien and the foreigner. I heard the honorable member say those or similar words over and over again. This matter of the sugar bonus is in exactly the same category. The imposition of protective duties was a national matter, and this is a national matter, for the object sought is the substitution of white labour for alien and foreign labour. If the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, justifies protection from the stand-point of labour, he must give his vote for this proposal.

Mr. McDONALD.—Is the honorable member going to vote for it?

Mr. EWING.—I am inclined to think that that might have been clear even to the honorable member for Kennedy. I have no doubt that every honorable member in this House, when he next appeals to his constituents, will point out that he has assisted in a great national work in taking a forward step for the attainment of the white Australia policy.

Mr. CAMERON.—Every honorable member will not.

Mr. EWING.—Every honorable member ought to do so. I believe that every honorable member ought to hold that view. I am justified in making the statement that every representative of any portion of the Australian people will feel that he has done a great national work in purging various portions of Australia from black labour. If that be so, if the action taken has been national, and if it has been taken in compliance with a mandate from our constituents that was also national, how can any one now contend that this is a matter for the States? How can it be contended that we should accept the honour and the prestige that comes from honour, and refuse to accept the responsibility? If this is a national matter the nation, and not particular States, must pay for it. The whole idea of federation from the first has been the destruction of small State interests, and the establishment of a national ideal, the building up of something approaching responsibility, not to a particular State, but to the whole continent. If this be not a case in which we get far beyond State responsibility, and if it be not a case in which the nation is interested as a nation, then no such case has yet existed. I believe that morally the Treasurer has done the only thing he could have done, and I believe that, constitutionally, no other course was open to him. I shall, therefore, be prepared to support the proposal now before us.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I desire to say that usually in financial matters I am only too glad to follow the Treasurer. In view of the position which the right honorable gentleman has held in the past in Victoria, and which he holds in this House, and speaking for myself as a supporter of the Ministry of which he is a member, I am usually only too ready to follow his lead, feeling that the right honorable gentleman will do his best not only for Australia, but for his own State. But, in bringing this Bill forward, I think that the Government and the Treasurer have for the first time raised the question of State rights. And in dealing with the question they are not looking to the rights of the four States who have to pay, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Western Australia, so much as to the State rights and privileges, as I think I may call them, of the State of New South Wales. When we remember that New South Wales has really done her best on every occasion to thwart the wishes of the whole of the rest of Australia, and that the cry of the leader of the Opposition, when he was trying to defeat the Commonwealth Bill, was that the other wretched insolvent States of Australia were going to ruin New South Wales, it is very strange to find that that State under the Treasurer's proposal will receive some £22,758. The representatives of that State come to us and the Premier of New South Wales tells us that he requires that Victoria shall pay to New South Wales some £16,286; South Australia, £5,658; Queensland, £862; and Western Australia £846. That is surely a complete reversal of the position as it has been previously stated to us. When we remember that this rebate of £2 per ton upon sugar is, under the Braddon sections of the Constitution, to be paid to the New South Wales Treasurer, it is all the more remarkable that this Bill should have been brought forward at all. It is now proposed to alter the Tariff schedule in such a way that the whole of the amount paid in rebate, upon sugar grown by white labour, shall be paid by the whole of the people of Australia upon a population basis. I desire to point out to honorable members that for years before the establishment of federation, Victoria had pursued a strong Australian policy. Without bringing the matter into a Commonwealth balance-sheet, and asking that the whole of the Commonwealth should pay for it, Victoria for years before federation supported Australian grown sugar by taxing her own people. We imposed a duty of £12 per ton upon all beet sugar coming from the continent of Europe.

Mr. CONROY.—It was grown by white labour.

Mr. CROUCH.—Cane sugar was imported at a duty of £6 per ton only, the desire being to encourage the growth of sugar by white labour in Queensland. Victoria at no time asked for any consideration for this action. The first movement in that direction comes very strangely from New South Wales, which State is to get the whole of the benefit of the rebate paid to growers in that State. New South Wales comes to the other States, who were said by its leaders to be almost insolvent before federation, and is the first to ask that the Commonwealth shall return money collected under the Tariff to the State of New South Wales. The Treasurer has pointed out that a large amount of sugar consumed in Victoria is imported, and upon that sugar there is imposed a duty of £6 per ton. Who pays that duty? The honorable member for North Sydney says that it is the foreigner, but I think it is the Victorian people who pay it. If the Victorian people continue to import sugar, they will have to pay this £6 per ton duty upon it, in addition to the rebate we are here being asked to pay to the New South Wales Treasurer. The Treasurer stated the other day that he looks upon last year as a phenomenal one, and considers that afterwards the importations will not be so large. If, however, the people of Victoria do not import sugar, the State will lose the revenue to be derived from the duty of £6 per ton, and which is very necessary in the present condition of Victorian State finances. I am speaking particularly of Victoria, but this applies equally to South Australia and Western Australia. We must lose that revenue, and at the same time we must continue to pay rebate to the growers of sugar by white labour on the Richmond River, in New South Wales. This, in my opinion, is unfair. I think that if Victoria chooses to pay £6 per ton on sugar through the Customs, that is quite enough to ask the people of that State to pay.

MR. MAUGER.—Have we federated?

MR. CROUCH.—We have federated. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports need not think that I am not speaking from a Commonwealth stand-point.

MR. MAUGER.—The honorable and learned member is speaking from a very narrow stand-point.

MR. CROUCH.—Indeed I am not. I do not think this is a fair proposal so long as that section exists by which duties that are collected in one State have to be credited to that State. While that lasts, we cannot regard the Commonwealth as an entity, but as departments. The section has an effect on the State revenues, and I think an injustice is being done to Victoria, Queensland, and Western Australia in the matter. There is another way in which Victoria, and I suppose every other State, would have an equal claim on the Commonwealth. The claim of New South Wales is that because a certain policy has been adopted—that of paying higher wages to white men—therefore the Commonwealth should come to its rescue.

In Victoria we have a whisky and brandy distillery, which is compelled to pay a higher rate of wages than is paid in the other States. Because we have approved of high wages being paid, are we, then, to refund to the distillers the excise duty which they have to pay to this State? The position would be exactly the same. Because we are approving of a certain policy, we are trying to override a policy which the Commonwealth has adopted, and a position which is asserted in the Constitution Act, which I do not think we can override. We have the statement from the Treasurer that next year Victoria will not import so much.

SIR GEORGE TURNER.—I cannot tell that yet.

MR. CROUCH.—If there was one argument that ran through the speech of the Treasurer it was that this was a phenomenal year. Referring to Victoria and New South Wales he said—

It has been the good fortune of these two States to receive a very large amount of revenue from imported sugar, an amount far more than I anticipated, and much in excess of that which will probably be derived from the same source in ordinary years.

I take it that when he made that statement he knew what he was talking about, and that next year Victoria will not import so much sugar.

SIR GEORGE TURNER.—It all depends upon what Queensland produces.

MR. CROUCH.—Yes. If Victoria does not import so much sugar, then it means that it will have less revenue from that source. I am speaking of Victoria only; but I might say that all the States except New South Wales will import less sugar, with the consequence that they will get less revenue; that more imported sugar may go to New South Wales, and yet all the time, although we are suffering this loss of revenue, we are paying a yearly increasing amount of rebate to that State. That means that all the other States will get no increase in revenue, but will have to pay the rebate. There is another point which, I think, ought to be considered—that it is a far better thing to have white men in the State than black men. That is admitted by the fact of a white Australia policy having been adopted. A white man uses far more taxable articles than does a black man.

MR. L. E. GROOM.—Is that the honorable and learned member's only reason?

Mr. CROUCH.—That is one reason, and it is the only reason I wish to use now. If there are a number of white men where previously black men were employed—and that is what the rebate has done for New South Wales—it means that those white men will use far more taxable articles than were previously used, and, although New South Wales may lose upon the rebate which she has to pay to white men, it will get customs duties from the articles which will have to be imported to supply those men, and which black men would not use. For instance, although white men use whisky, black men will not use so much.

Mr. McDONALD.—Will they not? It kills them a little more quickly.

Mr. CROUCH.—In view of the experience of my honorable friend, I will say that the black men use only as much whisky as their wages will permit; that their wages are not so large as are those of white people, and that, therefore, they cannot use so much whisky as white people do. Although the State may lose slightly through the rebate, it will get a large advantage from the use by white men of taxable articles. Yet we are proposing to pay a rebate equal to that which was paid last year on white-grown sugar—£36,000. I am sorry I cannot agree with the Treasurer. If the Commonwealth pools the rebate, it should pool the imports. The Treasurer knows that he cannot do that under the Constitution Act.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Do not ask me to do that in the interests of Victoria.

Mr. CROUCH.—I think it is a fair thing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am afraid that my honorable and learned friend has not seen the figures. I can give them to him if he likes.

Mr. CROUCH.—There is no need for the figures to be given. If we are to look at this question from a Commonwealth standpoint on one side, we must look at it from the same standpoint on the other side. It does not matter to me whether Victoria loses or gains, so long as it is fairly treated all round. It does not matter to me if South Australia, Western Australia, and Queensland gain so long as they are treated fairly in both directions. But if New South Wales is to get the rebate she should also throw into a common pool the revenue which she receives from the importation of sugar. That is the only way in which it is possible to meet this position fairly. These facts have been missed in the previous discussion. Strong advocates of the Bill have submitted their views, and, although, of course, I would not vote against the second reading, I think that the views I have expressed should be considered by honorable members. I trust that the Treasurer will be able to show that he has weighed these matters, and is dealing fairly, not only with the Richmond River district of New South Wales, but with the rest of the Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).

—On this occasion the Opposition are, I hope, going to assist the Government out of a mess which they have got themselves into in some inexplicable way, to which I need not refer. We passed a Bill which provided that this matter should be dealt with by way of a rebate, and then it dawned upon Ministers that there was no possible way to pay the rebate, as, indeed, I think, was obvious enough, inasmuch as it was not possible to them to hand back £2 out of the £3 per ton levied by way of excise without infringing the Constitution. We are now asked to do this thing by way of a bonus, the cost of which is to be cast on the States without regard to the extent to which they consume black-grown or white-grown sugar. We, on this side, recognise that this is a price which the various States have to pay for a white Australia, and which can only be paid, as the honorable member for North Sydney has said, equitably by being paid ratably at so much per head. We have to pay this as the price for a white Australia, not, I hope, the sort of white Australia which the last speaker referred to—a white Australia which was to be encouraged by imposing a duty of £12 per ton on white-grown sugar, and a duty of £6 per ton on sugar produced by coloured labour. That is what the honorable and learned member proposed as a splendid way of facilitating the white labour movement. I heard from him, as I have heard from other members, some curious things about that section in the Constitution with which my name is associated. I have heard all sorts of things said about that section—that it prevented this thing and the other thing from being done. The Prime Minister has himself said a great many things of that sort, casting the blame and the odium, if there is any, on that unfortunate provision. The honorable and learned member for Corio seems to have found that under the section it is impossible to pay this bonus on sugar. There is nothing in the section which prevents the expenditure of the Customs revenue in any direction whatever. All it does is to limit the amount of expenditure within the bounds therein laid down. I presume that the Treasurer has not at his disposal funds to meet this charge out of one-fourth of the net revenue?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Ample funds.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I am glad to hear that at the present time there will be ample funds.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I could spend another million and a half without running against the section, I think.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—That is so at present, but can the right honorable and learned gentleman say that will be so while the production of white-grown sugar increases, and proportionately the consumption of black-grown imported sugar decreases?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—During the currency of this Bill I should think there is no doubt that it would be so.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—All I can say is that the honorable and learned gentleman is very hopeful.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—He is never very sanguine.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I am afraid that the honorable and learned gentleman is not sanguine in the right direction. He ought to be hopeful that there will be that increase in the local production of sugar for local consumption.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—If produced at all, it will be only a fourth, and that would not be more than £250,000 at the very outside.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—That will be considerably more than the cost of that glass of beer we have heard of to the unfortunate taxpayer. It is impossible to put away the idea that this bonus is in some sort a direct tax. It is the principle, I believe, of the Ministry that they will not go in for any direct form of taxation. There is nothing in the Constitution to prevent their doing so. They can impose any direct tax they choose provided that it is the same for every portion of the Commonwealth. We are now come to this unfortunate necessity of imposing a direct tax which will be in the form of a small poll tax. I can only regret that the necessity has arisen—a necessity for which Tasmania among other States will have to pay—and that we shall have to pay more and more as the time goes on. But there is, apparently, no hope of extraction from the difficulty without passing this measure; and I can only add that it is my intention to support it.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Possibly I may be required to explain why I should assent to a measure which involves a sacrifice of £5,658 a year to South Australia. But I look upon the matter involved as a Federal one. Though I object to the surrender of the excise in 1907 as entailing an enormous price for the policy of a white Australia—I voted for the principle, but I object to the price to be paid—yet I do not look upon this as a matter to which that consideration applies. What we now have to consider is a fair method of apportioning the rebate which, until the year 1907, is granted. After considering the matter carefully, I cannot see how it can be done in any other way except by an apportionment per head of population. We must look upon it from a federal point of view. We cannot say, because Queensland and New South Wales are the only States affected by the sugar question—they will benefit by £61,267 this year by way of rebates—that they shall pay the full amount themselves. That would be an absurd position. We cannot segregate States and say that because the policy of a white Australia directly affects only two, those must be the only States which pay for that policy. We are bound, as this is a Federal matter, however obnoxious the principle may be, to deal with it per head of population. At the same time I think that South Australia cannot complain that the Government made a mistake in her favour in their original Bill. The only true method upon which this matter could have been decided was to make the import duty and the excise duty exactly the same during the period between now and the year 1907. I think that honorable members will agree with me upon that point if they consider the matter a little. The difficulty at present is this, as has been pointed out by the Treasurer and the honorable member for North Sydney: South Australia gets credit for £6 per ton on all her consumption of sugar, except about 500 tons. New South Wales gets credit for about £3 3s. or £3 4s., without taking into consideration the amount of the rebate. The honorable member for North Sydney said that the amount for which New South Wales gets credit is about £3 3s. per ton after having credited the rebate. But at the present time, as we do not take this into account, probably New South Wales gets credit on her consumption for more than £3 3s. per ton. We in South Australia get credit for about £6 per ton. But we shall under this Bill get credit for £5 12s., although the average credit for the States is £4 2s. That is to say, we shall get credit for about 30s. more than the average credit for the States, while New South Wales will get credit for about 25s. under that average. So that, although South Australia really hands over something like £5,658 this year, it must not be forgotten that owing to the way the Government—I will not say made a mess of the matter originally but led us into a difficulty, we in South Australia are getting something like £30,000 or £40,000 a year from sugar more than we should have done under the old conditions. Our revenue from sugar only averaged about £54,000 a year, and we are getting £96,000 this year, simply because we are getting the full rate, while the other States only get on an average £4 2s. per ton. The whole difficulty would have been got over had the Government proposed that the excise duty should be £6 per ton, when the import duty was fixed at £6 per ton, and had they granted a bonus on the production of sugar by white labour. There would have been no necessity to follow up the sugar when once it left the factory. All that the Treasurer had to say was—"Here is the sugar produced by white labour; we give you a bonus of £5 per ton for its production," which amount would be equivalent to the rebate of £2 per ton on an excise of £3, and would be perfectly uniform, inasmuch as New South Wales would get credit for £6 per ton on her total consumption, Victoria would get credit for £6 per ton, and South Australia and the other States would also get credit for £6 per ton, while the bonus expenditure would be debited per capita. We should not then have had the ridiculous position of South Australia being credited with £6 per ton, whilst the other States on an average were credited with £4 2s. The difficulty that has been created was caused by the mistake made by the Government in their leadership of the House, and it is our duty to help them to get out of the muddle. Although I am strongly opposed to the proposed abolition of the excise in 1907—which is a matter for future consideration—still, to adjust the matter in the meantime, I shall vote for this Bill. At the present time I believe that the States are entitled, on the basis of consumption, to receive amounts which the Treasurer holds for them in trust. He was bound under the Constitution to pay them this money from month to month. That is clear under section 89, which says—

The Commonwealth shall pay to each State month by month the balance, if any, in favour of the State.

But what has the Treasurer done? Instead of paying the States month by month, as the Constitution prescribes, their surplus of the sugar duties collected according to consumption throughout the States, he has kept the money in hand, and has asked us to revise the Tariff which Parliament passed. After two years, he is asking us to cancel the constitutional duty which he found he was unable to perform, because it was unfair. That is a bad principle to adopt. This is really ex post facto legislation. We are all to some extent responsible in not having made the legislation in question satisfactory, but still it is a bad thing for this Parliament to pass an Act which is retrospective to the extent of eighteen months in regard to money which ought to have been allotted from month to month, which belongs to the States, which is held in trust for them by the Treasurer, and which, under the Constitution, he ought to have paid over to them. But under all the circumstances I consider that it is my duty to vote for the Bill.

Mr. CLARKE (Cowper).—As far as the object of this Bill is concerned I do not wish to say very much, except that I believe it was the idea of most honorable members when we gave legislative effect to the principle of the payment of rebate under the Excise Act that the rebate would be borne by the whole Commonwealth. At any rate, several honorable members to whom I have spoken have expressed that view, and I myself certainly thought that the rebate would be a charge upon the whole Commonwealth, and not upon the two States of Queensland and New South Wales. But it seems, from the technical or constitutional reasons that have been given, that this cannot be done, and looking at the question in the broadest possible way from the stand-point of one who is in favour of the principle of a white Australia, I think that the House will be in agreement with the principle underlying this measure. What I rose for chiefly was to express the hope that when the regulations are being framed, the basis of the past year's crushing will be carefully looked into.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The Minister is doing that now.

Mr. CLARKE.—I am pleased to hear that, and I hope as a result there will be a more equitable distribution of what will now become the bonus. Although it is recognised that an honest effort has been made to deal with this complicated question, some sugar-cane growers are not quite satisfied with the distribution, or rather with the way in which the rebate has been apportioned. That is to say, their yield has been of a higher average than that on which they have been paid. I trust that that matter will be looked into, and that as far as possible the growers will get the full benefit of the rebate—or bonus as it will then be—in the future. I have no hesitation in supporting the measure, and am glad to notice that honorable members are receiving it in such a cordial manner.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—The Bill before us is, I am bound to say, one of the results of the ill-considered legislation that has been introduced, and I submit that it is a matter for which Ministers are entirely responsible. It is a great pity that at the very inception of federation so little care was taken in considering legislation from the point of view from which statesmen ought to consider it, and of making the measures passed as elastic as possible. Difficulties of this sort were pointed out when the question was first raised. It was also pointed out that the rebate to be given exceeded the amount that was paid in labour for cutting the cane. I find from Coghlan that there is a difference of something like 6d. to 7d. per ton between the cost of cutting cane by black labour and white. The figures are respectively 2s. 11d. and 3s. 5d. per ton. But say that the difference is quite 1s. per ton. The rebate formerly proposed was 4s. per ton, taking the cane to average 10 per cent. of sugar. Advantage has not been taken of the fact that the bonus might have been brought down from

4s. to 1s. to cover this difference. When we are considering the way the other States are affected it must be remembered that it is not at all improbable that the full amount of sugar used for local consumption in Australia will be locally produced. I find that a total of 194,000 tons of sugar have been raised in one year in Australia, and that exceeds the present consumption of something like 180,000 tons. When the Bill gets into Committee I shall raise a protest against the retrospective clauses of it. I do not think that we are legally entitled to pass them. As far as the Treasurer is concerned, it seems to me that the proposal now brought forward is better in many respects than the former one. At all events it enables each State to know exactly the price it is paying. That is one great advantage that will result from its passage. As to one question raised by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, I think that under the Constitution there will be considerable difficulty in allowing matters to remain as they are at present. When the High Court is established—or even now, if Federal jurisdiction were given to the local courts—if an application were made by any State interested, the money held by the Treasurer would have to be paid over. I do not think that the fact that the Treasurer holds certain moneys would enable him at any future time to retain these moneys as against the State. I trust we shall not do anything that in effect is really varying an Act passed by this House. Such an Act is of a very solemn nature, and should be rescinded only by something of similar strength, namely, another Act. If the Treasurer were to ask us to alter the rebate duty, he would be within his province; but even were it within his province—I do not think it ought to be—to ask us to make a Bill retrospective, I do not think any attempt in that direction should be made by Parliament. Indeed, I am afraid that even if we did desire to make a Bill retrospective we could not do so under the Constitution. That part of the argument, however, I shall deal with in Committee when the details are before us. I opposed the sugar rebate in the first instance, and should do so now if opposition were of any value. I certainly think the suggested method of distribution is an improvement on the previous one, and there being no hope of repealing the sugar legislation, I am bound to give my support to the new proposal.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON (South Australia).—The remarks of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, to some extent cover the ground it was my intention to traverse. I want, however, to ascertain from the Treasurer what the system has been in reference to the repayment of these rebates. From what I could glean from the Treasurer's speech, the rebates in many instances have not been paid; and the Treasurer uses the term "paid" as if the producers of sugar by white labour first handed over the £3 excise, and subsequently, as a separate transaction, received the £2 per ton rebate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The growers do not pay the excise; the refiner pays the excise, and the grower gets the rebate.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—If such is the case, that is not in accordance with the Excise Tariff Act. In the schedule of that Act we find that the duty per cwt. of manufactured sugar is—

3s. until the 1st January, 1902, less, from the 1st July, 1902, a rebate to the grower of sugar cane and beet. The rebate in the case of sugar cane to be 4s. per ton on all sugar delivered for manufacture, and in the production of which sugar cane white labour only has been employed after the 28th February, 1902. The rebate is calculated on cane giving 10 per cent. of sugar, and is to be increased or reduced proportionately according to any variation from this standard. A similar rebate to be allowed in respect of sugar-beet—the rebate to be allowed at the rate of £2 per ton on the sugar-giving contents of the beet. All rebates to be allowed at the time of delivery of the cane or beet on the ascertainment in manner prescribed of the sugar-giving contents.

I desire to call attention to the words which provide that all rebates are to be allowed at the time of the delivery of the cane or beet to the manufacturer. It is here provided that the rebate is to be allowed—not to be paid. What is the rebate to be allowed on? If it is ascertainable at the time of delivery what quantity of sugar there is in the cane or beet, there is an allowance on the quantity. What does "rebate" mean? We provide in the Excise Tariff Act that there is to be an excise of £3 per ton on Australian-grown sugar, with a rebate of £2 per ton on sugar grown by white labour, that rebate to be allowed on the delivery of the cane or beet to the manufacturer or at the mill. It is easy enough to ascertain at every mill what are the sugar-giving contents of the rough syrup after the first crushing. Does the Treasurer mean that, in the first instance, the grower, on delivery, has to be paid £2 in hard cash, and that the £3 excise has not to be received until after the article is completely manufactured? If that has been the system, it strikes at the root of the whole excise legislation. When we passed the Excise Tariff Act our intention was to have, practically, three duties—a duty of £6 per ton against foreign imported sugar, an excise duty of £3 per ton on Australian sugar grown by black labour, and an excise of £1 per ton on Australian sugar produced by white labour. That allowance on white-grown sugar was not termed a bonus, but a "rebate"—a discount on the £3 per ton to be allowed if it was ascertainable in a sufficiently correct manner what the sugar-giving contents of the cane or beet were at the time of delivery. The schedule in the Act goes on to say—the average sugar-giving contents of the cane or beet in any particular district shall be taken to be the sugar-giving contents of each lot of cane or beet in such district.

If the rebate has merely to be allowed, it is an allowance and not a payment. Surely it was never contemplated that the Treasurer would pay £2 per ton in cash. The idea was rather that the Treasurer would allow a rebate or discount, reducing the duty on white-grown sugar to £1 per ton. It was pointed out by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, that New South Wales dealt with 10,200 tons of white-grown sugar and 39,800 tons of black-grown sugar imported from Queensland. It will be remembered that section 93, sub-section (1), of the Constitution provides—

The duties of Customs chargeable on goods imported into a State and afterwards passing into another State for consumption, and the duties of excise paid on goods produced or manufactured in a State and afterwards passing into another State for consumption, shall be taken to have been collected not on the former but in the latter State.

That is to say, the excise payable on this white-grown sugar produced and manufactured in Queensland would be £3 per ton, less the rebate or discount of £2 per ton, and New South Wales ought to have been credited with the duty on 39,800 tons of black-grown sugar at £3 per ton, or £119,000 more. There is no question of this being a bonus. What is important is that this £1 per ton ought to have been collected at the time the sugar cane was brought to the mill, if the Customs authorities were satisfied that it had been grown by white labour, and the amount realized ought to be charged to Queensland on its export to New South Wales and credited to the latter State.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Does the honorable member say that the excise ought to be collected when the cane is delivered at the mill?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Why not?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Because the excise is payable on manufactured sugar.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—If the rebate of 4s. per ton can be calculated on cane giving 10 per cent. of sugar, the excise can be ascertained. I cannot understand why, if the rebate of £2 per ton on sugar beet can be ascertained and allowed at the time of delivery, the excise of £3 per ton cannot also be calculated. What is the meaning of the words that the rebate is to be "allowed"? Is it that the Treasurer has, first of all, to draw a cheque, and allow the rebate on the ascertained contents, and then at some future period, he not then being able to trace the cane or beet, must trust that he may be repaid the excise of £3 per ton. Whatever may be the views of honorable members as to rejecting the original system of debiting the whole of Australia on a consumption basis, and accepting the proposal to debit on a population basis, it must be seen that clause 7 of the Bill before us overturns legislation which was approved and passed by this House. That clause practically says to the various States, which should have received regularly month to month payments of the balance of excise on the sugar consumed—"Although you received £1 excise upon the white-grown sugar you consumed, you will have to pay back to us your proportion of the rebate of £2 per ton, in order that one or two States may obtain a benefit we did not reckon on before." This is a Federal question of great magnitude; and I feel satisfied that if many honorable members had known the extent to which they were pledging the taxpayers of the Commonwealth, the proposal to give this rebate on white-grown sugar would have received much closer attention.

Mr. CONROY.—I called attention to this aspect of the question at the time.

Mr. MAUGER.—The provision would have passed all the same.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The provision might have passed, but there would have been much fuller discussion on the whole question. I am not going to argue that the proposal in the Bill—I am not now alluding to the retrospective legislation—that the whole Commonwealth shall pay in proportion to its population is unfair or inequitable. I do not think it is. I am inclined to take the view that, having discovered that the original position was a wrong one, the equitable and proper course to adopt was to bring in this Bill. But to my mind it is not fair to make the measure retrospective as is done by clause 7, and thus to charge amounts against States whose Governments had no idea that such charges would be made, and to keep from them sums of money which should have been paid to them long ago. I shall vote for the second reading, but I hope that the Treasurer will agree to the omission of clause 7, so that the measure may take effect from the date of its becoming law. It is not fair after a period of eighteen months to go back on our legislation, and make what are practically surcharges upon the States. If the clause is not omitted, there will probably be a great deal of trouble in getting the Bill through the other branch of the Legislature in which the States are specially represented. I trust, however, that the Treasurer will not oppose the attempt which will be made on this side of the Chamber to prevent the Bill from being retrospective, and in Committee I shall move the omission of clause 7.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (South Australia).—I do not know that I rejoice at the introduction of this Bill, but, as I have no wish to display an unfederal spirit, I suppose I must support its second reading. I fear that this is the price which the Commonwealth has to pay for a white Australia. It is rather hard on South Australia, however, because that State has in the past paid very heavily to prevent the introduction of coloured labour into the Northern Territory. I shall support the second reading.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—It must have been gratifying to most honorable members to hear the plain and open statement of the Treasurer that, in his opinion, our original legislation upon this subject was wrong, and that he is now taking the earliest opportunity to amend it. Even under the arrangement provided for in the Bill, Queensland will lose to the extent of £862; but the Treasurer put his finger upon the weak spot when he stated that the feeling in that State arose because of the misapprehension of the Premiers of both Queensland and New South Wales, that their States will be called upon to pay the whole of the rebate. That was not contemplated by Parliament, nor was it provided for by the Act. It is satisfactory to those who supported the white Australia policy in the beginning to find that it is now being largely indorsed. In my opinion, our enactments will produce good fruit, and will prove to be for the welfare, not only of Queensland and New South Wales, but of the whole Commonwealth. I do not agree with the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, that the Bill should not be retrospective. I would rather enlarge its scope than restrict it, and therefore I hope that the Treasurer will take power to enable him to pay bonuses from year to year as the planters increase the areas cultivated by white labour. It is no doubt the wish of honorable members that all the sugar grown in Australia shall be grown by white labour, and I think that such an alteration of the Bill as I suggest will help to more quickly achieve that end. I regret the tone which has been adopted by some of the representatives of Victoria who have spoken upon the Bill. Although originally Queensland was called upon to pay most heavily for a white Australia, I, as the representative of a Queensland constituency, nevertheless cheerfully supported the proposal to grant the rebate upon beet sugar grown by white labour which the Victorian representatives, selfish above those of every other State, desired. I am not parochial, however, in regard to this matter. I think there is not a State in Australia which cannot produce sugar, and I should like to see Victoria undertake the production of beet sugar. Then we shall have a truly national policy which every one of us can support. I am exceedingly pleased that the Government proposal has been so well received, and I venture to think that it will be more equitable than the arrangement which has prevailed in the past. The admirable speech of the honorable member for North Sydney on the subject, however, leaves practically nothing more to be said. Many of us plainly saw, in the first instance, that the original arrangement could, by an understanding between the sugar-growers and the manufacturers, be made to work distinctly against the interests of particular States. Victorian representatives should remember, however, that while under the present arrangement their State will be £16,286 to the bad, it might have been next year, under the old arrangement, twice as much to the bad. I congratulate the Treasurer upon the plain and frank statement which he made. It is a credit to the Government, and an honour to Parliament, to have such a man in his position.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee :

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2—

There shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, which is hereby appropriated accordingly, to every grower of sugar cane or beet within the Commonwealth, in the production of which sugar cane or beet white labour only has been employed after the 29th day of February, 1902, a bonus, at the rates provided by this Act, on all such sugar cane or beet delivered for manufacture after the commencement of this Act, and before the 1st day of January, 1907.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—The honorable member for Wide Bay has referred to a matter in connexion with this clause which has been under my consideration since I saw the Bill in print. It is a somewhat important one, and I have, therefore, consulted the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General with regard to the effect of the clause as it stands. I take it that it is the desire of Parliament to encourage persons who are now employing black labour to substitute white labour for it. But if we provide that bonuses shall be paid only upon sugar-cane grown by white labour after a certain date, and delivered for manufacture before a certain other date, those who are now using black labour will have no inducement to substitute white labour for it in some future period. That is not our intention, and the original provision in the Tariff Excise Act was intended to mean that during each year rebate should be allowed to those who after a certain date in that year use white labour only. It was not intended that the Act should not apply to those who, after two or three years' experience, said—"We are going to abandon black labour and employ white labour," or to those who will be forced by the operation of the Pacific Islands Labourers Act to do so. The effect of the clause as it stands, however, is that only in cases where white labour only has been employed after 28th February, 1902, in the production of sugar cane or beet which is delivered for manufacture before the 1st January, 1907, shall a bonus be paid. Therefore, if a grower employed any black labour after 28th February, 1902, and during this year's operations, which will commence about July, employed white labour only, he would get no benefit under the Bill. To obviate that difficulty, I move—

That after the figures "1902," line 7, the words "or such date in each year thereafter as may be prescribed" be inserted.

Mr. POYNTON.—Will the provision apply to a part, or only to the whole of a plantation?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It applies to both. If a man can show that he has used only white labour on so many acres of his plantation, he will be entitled to a bonus on the sugar-cane grown on the area. Of course, a careful check is kept, and any one trying to evade the provisions of the law will be prosecuted.

Mr. WATSON.—A great deal of inspection will be necessary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It has been found, from our experience last year, that not much inspection is required. The arrangement seems to work fairly well. The effect will be to allow the Minister to fix a particular date in each year, and the growers will be informed that if after that particular date they do not use black labour they will be able to claim the benefit of the bonus. That will be in accordance with the intention of Parliament, and will operate with fairness and justice. It will offer an inducement to growers to use white labour, whilst at the same time it will be equitable to those who are forced to use white labour because the black labour has been sent away from them.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I should like to know whether it is also intended to allow planters who have been using white labour and have reverted to black labour to again register as employers of white labour only?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I think that would have to be permitted, but for any year in which the grower employed black labour he would forfeit the rebate.

Mr. WATSON.—But supposing he were to wish to register again?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I know that that has been allowed; but the matter is not dealt with by the amendment, which only proposes to fix a date.

Mr. WATSON.—I think that the Government have been imposed upon. I am informed that a number of the growers have registered as employers of white labour, have put white men on to work for a short period to cut cane, and have afterwards employed coloured labour to cultivate the ground preparatory to the next cutting season. It will be very difficult if one portion of a plantation is to be registered as cultivated with white labour and another portion as worked with black labour, to keep in perfect touch with the actual conditions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We could not very well refuse permission for a man to register part of his plantation as worked with white labour when he has a big property and wishes to bring about the change from black to white labour by degrees.

Mr. WATSON.—At first sight it may appear rather harsh to refuse, but we have to consider the difficulties of administration. It will not confer much benefit on the Commonwealth if we have to pay rebate to planters who use black labour, as well as white labour. I am informed that in some instances nearly the whole of the work of the plantation, except the cutting of the cane, has been done by black labour, and that the rebate has still been secured by the planters.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—If we could get evidence to that effect we should prosecute the persons concerned.

Mr. WATSON.—No doubt it is very difficult to induce people to come forward and swear to the facts in such cases.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—There has been at least one prosecution in Queensland.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes: and I am informed that there have been one or two cases in New South Wales also. But, in order to comply with the spirit of the law, the cane-growers should be compelled to employ white labour for the twelve months preceding the cutting of the cane, as well as during the cutting season. According to the proposal of the Minister the date could be altered to suit the growers who could cultivate their ground with black labour, and then just before the cutting season register as employers of white labour.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The regulations could be framed in such a way as to prevent that.

Mr. WATSON.—What I desire to point out is that the growers have been allowed to again register themselves as employers of white labour after reverting to the employment of black labour, and I think that that practice should be stopped. Cane-growers should make up their minds which kind of labour they will employ, and if they once revert to black labour after having employed white men, they should not be allowed to register again. I admit that there is great reason why those who employ black labour should be encouraged to substitute white labour, and I should not care to do anything to prevent them from securing the benefits conferred by the law, but it is wrong to allow planters to shift about from one form of labour to another, because such action is in direct opposition to the spirit of our legislation, and must lead to great difficulty in administration.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—The honorable member for Bland is in error if he supposes that it will be possible to carry out the intentions of Parliament without allowing portions of plantations to be worked with white labour. Our desire is to encourage the employment of white labour upon territory now occupied by black labour, and to bring about this change to the greatest possible extent at an early date. It would be impracticable for the large planters to get rid of the whole of their coloured labour at one fell swoop, and at the same time secure a sufficient number of white men to enable them to work the whole of their plantations. For that reason it will be sound policy on our part to allow them to set apart a portion of their plantations to be worked with white labour, so that they may bring about the change gradually, and under circumstances which will best suit their own purposes. No greater danger of imposition arises in such cases than in connexion with very small holdings. We must provide for the inspection of the plantations, and upon this point I think that it would be better if we adopted a more efficient system than that now in operation. I do not think that the Commonwealth has suffered very much from impositions in Queensland, but the inspection should be a little more vigilant than it is.

Mr. WARSON.—Does the honorable member think that a planter, after having registered as an employer of white labour, and having reverted to black labour, should be allowed to re-register?

Mr. FISHER.—I do not know of any case in which that has happened.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I know of one case in which a man registered as an employer of white labour, but unfortunately afterwards had to use black labour, and thereby forfeited his claim to the rebate. He was allowed to register as an employer of white labour for the following year.

Mr. FISHER.—I do not think there could be any serious objection to re-registration in such a case, because the planter was actually prepared to employ white labour, but was placed in such a position that he was compelled to forfeit his claim to the rebate.

Mr. WARSON.—That is not the case to which I referred.

Mr. FISHER.—I am not aware of any others; but if planters voluntarily return to the employment of black labour they should be penalized in some way when they seek to again register as employers of white labour.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I submit that the Treasurer is perfectly right in the view which he has put before honorable members, and that we should not disqualify any planters who are willing to employ white labour. It must be clear to them that they cannot claim the bonus if they employ black labour in the production of their sugar, and we should do nothing to discourage them from employing white men.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I should like to be assured by the Treasurer that this clause does not form part of the retrospective provisions of the Bill. It may be read as if it did, because it refers back to the time of the commencement of the Excise Act.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No; it has no retrospective effect.

Mr. GLYNN.—I am willing to accept the Treasurer's assurance; otherwise certain amendments would be necessary.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—The Treasurer has not explained why there is any necessity to fix a date.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We must fix some time in order to prevent planters from using white labour and then reverting to black labour.

Mr. THOMSON.—But the words "in the production of which sugar cane or beet white labour only has been employed," are used, and I do not see any necessity to fix any date if white labour only has been employed in the production of the sugar. There was a necessity for fixing a date when we offered the rebate in the first instance, because there was no inspection prior to the passing of the Act. But now the planter has to register as an employer of white labour, and he has to satisfy the inspector that the cane has been grown by white labour only.

Mr. FISHER.—But they have to make their declaration early in the year, so that the inspector can keep his eye on them.

Mr. THOMSON.—But if the planters know that they will not get the bonus unless they can prove to the satisfaction of the inspector that they have employed only white labour in the production of the cane, that should prove sufficient without fixing any date.

Mr. FISHER.—But the planters have to declare the area upon which they intend to employ white labour, so that the inspector may exercise his vigilance in regard to that particular portion of the plantation.

Mr. THOMSON.—But that does not affect the question of fixing the date, and I do not see any reason why we should give this arbitrary power to the Minister. It is sufficient for all practical purposes to provide that the bonus shall be paid in respect to sugar, in the production of which only white labour has been employed.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—It would appear from a casual view that the contention of the honorable member is correct, but honorable members will notice that the date fixed is the 28th February, 1902. Some of the cane upon which the growers were granted exemption prior to 28th February, 1902, has not yet been dealt with, and therefore the honorable member will see the necessity for the insertion of the first date. Whenever a sugar-grower is prepared to substitute white for black labour, the Bill should encourage him to do so.

Mr. THOMSON.—But why give this exemption every year?

Mr. EWING.—Let me give the honorable member an illustration of what I mean. A grower who is employing black labour may apply to the Commissioner, informing him that he intends dispensing with it. In such circumstances, the Bill gives him an opportunity of registering his name as a grower of sugar by white labour. The total abolition of black labour in the sugar industry must be a gradual process. By fixing the first date and making it applicable to crops which are not yet two years old, and which will come in at the next cutting, we necessarily require a second date.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I must ask the Treasurer to seriously consider this clause. Upon looking into it carefully it seems to me that in its present form the Government may be called upon to pay both the rebate and the bonus.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We have introduced a Bill to abolish the payment of the rebate.

Mr. CONROY.—But suppose it is held that the growers have a legal claim to the payment of the rebate, and that afterward they demand the bonus?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—They cannot do so. The Bill providing for the payment of the rebate will be repealed before the bonus is forthcoming.

Mr. CONROY.—But I understood that all claims for rebate have not been paid?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—All have been paid. It is the other money which has been held.

Mr. CONROY.—Is the Prime Minister quite sure that the words "the 28th day of February, 1902," will not have a retrospective effect?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—They will be retrospective only as to our intention, which is to deal with sugar cane or beet in the production of which white labour has been employed since 28th February, 1902.

Mr. CONROY.—That question, therefore, could not arise under this clause?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—When the payment of the rebate has been converted into a bonus, everything in the nature of rebate which has been paid will be accounted to have been paid by way of bonus under clause 7.

Mr. CONROY.—Quite so; but many honorable members, though quite willing to vote for the provisions contained in this clause, are not disposed to make its operation retrospective.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—This clause cannot affect that matter. Clause 7 will settle it one way or the other.

Mr. CONROY.—It seems to me that under this provision the matter might be open to argument.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It is only a question of distribution that is involved. All the growers have been paid.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—In spite of the explanation offered by the honorable member for Richmond, I do not see any necessity for the amendment which is proposed. The fixing of a date might be necessary to confer exemption upon those who employed a little black labour before the Excise Tariff Act came into operation, but it will not be necessary in the future.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Would the honorable member shut the door against every employer of black labour in the future?

Mr. THOMSON.—When the Act is in operation everybody is acquainted with the fact. Are we to allow the Minister the option of granting absolution every year?

Mr. FISHER.—It is not a question of absolution.

Mr. THOMSON.—The honorable member for Richmond explained that it was necessary to insert this date because, prior to the Act becoming operative, some sugar-growers who had employed black labour upon preliminary work in connexion with their crops might be quite willing to employ white labour. He urged that it would not be right to penalize them for having unwittingly offended. It was necessary, he urged, to fix a date so that they might be absolved from any penalty applicable to their actions before that date.

Mr. FISHER.—That is not the idea at all.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—I would point out that the employment of black labour was not an act of inadvertence on the part of a great many sugar-growers. They were employing black labour, and it was necessary to fix a period when that practice should be discontinued. Hence the necessity for inserting the first date. The sugar-growers have obtained exemption for the crops put in prior to that date. That cane has not yet been dealt with; bonus is still to be paid upon it. Then, if there is to be a gradual abolition of the employment of black labour in the sugar industry, is it not obvious that the Minister must be vested with power to allow the growers, when they so desire, to dispense with it, and become cultivators with white labour? Otherwise, we shall have the same number of sugar-growers by black labour in 1907 as we have now.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).—If I understand the clause aright, the insertion of this date is by way of limitation of the bonus payable upon the sugar produced by white labour. It will prevent the bonus from being payable to any grower upon sugar manufactured by white labour prior to the 28th February, 1902.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That is dealt with by the Act, which is already on our statute-book.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Then this clause merely repeats that provision?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It also gives an extension to those sugar-growers who may desire to avail themselves of the provisions of the Excise Tariff Act in the future.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—I really think that honorable members are becoming very confused in regard to this matter. To my mind we are asked to encourage the payment of bonuses upon sugar which has been partially grown by black labour. I do not think Parliament ever intended that that should be done when once the Excise Tariff Act was in full operation. We were told that it was necessary to fix a date because the sugar-growers, when their crops were put in, could not foresee that such an Act would be passed. Now we are asked to allow the Minister to declare each year that cane which has been dealt with by white labour for only two or three months shall participate in the payment of the bonus.

Mr. EWING.—Let the honorable member suppose that a man had never grown any cane at all, and desired to start growing it by the employment of white labour. Without this provision he could not do it.

Mr. THOMSON.—Why not? If he cultivated the cane by white labour he would participate in the bonus. Why is it necessary to fix a date prior to which the employment of black labour will be allowed, seeing that the Act has already been in operation for something like twelve months? Having originally fixed the date as a starting point, there is no necessity to do anything more. We can declare that whilst up to that date some exemption would be granted, after it, we expect the conditions imposed to be carried out. Surely that will place the matter upon a reasonable basis. We are supposed to be passing a law to encourage the production of sugar by white labour, whereas we are really giving the Minister power to say that each year a certain quantity of sugar produced by black labour shall participate in the payment of the bonus. He may say that he will allow that payment upon sugar which has been dealt with by white labour for only three months.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—If he did so, the House would intervene.

Mr. THOMSON.—We have experienced a great deal of trouble in connexion with options given to Ministers—options which have been used in a way that Parliament never intended. We have full power over the Customs and a host of other regulations, but we found that when we gave certain options under the Act they were used.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—What is the object of renewing the options each year?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—To allow those who have been employing black labour to come in.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—To allow of the extension of the employment of white labour from year to year.

Mr. THOMSON.—There is no necessity for any such extension after the Act has been in force for a considerable time. The Statute itself provides the necessary encouragement. Surely we ought not to be called upon to pay a white labour bonus upon sugar which has been chiefly produced by black labour. I see no necessity for the options which are now sought. Therefore there is no occasion to confer upon the employers of black labour that exemption which was extended to them when the Act first became operative. I shall certainly oppose the amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I think we are all hopeful that, within two or three years, black labour will not be employed in the production of sugar. Estimates have been made of the cost involved in its abolition. If it be wise to dispense with black labour, it is equally wise to encourage the sugar-growers who have been employing it either prior to or since the 28th February, 1902, to substitute white labour for it.

Mr. THOMSON.—How will it encourage them to give them a bonus for sugar grown by black labour?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We do not do that.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—If we fix an original date, and give a bonus upon all sugar grown by white labour after that date, will not that be sufficient?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No. Because by doing that we would shut out all those who have been growing by black labour for any period after that particular date.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Can they not come in at any time after that original date?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Under this Bill, without the amendment proposed, they could not.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Then the Bill is faultily drawn?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—My honorable friend will see that the object is to allow them to come in after the original date, and the amendment proposed will effect what the honorable member apparently desires.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—What I desire is I think the simplest course to pursue—fix a date and say that any one who produces sugar by white labour after that date in any year shall be given the bonus.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—(Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—The purpose is to give the bonus, to put it shortly, to growers of cane or beet sugar in producing which white labour only has been employed after the 28th of February, 1902. We thought that the Bill as printed would have carried out what is desired by the honorable member for Gippsland. But there are occasionally faults in the drafting of a Bill, and, on going through the matter again, we found that it was a sine qua non, if the clause were to stand as in the Bill without alteration, that where a person desired to get a bonus for the growth of sugar by white labour he must have started employing white labour in the growth of that sugar on or before the 28th day of February, 1902, and, if he was still employing black labour on the 1st or 2nd March, 1902, he would have no claim to the bonus, although he might on that date have ceased cultivating with black labour and have begun cultivating with white labour. The object we all have, I take it, is that persons who successively commence to employ white labour from time to time shall have the benefit of the bonus. We had, therefore, to discover in what way this clause could be amended, as otherwise it would not carry out the purpose we all have in view. After consultation between the Treasurer, the Attorney-General, and myself, the only way to effect that purpose seemed to us to be the insertion of some such words as these—"or such date in each year thereafter as may be prescribed." It is necessary to provide some starting point, so that there might be some locus penitentiae, some time allowed in each year when growers of cane by white labour alone might begin to earn the bonus. I do not see in what way this provision could be abused, except that there will probably be occasional deceptions, and in those cases there will be no hesitation in employing the criminal law to punish anybody guilty of offences under the Bill.

Mr. FISHER.—The proposal gives those who come in later no advantage over those who came in originally.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).—The intention of the Bill is to provide a bonus upon sugar grown only by white labour. If the words which define a certain date, the 28th February, 1902, are inserted, they will involve this complete discrepancy—that sugar which has been grown, we will say for one month by white labour and by black labour for sixteen or seventeen months, will be just as much entitled to the bonus as if it had been cultivated by white labour for the whole of the eighteen months.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That depends upon the day of the year we fix.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Why should there be any day fixed by which sugar grown chiefly by black labour may be brought under the provisions of an act intended to encourage the use of white labour? We need not have any date fixed, and I submit that if all reference to the date is omitted the clause will carry out the purpose of Parliament in a way which will do injustice to nobody.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—I have already explained why it would not do to leave out all reference to a date. I am satisfied that the honorable members for Gippsland and North Sydney approach this question fairly, and desire only to be convinced.

Mr. THOMSON.—We have no desire to pay a bonus for sugar grown by black labour.

Mr. EWING.—We are not dealing with that aspect of the case now. We are endeavouring to prove that the action taken by the Treasurer in introducing this amendment is correct. The end in view is the attainment of a white Australia, and the abolition of black labour in the sugar industry.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yet, it is proposed to give a bonus for black labour.

Mr. EWING.—If the honorable member will bear with me for a moment, I will state a case for him: Suppose the honorable member is a sugar-grower in Northern Queensland, and has been employing 200 kanakas on the date set out in the clause, the 28th February, 1902. On that date the honorable member finds himself with certain responsibilities to, say, 200 kanakas, and with no white men available. Obviously it is not possible for him on that date to register as a grower of sugar by white labour. It is equally obvious that he must remain for all time a producer of sugar by black labour, or else he must be given a subsequent opportunity to register. Is that clear?

Mr. THOMSON.—It is not clear that he will not have a subsequent opportunity.

Mr. EWING.—If he fails to come in on the date specified, he must permanently remain a producer of sugar by black labour or he must be given a subsequent opportunity.

Mr. POYNON.—Does one crop last a life-time?

Mr. EWING.—One planting may last for seven years. In fairly good soil, from the time the cane is first planted, it may last seven years.

Mr. CONROY.—How often will the honorable and learned member find it lasting longer than two or three years?

Mr. EWING.—I know exactly what I am talking about in this matter. Honorable members make the mistake of confusing years with crops. In New South Wales, generally, sugar-growers cut their cane once in two years, and a sugar-grower who will get three crops from tolerably good soil will get them from cane which has been planted for six years.

Mr. THOMSON.—Then under this clause he could not get a bonus for years to come!

Mr. EWING.—Yes, because he is exempted prior to the date we have already referred to. I pointed out that this exemption was necessary in the first instance, because the cane crop might last for seven years. A crop put in two years ago, prior to this date, is not yet cut, and that difficulty had to be overcome. To continue the argument ad hominem, the question arises: what is the honorable member for North Sydney to do when, on the date referred to, he finds himself with black labour of various descriptions, and, therefore, unable to register? Clearly if he is going to have fewer kanakas in 1907 than he has to-day we must give him a subsequent opportunity to come under the Bill. What we are fighting for now is that subsequent opportunity. The honorable member desiring to employ white labour in the growth of sugar, finds a little later on an opportunity of doing so. He applies to the Department and says that he has now made arrangements for getting rid of his kanakas as there are white men available for the cultivation of sugar. The Department must be placed in a position to meet him, and how can that be done unless we give him the opportunity of a subsequent date upon which he can come under the provisions of the Bill? As has been explained by the Prime Minister and the Treasurer, if that is not done we shall, in 1907, have as many kanakas employed as we have to-day. If the sugar-growers do not get the benefits of the Bill, they will not get rid of their kanakas. If the contention of the honorable member for North Sydney is correct, we should pass a Bill which would be absolutely inoperative beyond its first effect. The idea was a gradual abolition of the employment of black labour, as we knew it was not possible for the people of Queensland to obtain all the white labour they required at once. How often have we, in discussing the matter here, pointed out that Queensland had 8,000 kanakas which must be gradually got rid of? If the contention of the honorable member for North Sydney is correct, what is proposed will be a refusal to allow those kanakas to be gradually got rid of. If the bonus is to lead to the gradual abolition of the use of black labour, there must be various dates provided for registration, and the person who must be allowed to decide the dates must be the Minister for the time being.

Mr. POYNTON (South Australia).—I am one of those who have not seen the necessity for the subsequent dates. It does appear to me that the whole intention is to get a bonus for a crop grown partly by black labour. That must be the general conclusion from the speech to which we have just listened.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Members have admitted that.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is that the intention of honorable members? Is it the desire of members of this House that these people should be encouraged to put in a crop and nurse it for two or three years with black labour until it begins to yield, and then say that they wish to come under the Bill and secure the bonus for sugar grown by white labour?

Mr. EWING.—What are they to nurse it with if they cannot get white labour? They have started the crop; we are dealing with a going enterprise.

Mr. POYNTON.—I take it that without any reference to dates in the clause, if I were a sugar-grower in Queensland and started to plant cane to-morrow with white labour I should be entitled to the bonus if I continued to comply with the conditions as to labour.

Mr. FISHER.—Certainly.

Mr. POYNTON.—Then, what is the necessity for fixing this date if it is not to give people the advantage of using black labour in the production of the sugar up to a certain date?

Mr. FISHER.—Where is the advantage?

Mr. POYNTON.—They have been using black labour for some time, and we desire now to whitewash them; but honorable members appear to me to wish to give them the benefit of the bonus for sugar which is only partially the product of white labour. I do not like this Bill at all. I believe that under it we shall require as many inspectors as there are plantations. If a man is to be allowed a bonus upon sugar grown upon an acre in this plantation and an acre in another, a great many inspectors will be required.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—This amendment does not affect that question.

Mr. POYNTON.—I grant that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—My honorable friend will see that many of these planters have kanakas under contract for one, two, or three years, and they cannot at once get rid of them. Gradually they will get rid of them and employ white labour, and from the time they employ white labour they ought to get the benefit of the Bill.

Mr. POYNTON.—Will these planters never plant again? Have they got in a crop which will last for all time? If the bonus is to be paid on the sugar which is grown by white labour, it must mean that it is to be given from the time when the crop was put into the ground, otherwise we are giving a bonus for the employment of black labour. Suppose that I was a grower of beet; that I used coloured labour up to the time when the beet was fit for conversion into sugar, and that I used white labour for that purpose, should I be entitled to get the bonus under this amendment?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No; because the date would be prescribed in such a way as to prevent any of those frauds being brought about.

Mr. POYNTON.—I am afraid that the clause is very loosely worded.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I am as keenly alive as any one else to the danger of any sugar-grower getting at the Treasury. It seems to be obvious, as all the planters could not put the whole of their plantations under white labour to begin with, that, from time to time, as they intend to increase the area to be planted with cane, and worked with white labour, it is advisable that there should be a date fixed—each year if you like—after which they must use white labour wholly in the production of cane to earn the bonus. That is practically what the amendment does, with this difference, that it allows the Minister to prescribe the date. It is absolutely impossible to do other than to allow the planters some of the advantages which may have accrued to them by using black labour up to a certain point. They are not going to root out their cane for the mere purpose of earning the bonus. I do not suppose that honorable members would be so absurd as to say that the planters should root out the latent capital which had accrued from the employment of black labour with the sole idea of having the whole work done again by white labour. The honorable member for South Australia might as well say that if a plantation had been ploughed and trenched in past years by black labour the work should be re-done now by white labour. It is perfectly clear that those planters who may come in at a later stage will reap no greater advantage than those who came in at first.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Yes, because they have had to pay lower wages to their blackfellows.

Mr. FISHER.—I submit that those who come under the Act next year will have no greater advantages than those who registered during the first year of its operation. If it is a question of policy, why should we differentiate? I hope that honorable members will see that it is the right thing to make this amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I have tried to explain that the object of the amendment is to keep open the door of repentance to those who have been growing cane with black labour, and desire to come under the provisions of the Act. In addition to that, some planters could not help themselves, because they had labour contracts with one, two, or more years to run, and we are giving them an opportunity to come under the Act. A fear has been expressed that a date will be fixed which would allow nearly the whole of the work to be done with black labour, and that just as the last stages were being reached, white labour would be employed. No Minister would be foolish enough to fix any such date. As the 28th February has been fixed after full inquiries as the proper date in the year when we should stop the employment of black labour, I have no objection to alter the amendment by inserting the words "or the same day in the year," so that if the Minister during a year chose to prescribe that after that year the bonus may be allowed, then he must fix upon the 28th February. That date would allow for a very large amount of employment to the end of the year in cleaning the cane, trashing and cutting, and taking to market. All that work has to be done after the 28th February. If it is feared that a misuse might be made of the power by the Minister fixing a wrong date, the amendment I suggest would meet that objection. Parliament always has control over the regulations; they have to be laid upon the table, and if anything unfair has been done, a regulation can be annulled.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—Will the same date suit Queensland as will suit New South Wales?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Apparently the same date has been fixed. I think that it had better be left to the discretion of the Minister, who will act as circumstances may require him to do. We have two difficulties to face. Either we are to shut out those planters who have been forced to use black labour for a portion of the time, or we are to run the little risk of allowing them to come in. That is a risk which we may well afford to run, leaving the controlling power in the hands of the Minister, who in his turn will be controlled by Parliament. I wish to encourage the growing of sugar by white labour.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON (South Australia).—It seems that this is rather a difficult question to deal with. It certainly appears that the owner of land which has been prepared, planted, and cropped with black labour during the first year may come under the Act at the end of that time when there is no planting to be done, and when a second crop is being grown from the stools. There we run the risk of allowing the bonus to be paid on a crop of cane that had been planted by black labour in ground which had been tilled and worked by black labour up to the time when the trashing had to be done. I think the honorable member for Richmond will admit that in some places the growers get not only a crop from the first planting, but two, and even three successive crops from the stools. In fact, the third successive crop is very often better, stronger, and denser in sugar contents than the earlier crops. It is very difficult to get over the danger of paying a bonus on sugar produced from cane that was originally planted by black labour in ground which had been tilled by black labour, and upon which little or no work had been done by white labour. The only way I can see out of the difficulty is by not passing this amendment, but by omitting the words "the 28th day of February, 1902."

Mr. EWING.—That cannot help us. If a man has employed any black labour at all, he cannot come in at any time.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—It strikes out the necessity for white labour to have been employed ever since the date stipulated.

Mr. McCAY.—That does not get over a case where the cane was planted by black labour.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—It does entirely.

In the production of which sugar cane or beet white labour only has been employed.

Surely those words are definite enough?

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—If the cane was planted by black labour, the grower could not get the bonus under the suggested amendment.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—How long does that last?

Mr. McDONALD.—That lasts for five years.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I do not wish to go, nor do I think that we shall go as far as that, by omitting those words. I believe that in most instances the original stools are rooted up after three years.

Mr. EWING.—Very far north that may be so; but about Bundaberg they can get seven crops.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Then we are placed in this position—that on sugar-cane which was planted three or four years before the principal Act was passed, and worked by black labour, we may be paying this bonus.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We have paid it.

Mr. McDONALD.—What proportion of the labour is represented in the planting?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The preparing of the ground and the planting of the cane represent a very large proportion of the labour.

Mr. McDONALD.—The kanakas do not plough.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—It may not be necessary to plough the ground. In many instances they only dig holes in which to plant at short distance the pieces of cane for each stool. I have seen the cane planted. A very large portion of the cost involved is in clearing and preparing the land, and planting the cane. I have not gone into the proportions of expenditure, but I know that the processes of preparing the ground and planting the cane cost more than any other processes in sugar production except the milling. I am certainly against giving extended powers to the Government to work a Bill like this merely by issuing a proclamation each year.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I think I can suggest an amendment which will meet all the circumstances. I would suggest making the clause read—

In the production of which crop of sugar cane or beet white labour only has been employed.

This would get over all the difficulties.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — During what period of the year is the crop produced? Surely after the 28th February?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The cane is planted in one year and harvested in another.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — I suppose it is harvested in July, August, and September; and it is planted certainly before the 28th February.

Mr. CONROY.—But the effect of the proposal of the Bill as it stands would be that, if the cane had been planted before the 28th February, had been attended to for eighteen months, and was cut in July the following year, the grower might be able to obtain the bonus, although his crop had been grown by black labour for the first nineteen or twenty months. He might have stopped short in the employing of black labour on the 28th February, and might be able to obtain the bonus of £2 per ton, although the earlier part of his operations had been carried on with the aid of black labour. I presume that the intention of the Treasurer is to insure that each crop on account of which the bonus is paid shall have been sown and produced by white labour only. But if what is now proposed were carried it would mean that for the first eighteen or twenty months black labour might be employed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—So would the honorable and learned member's suggestion mean that.

Mr. CONROY.—Oh, no; the amendment I suggest would refer only to a crop that had been produced by white labour exclusively.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The object of having a date was to enable us to fix a reasonable time each year. I think it is wiser to leave the matter to the control of the Minister.

Mr. CONROY.—There seems to be a fear as to the administration of the Minister; the Committee does not seem to care to leave the matter to be decided by him.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The honorable and learned member will not trust the Minister; that is the long and short of it.

Mr. CONROY.—It means that to a certain extent. But the objection refers to any Minister. The Committee declines to allow the Minister to legislate when Parliament itself ought to legislate. Therefore no particular Minister should object to the limitation now proposed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Surely the honorable and learned member would not ask us to pass a Bill fixing a date for each year?

Mr. CONROY.—We could so fix the date that it would be beyond the control of the Minister to say what the date should be each year, and every man in the Commonwealth who was growing sugar would be able to know upon what date the operation of this clause would take place. We might so amend the clause as to secure the employment of white labour for nine months.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am prepared to trust the Minister whoever he may be under the control of Parliament; I will not put in any limitation of which I do not understand the effect.

Mr. CONROY.—The effect of my proposal can be understood, because it prevents the Minister from altering the date. It says the bonus shall not be paid on account of any sugar in the production of which white labour shall not have been employed for nine months. We must remember that over 180,000 tons are produced in Australia, and that £360,000 may be paid away; so that the amount of money to be paid away in bonuses is worthy of our consideration. I would urge the Treasurer to accept some such amendment as I have suggested.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not think we should tie our hands, because Parliament can control the Minister for the time being if he is wrong in the regulations he makes.

Mr. CONROY.—What I ask is that the House, not the Minister, shall legislate. With every respect for the Treasurer, I would suggest that this provision will have to be administered by other Treasurers in the future. Probably he would object to control of this kind being exercised by a Treasurer upon this side of the Chamber.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I would trust the honorable and learned member if he were Treasurer.

Mr. CONROY.—I admit that there is a saving clause in the proposal in one way, inasmuch as it provides that the regulation shall be laid on the table of the House. That is a sort of safeguard. But I should prefer to see the matter dealt with in another manner altogether.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—I cannot understand the objection that is made to the position put by the Treasurer. He has put a very fair, just, and reasonable proposition before the Committee—that is, that it shall be left in the discretion of the Minister to fix a date in each year. The Minister administering the Act would make inquiries from his officers as to which was the best date, and would act on that experience which his officers would bring to bear. The question has been raised as to whether we ought to trust the Minister with these powers. What are the powers which we are asked to intrust to him? We have been passing a series of Acts of Parliament, the object of which is to encourage sugar-growers to employ white labour. We are asked to intrust to the Minister the power to declare from time to time other dates, to enable those now employing black labour and those who wish to follow out the policy which Parliament has declared to be a wise one for Australia, to register themselves as growers by white labour. The Minister could not restrict the policy that has been inaugurated by anything he could do under this Bill; all he could do would be to extend it.

Mr. THOMSON.—It would enable him to pay a bonus for the production of sugar from black labour.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No; only to those who were prepared to do away with black labour and to employ white labour, provided they did so before the prescribed date. We know that there was at first a great deal of hostility in regard to the employment of white labour in the sugar-fields. But now a change has come over the minds of the growers. We find that at places like Mackay, and other leading sugar centres, the growers are taking up the position that they should endeavour to make the white Australia policy a success. I notice with pleasure that Mr. Philp has given that advice—that the sugar-growers should do all they can to take advantage of the provisions of the Commonwealth Act, and to make the policy of a white Australia a success if possible. The point is, therefore, whether, as a Parliament, we should endeavour to give them every assistance we can, in order to carry out the policy we desire to see promoted. Here was a large national industry in Queensland, in which coloured labour had been employed. Our desire was to have that industry carried on without any coloured labour being employed in it. When the growers themselves are expressing a desire to come under these provisions, if we can in framing this Bill give to the Minister power to enable him to further the policy we desire, it is our duty to do so. The proposal is perfectly reasonable, and does not ask us to take out of the hands of Parliament any power which it now possesses.

Mr. THOMSON.—We can fix provisions to cover what is proposed.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I submit that is all that is proposed under the Bill. As the Treasurer has pointed out, under the operation of the Pacific Islands Labourers Act, the importation of kanakas will diminish every year, and finally cease; and we know, further, that these coloured men are continually leaving the Commonwealth. There were a certain number of contracts in existence prior to the passing of that Act, and those contracts from time to time expire. What is desired is to enable planters, as their contracts expire, to set aside, under regulation, certain specified lands which they declare will in the future be worked by white labour only. As contracts expire it becomes more difficult to get coloured labour; and if planters are desirous of making an honest effort to carry on with white labour we ought to extend a helping hand and preserve the sugar industry for Australia as a whole. There is no proposal to deprive the House of any power; on the contrary, there is an attempt to honestly and justly carry into effect the existing law. We ought not to do anything to place obstacles in the way of a policy to which we are pledged and which we desire to see carried into effect. All that the Treasurer proposes are such powers as will enable the Minister, after consultation with his officers, to fix a date which will tend to the efficient carrying out of the policy. I hope the Committee will grant the powers asked for, because I am sure they will render valuable assistance to the industry, not only in Queensland, but throughout the Commonwealth.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—I have no objection to give the Minister any powers which we cannot properly define ourselves. So long, however, as we can accurately define the powers we desire to see exercised, we have no right to place in the hands of a Minister, who may now or in the future administer the Act, any such option as that proposed. By the change of a single day the Minister, under this Bill, would be able to put into or take out of the pockets of the people in this community thousands of pounds. There are honorable members on both sides of the Committee whose intention is similar and easily defined: and we have no right to remit extraordinary powers to any Minister when our intention can be made clear in words. The honorable member for Richmond desires the removal of any restriction which would prevent the bonus being paid in the case of a crop produced by white labour but grown from roots which, it may be, had lain in the ground for four or five years. That is my desire, and the desire, I believe, of other honorable members who may object to the proposal as it appears in the Bill. We have, in the words of the honorable member for Richmond, given absolution in the case of a crop partly produced or grown by coloured labour prior to February, 1902. But I am against giving the bonus in the case of any crop—by this I do not mean the root or stool from which the crop is grown—on which black labour has been employed after that date. I do not think that the Minister proposes that the bonus should be paid in the latter case.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not.

Mr. THOMSON.—But the powers asked for would enable the Minister to give the bonus under such circumstances. Why should we give the Minister powers which he says he does not propose to exercise?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Because we cannot fix the date here.

Mr. THOMSON.—There is no need to fix the date. I do not profess to be a draftsman, but surely we have sufficient legal skill in the Chamber to make it clear that, whilst there will be no restriction in the case of cane coming from an old root or stool, there will be no bonus for a crop which has been produced by black labour for any portion of the time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—What does the honorable member mean by "crop"?

Mr. THOMSON.—Has the Minister never heard of a crop of peaches? Does such a crop mean the peaches, or the trees from which they come?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I have never heard of a "crop" of peaches, or of a "crop" of sugar.

Mr. THOMSON.—Without using strict legal phraseology, I suggest that words such as the following be inserted in the clause after the word "Commonwealth"— in respect of each crop in the growth and harvesting of which white labour only has been employed.

Is not that the meaning of the Committee?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No; the Committee want to go further.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is not exactly the meaning of the Committee, because the suggestion of the honorable member for North Sydney would apply to a crop planted, say, this year by black labour, and harvested perhaps two years hence by white labour.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is the very thing to which I am objecting. This legislation becomes a sham when we encourage people to employ black labour in planting, and then to ask the Minister to so fix the date that they may employ white labour for a short period, and qualify for the bonus. It must be remembered that after the period to which the Pacific Island Labourers Act applies there will be a lot of floating black labour in Queensland, and that planters will have opportunities of employing either that or white labour. I do not object to the employment of black labour if it is there, and planters wish to have it; but I object to the bonus for white labour being given in any case except where white labour is used. The reason for originally fixing the 28th February, 1902, as the date was that no notice had been given to people who would use white labour but had had a certain amount of work done by coloured men; and it was considered unfair to exclude these people if they chose to dispense with the latter by that date. Now it is proposed to fix the 28th February for every year, and to give the bonus although it may be a two years' crop and black labour may have been employed for twelve months or more. That is a most extraordinary proposal. The crop, properly speaking, is that which is cut from the sugar cane at a given time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The cutting of the crop commences about June or July. I should go further back.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Treasurer would not go further back than I should, because I say that all the crop ought to be produced by white labour. It is proposed to fix the date in February, and it is only from February to July that white labour would be necessary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The honorable member would go back to the original planting.

Mr. THOMSON.—I would not go back to the original stools or root. Sometimes sugar-cane is left in the ground, and like other trees—because it is a kind of tree—it branches out, and may be cut after a period varying from a year and a quarter to two years. This is the cutting of the crop; and here lies the objection to the proposal of the Treasurer. The right honorable gentleman suggests the 28th February as a suitable time to fix each year, and if this be done, black labour employed prior to that date on the year's crop would be absolved, leaving only about four months for white labour. That is an extraordinary proposal after all the flourish of trumpets about encouraging the use of white labour. Whatever we may think on the question of white v. black labour, we entered into this legislation on certain conditions; and yet we are now asked to extend the operation of the Act to a degree never contemplated—to continue indefinitely up to 1907 the payment of a bonus on sugar on which white labour has been employed for only four months out of sixteen, or even 24 months. I am not prepared to give the Minister the powers asked for; especially am I not prepared to give powers which may affect residents of the Commonwealth to the extent of £2,000 to £4,000 on each crop. This might be the effect of the difference of a single day, or a week, or two or three weeks, or a month in the gazettement of the notice. Such powers ought not to be given unless absolutely necessary; and they are not necessary in the present case. The proposal of the Minister would seem to mean that only four months of white labour need be given to earn the bonus; and, if that be so, it is a most extraordinary proceeding to which I do not see my way to agree. It will be an acknowledgment of incapacity if we are not capable of expressing our meaning in the Bill.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I quite agree with the honorable member for North Sydney, that if we can possibly express in the Bill what we mean we should do so, and not give power to any Minister to make regulations for carrying out what are the main principles of the measure. My suggestion is that we should leave the clause precisely as at present only adding the following words:—

Provided that, after the coming into operation of this Act, the grower registers his intention to grow with white labour only twelve months prior to such delivery.

The season varies in different parts of Australia, and each grower knows when his season commences. This applies alike to the grower in Northern Queensland and the grower on the Manning River; and, under my suggestion, it would be left open to them to register twelve months before delivery. But we certainly should ask the Government to put into the measure some guarantee, because I can assure the Committee that I have suffered more heavily, perhaps, than any man in the Commonwealth from the operation of the "white Australia policy." I am not prepared to make that sacrifice again for growers who employ black labour to within four months of the delivery of the cane to the mill. It may be that, as the Bill makes no provision for registration, it will be necessary to insert in it a clause providing for registration under the regulations. The words—

Provided that after the coming into operation of this Act

apply only to future cases. Persons will be able to go to the nearest Custom-house, and there apply to be registered as growers who intend to employ white labour only for the twelve months preceding their next delivery. If that provision is made, the Minister will not have to seek expert advice in regard to delivery, because the growers themselves will declare when they intend to deliver. I think the adoption of the proviso which I suggest will meet the well-founded objections to the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—I move—

That after the word "Commonwealth," line 4, the following words be inserted:—"in respect to each crop."

That amendment will test the whole question.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I think that an excellent reason why the Committee should not go further than the provisions of the Tariff Excise Act is that the whole matter was there settled according to a certain agreement, under which the rebate upon sugar-cane was to be 4s. a ton, for all cane delivered for manufacture in the production of which white labour only had been employed, after 28th February, 1902. Both the excise and import duties were settled on the basis of that agreement, and therefore when dealing with the Bill, which was introduced merely to alter the manner of payment by substituting a bonus for a rebate, we should not try to alter the original arrangement. I hope that the Treasurer will upon consideration see his way to withdraw this debatable provision.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I think the Committee are pretty well at one in their desires in this matter. No one wishes to see black labour employed to within two or three months of the delivery of the sugar-cane.

Mr. THOMSON.—As we know what we want, we ought to provide for the carrying out of our intentions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am certain that no Minister would prescribe such a date as would enable the course to be taken to which honorable members object.

Mr. BAMPFORD.—We are not sure of that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—The Minister should not have the power.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not see why not. In every Act we have passed, the Government of the day have been intrusted with far larger powers.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—We should not repeat the mistake we made when we passed the Customs Act.

Mr. THOMSON.—We should not trust any Minister if we can express our intention in the Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I feel certain that if the amendment is agreed to no one will be able to say what the words mean. I do not wish growers to obtain bonuses for sugar-cane which has not been grown wholly by white labour, and I am, therefore, prepared to ask the Attorney-General to frame an amendment to provide that if black labour has been used in connexion with the production of cane within nine months previous to its delivery no rebate shall be given.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Why not make it twelve months?

Mr. THOMSON.—Nine months is only half the time the crop is growing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am not an expert in the cultivation of sugar-cane, and therefore I am prepared to accept advice from those who represent constituencies in which cane is grown as to what is the proper term to provide for.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Let each grower register.

Mr. THOMSON.—Why not provide that a bonus shall not be paid in respect to any crop in the production of which black labour has been used?

Mr. KENNEDY.—The trouble is to frame a definition.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not think we can frame a satisfactory definition. I think that the original provision, giving the Minister power to make regulations subject to the approval of Parliament is the best. At the same time, I do not object to the fixing of some reasonable period.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I think that the proposed amendment involves a very serious innovation upon the compact upon which our "white Australia" legislation was adopted, and I am surprised that the subject has been introduced in Committee as if it were an after-thought on the part of the Minister. I understood that the Bill was introduced merely to substitute bonuses for rebates, so that the expense of maintaining a white Australia should be federalized by being divided equally among the States, and although the proposed change imposes an additional burden on the State which I represent, I am willing to agree to it on that ground. But I think that before we make any alteration in the original compact we should take time to consider the whole matter. There seems to be great difference of opinion as to what is the proper form for the proposed amendment, and I, for one, should not like to vote on the question this evening. I doubt, indeed, whether it is wise to amend the Bill at all. I think it would be better to confine its provisions to their original scope, and let this new matter stand over. I object to the granting of bonuses to those who go on growing cane for a considerable time with black labour. There will be great difficulty in obtaining support in the sacrifice which we are making to create a white Australia if growers who employ black labour up to within a short time of the delivery of their cane are to be allowed to obtain a bonus.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—I agree with the honorable and learned member for Bendigo that it would be as well if the Committee had more time to consider the amendment. For my own part, I am much in favour of the clause as it stands. Those who knew anything of the subject are aware that the Commonwealth has been imposed upon to some extent in this matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I undertake to prosecute any case brought before me. We have done so already, and some persons have been fined.

Mr. BAMFORD.—There have been cases in which the cane was cut with white labour and then black labour was put on to the field again, and yet the growers were able to obtain rebates. I gave the Minister a specific instance in which this had been done, and he framed a regulation to prevent it. Within the present month the Premier of Queensland has been in the northern part of that State, and has advised cane-planters to bring over Chinamen from the Northern Territory, because there is no restriction which can prevent their introduction.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—I thought he advised them to endeavour to grow cane with white labour only.

Mr. BAMFORD.—He gave both kinds of advice. He often does that.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—That is not my experience of him.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Perhaps the honorable member's experience of him is limited. I advise the Treasurer to leave the matter as it stands. I am sorry that the Minister for Trade and Customs is not here, because he could throw a great deal of light upon the subject. The extension of the time to the 1st March was declared by some of the northern newspapers to be a sign of weakness on the part of the Federal Government. They said that the Parliament had no faith whatever in its own legislation, and that we extended the time for registration because we recognised that white men could not do the work. If the time is extended as is now proposed, they will say that the cry for a white Australia is a sham, and, unless the clause is allowed to stand, and the regulations are very drastically administered, our law will not be worth the paper upon which it is written. I might be expected to support the amendment, because I represent a sugar-growing district; but my experience has been such that I feel called upon to resist any proposal unless it takes the direction I have indicated.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I also represent a sugar-growing district, and I entirely differ from the honorable member for Herbert. I had not previously heard of the case which the honorable member has cited, and I very much regret to learn that any one was allowed to do as he has described, and to obtain the rebate. I do not know under what authority Ministers acted in paying the rebate if black labour were employed. The Minister for Trade and Customs could very well have refused registration. If the clause is allowed to stand, no one will be permitted to come in.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Yes, they will, because the regulations already provide for that.

Mr. FISHER.—The crop may be ploughed out, but still the planter will not be able to escape the fact that black labour has been employed on the land. Does the honorable member seriously argue that the results of the employment of black labour must be destroyed before the planter is entitled to earn the rebate?

Mr. BAMFORD.—Yes, I do.

Mr. FISHER.—Then I cannot agree with the honorable member. Reasonable opportunities should be allowed to those planters who have labour contracts to discharge. They have entered into contracts under the statute law and the regulations of the State relating to the employment of kanakas, and are bound to employ the islanders for the term for which they were hired. These agreements terminate from time to time, but the honorable member apparently desires to compel the growers to break their agreements. I cannot agree with him in that view, because I think that the planters should be permitted to employ the kanakas for the full term necessary to enable them to complete their contracts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—But the honorable member would not give the employers of the kanakas any bonus.

Mr. FISHER.—Not while they are employing black labour; but I should allow any one and every one to come in if they employed white labour from the taking off of one crop to the production of another.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—That would be for twelve months.

Mr. FISHER.—It might be for twelve months, or a little more, or a little less. I think very few crops are taken off within less than twelve months, but there may be exceptional instances. It would be wrong for us to enact that no other planters should be allowed to register their plantations, and I hope that the Committee will not follow the suggestion of the honorable member for Herbert. The impression left upon my mind is that, if the honorable member has his way, any planter who is now employing black labour will not be able to obtain the bonus offered for the employment of white labour unless he ploughs up every vestige of vegetation upon the cultivation of which black labour has been engaged.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER.—I am entirely against the honorable member on that point. Why should we destroy the results of the employment of capital and labour in that way?

Mr. BAMFORD.—Why did the planters not take advantage of the Act before?

Mr. FISHER.—For the reason which I have stated. They have to carry out certain contracts in connexion with the employment of kanaka labour. I do not suppose that the honorable member will follow up the line of argument which he has adopted, because he must see that the Committee could not support him. I think that such a period should be fixed as would afford every reasonable facility for earning the bonus, and that we should not destroy the results which have been brought about by the employment of much capital and labour for the sake of mere sentiment.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I can bear out what the honorable member for Herbert has stated, because while I was in Northern Queensland, I had brought under my notice cases in which notwithstanding that black labour had been employed in the cultivation of the cane up to a certain point, the growers had registered on the 30th March and had been able to secure the rebate. In view of these circumstances such restrictions should be imposed that if planters desire to earn the bonus they must cultivate their cane wholly by means of white labour. Upon all the plantations a large area is annually set out for a new crop, and if growers desire to obtain the rebate they can start by employing white labour solely upon the newly planted area. Then they will obviate the necessity of having to plough out the results of previous cultivation. I was very much surprised when it was pointed out to me that it was possible to cultivate cane with black labour, and still to obtain the rebate. I thought that was simply ridiculous, and when the instances mentioned by the honorable member for Herbert were quoted, I was perfectly staggered. I know that this cannot be done now under the regulations, but it has been done. We should put our foot down very firmly, and make the planters understand that they must use white labour wholly in the cultivation of sugar upon which any rebate is to be claimed.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—I think that it was principally through my intercession with the Minister for Trade and Customs that the time for registration was extended to 1st March last. When I was in Northern Queensland during the recess, I was waited upon at Cairns and other places by planters, who asked me if I would use my influence with the Minister to have this concession granted. I consented to do so, but told them plainly that, so far as I was personally concerned, I would not go one day beyond 1st March. I told them that they were not entitled to any further extension of time; that they had had every opportunity of taking advantage of the provisions of the Act, if they had chosen to do so, but that they were so wedded to black labour that they would not give it up. Therefore, I said that if they wanted the rebate they would have to make another start. I hold that view still.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—So far as I can understand the original amendment and all the suggested modifications, they lead to the one result, namely, a very large increase in the bonus towards which all the States will have to contribute.

Mr. THOMSON.—Not the amendment—that leaves the matter in its present position.

Mr. McCAY.—The proposal of the Government does, but the amendment of the honorable member for South Sydney will extend the facilities offered under the Bill.

Mr. THOMSON.—No; because the Government have already been paying the rebate under that system.

Mr. McCAY.—That is just the point. The Government have been paying the rebate under a system not authorized by the Excise Act.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Not paying the rebate. I have held back the balance which might in strictness have been paid to the States, but I have not paid any rebate.

Mr. McCAY.—The Treasurer proposes to make payments which are at present not authorized by the Excise Act, which forbids the payment of any rebate in regard to sugar produced by the employment of black labour after 28th February, 1902. As I understand, the Government has extended the time of repentance to 1st March, 1903, or rather they have promised to do so. Perhaps the Treasurer can inform the Committee whether a promise has been given to the growers that they shall be entitled to the payment of the bonus on sugar produced by white labour from the 1st March, 1903.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—As far as I have been able to make inquiries, I understand that that is so. A regulation to that effect was passed and laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. McCAY.—Honorable members do not always see regulations which are laid upon the table, nor do they always read them when they appear in that interesting publication, the Government Gazette. I should like to know where the legislative authority for such a practice is to be found. The Excise Tariff Act declares that the excise duty upon manufactured sugar shall be "3s. per cwt. until the 1st January, 1907, less, from the 1st July, 1902, a rebate to the grower of sugar-cane and beet. The rebate in the case of sugar-cane to be 4s. per ton on all sugar-cane delivered for manufacture, and in the production of which white labour only has been employed after 28th February, 1902." It then goes on to explain how the rebate is to be calculated. To my mind that is a specific legislative decree that no sugar-cane shall be entitled to the rebate unless it has been white-grown from the 28th February, 1902. If a promise such as that to which I have referred has been given, and if people have acted upon the faith of it, Parliament might feel bound to give effect to it. But I am very dubious of the propriety of adopting any such amendment as that suggested by the Treasurer, which would vest the Minister with power to fix dates, so that the bonus might be claimed upon sugar which had been worked by white labour only after those dates. It seems to me that under such an arrangement it would be possible for a great many growers—seeing that they cut their cane at different periods—to cultivate it by black labour till it had reached a very advanced stage, and then to cut it by white labour, so that they might claim the bonus upon it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It all depends upon the date fixed by the Minister.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not think so, because I understand that cane is cut as early as May and as late as September.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—It depends on the season.

Mr. McCAY.—It depends upon the season and the locality in which the cane is grown. The same date would not be applicable to all districts. If the Minister is to fix different dates for different districts—that is an exercise of Ministerial discretion which is open to objection because the Minister cannot be like Caesar's wife, above suspicion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Parliament has already empowered him to pay a rebate upon cane according to standard.

Mr. McCAY.—The rebate is based upon the practical result of the cane crushing. Parliament could not determine what percentage of sugar was contained in sugar-cane. Both in this House and elsewhere I have protested against vesting the Executive with what is practically legislative authority which can be exercised by Parliament itself. If we could dispense with regulations altogether it would be a good thing in many ways. That, however, is impossible, and therefore we have to abandon the principle to a certain extent because of the necessities of the case. At the same time we should strive to guard against the chance of any grower taking advantage of the exact wording of an Act of Parliament or a regulation. I suppose there are growers, even in Queensland, who would consider it right, so long as they kept within the letter of the regulation, to draw bonuses which Parliament never intended to give them. It behoves us to be careful that we do not allow the growers to employ black labour, and at the same time to participate in the benefit conferred by the operation of a bonus. That is the danger against which we have to guard. The Committee have been taken by surprise by the proposal to extend the terms of the bargain which was made at the time that the Excise Tariff Act was passed. No question of this kind was then raised. I do not think that any of the honorable members, who now point out the desirableness of making an alteration, recognised this disability or suggested any proposal in connexion therewith. Whilst all the States—even Victoria—which is the biggest sufferer by the nationalization of these bounties—are prepared to pay their share of this "new" expenditure for the sake of the Commonwealth as a whole, it is only right that they should be protected against any possibility of results such as those to which I have referred. It would have been much better, I think, if this matter had been brought before honorable members earlier, so that they might have been allowed an opportunity to give it more careful consideration. The amendment which have been suggested this afternoon show that the mind of the Committee is not crystallized on the matter. Personally, I am in some doubt as to what action I should take. Under the circumstances, I feel inclined either to abide by the Bill as it stands, or, at the utmost, to go to the length of the concession which the Minister for Trade and Customs seems to have promised, namely, to extend the right to participate in the payment of the bonus to growers who have employed white labour since the 28th February of this year. Even of that I am dubious, but beyond that I am not disposed to go, though I am open to conviction as to the wisdom of the course which I at present fear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The Excise Tariff Act, I would remind honorable members, has been administered by the Minister for Trade and Customs. He is exceptionally busy upon some other measures, and as it partook somewhat of the nature of the Treasury matter, I agreed to take charge of this Bill. I knew that some alteration had been made under the Excise Tariff Act with regard to the date after which the bonus should be payable on sugar produced by white labour. I was under the impression that the desire was to allow those who had been using black labour to get rid of it gradually, and to come under the provisions relating to the employment of white labour. I still feel that that is the right course to pursue if it is practicable. But many difficulties have been raised during the course of this discussion which I should like time to consider. I also desire to consult the Minister for Trade and Customs, who is charged with the administration of the Act. Therefore, if the honorable member for North Sydney will withdraw his amendment, I shall be prepared to allow the clause to pass in its present form, and to recommit it to-morrow, so that honorable members may have a further opportunity of discussing it. Perhaps I may then be able to tell the Committee that the alteration proposed should be made, or that it should be effected only to the extent mentioned by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, or that it should go further.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Why not postpone the clause?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I would much rather pass it, and have it recommitted.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—After the remarks of the Treasurer, I have much pleasure in withdrawing my amendment, and allowing the clause to pass in its present form.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moira).—The Committee occupies very much the same position in regard to this clause as it did when the discussion commenced. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has referred to an extension of the provision contained in the Excise Tariff Act to 1st March, 1903. Practically, that is an extension for one year. I understand that it applies only to the crop for the ensuing year. It was never intended that the Excise Tariff Act should debar sugar-growers who produced their sugar by black labour in 1902 and 1903 from participating in the rebate granted by Parliament, provided that they grow their sugar by white labour in 1905.

Mr. MCCAY.—My remarks referred to sugar which has been planted by black labour since 28th February, 1902, and from which a second crop will be taken in 1905.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Act states that the rebate shall be payable upon sugar cane or beet in the production of which white labour only has been employed. I should like to know whether the word "production" includes every operation that is necessary in the cultivation of the land for three or four years prior to the harvesting of the crops?

Mr. THOMSON.—I understand that under that provision rebate has already been allowed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Because the Act provided for it.

Mr. KINGSTON.—There was an original provision that nothing done before a certain date should invalidate the claims.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The amendment suggested by the honorable member for North Sydney is in line with my own views upon this question, as it would insure that black labour would not be utilized in the cultivation at any time in a particular year of a crop on which the bonus was paid.

Mr. THOMSON.—That if it had been, we should not pay the bonus upon that crop.

Mr. KENNEDY.—So far my views are in line with those expressed by the honorable member, and the difficulty is to find words to convey that intention in such a way that it shall be open to no doubt, and that there can be no extension whatever of the concession beyond the desire of this House. The section in the Excise Act leaves a doubt in my mind as to the possibility of the sugar-grower coming in at some period subsequent to 1902 if he has made use of any black labour at all in the planting of a crop, and, if he ceases to use black labour in 1903 or 1904. I think that under that section he would be debarred from taking advantage of the bonus provisions of this Bill, and I do not think that that was ever contemplated. What was contemplated was that no sugar-grower should be entitled to a bonus upon sugar in the production of which black labour had been employed. It was not intended to apply where black labour was employed only in the preparation of the land and planting of the cane, provided that subsequently white labour had been employed in the cultivation of the crop, and for a period of at least twelve months before the time when the cane was carted to the mill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The Excise Act as it stands would shut that sugar out.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That was the doubt in my mind, that as it stands the Excise Act would shut out any sugar in the production of which black labour was employed at any time after the 28th February, 1902.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes; the grower would have had to cease the use of black labour on that date.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Does that mean that any sugar cane on which black labour has been employed after that date could not take advantage of the rebate provision?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That is the meaning of the law as it stands. If any black labour whatever has been used after the 28th February, 1902, no rebate can be granted upon the crop so produced. What is meant by the law as passed is that a man must prepare his ground afresh, plant his cane, and cultivate it entirely by white labour, and that I think is too harsh.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That was not contemplated.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Act is not administered in that way.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No operations under it have yet arisen.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I should think that when we have regulations, providing for an extension of the time from February, 1902, to March, 1903, that is an indication that the Act is not going to be administered in that direction.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That applies to the coming crop; but those regulations are being challenged as being outside the Act.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What I desire to get at is whether the Excise Act prevents our extending the provisions of the Bonus Bill to sugar in the production of which, after 1902, no black labour has been employed.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The date has already been extended.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes, by regulations, which are challenged as being outside the Act.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I should like to know whether those regulations are valid, and whether the Excise Act is to be so interpreted that a bonus may be paid upon sugar manufactured in 1905, and in the production of which no black labour has been employed for say, twelve months prior to the cutting of the cane and its being carted to the mill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—A rebate could not be granted upon that sugar under the Excise Act as it stands.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is there not power under the Act to extend the provisions?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—There is the general power to make regulations.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I believe that the consensus of opinion in the Committee is that that should be allowed. My impression when the Excise Act was under consideration was that power was given under that Act to pay the bonus upon sugar grown in any particular year up to 1907, if it had been grown entirely by white labour. To confirm that opinion I would point out that the Excise Act was simply a corollary of the Pacific Island Labourers Act, under which we took power to restrict the importation of kanakas. No one who discussed that measure lost sight of the fact that a number of sugar-planters had black labour under contract, and could not dispense with it prior to 1902, 1903, or even 1904, and it was felt that as soon as they could dispense with that labour and substitute white labour for it, they should receive consideration under the rebate provisions. I never for a moment imagined that the Excise Act would debar us from extending the provisions of the rebate to sugar grown by white labour after 1902.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Calculation of bonus on sugar cane).

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I would point out that as it is suggested that we shall depart from the original scope of the Bill, which was merely to convert the rebate previously provided for into a bonus, we might as well consider this clause under which the bonus is proposed to be 4s. per ton. I remind all who are interested in the sugar business, that according to the figures taken both from Queensland and New South Wales, the cost of treating a ton of cane varies from something like 2s. 11d. for cane produced by black labour to 3s. 5d. a ton for cane produced by white labour. There is therefore a difference of only 6d. per ton in the cost of cane produced by white labour as against that produced by black labour. We might go further, and admit a difference of 1s. per ton, and yet honorable members will see that by this clause it is proposed to allow 4s. per ton. If this Bill were merely intended to provide for a bonus instead of the existing rebate, I scarcely think that I should press my objection; but if it is proposed to go very much further than the original Excise Act, and practically enter upon an entirely new understanding, it is high time that the people of the States who are being asked to contribute should know what they are contributing for. They should understand distinctly that according to Coghlan they are being asked to contribute just eight times as much as is necessary to cover the difference in the cost of production between the employment of white and black labour.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Coghlan's figures apply to New South Wales only.

Mr. CONROY.—According to Coghlan the position is slightly worse for Queensland than it is for New South Wales, because he shows that in the total cost of production of a ton of sugar there is a difference of 39s. in favour of Queensland as against New South Wales. He points out that this is partly due to the difference in the cost of labour, and is due also to one or two other considerations. At that rate Queensland could afford to take 3s. 6d. per ton less.

Mr. EWING.—The honorable and learned member will perhaps explain to the Committee that Coghlan is dealing only with the growing of the cane, and not with the cutting and crushing.

Mr. CONROY.—The figures given by Coghlan deal with the growing and cutting, not with the treatment in the mill, but with the total cost up to the time the cane is received in the mill. The honorable and learned member will probably recollect that Coghlan includes in his figures something like 9d. per ton of cane as the cost of transport from the field to the mill. He explains that the cost of transport is less in Queensland owing to the better facilities there provided by small railways and tramways and the proximity of central mills. He gives figures showing a cost of something like 12s. 2d. for Queensland and 16s. 3d. for New South Wales.

Mr. EWING.—That is for the growing of the cane.

Mr. CONROY.—It is for the growing of the cane and its whole treatment until it reaches the mill, and the figures given include the price paid for the cane, which is something like 10s. or 11s. per ton.

Mr. EWING.—Those figures refer to the growing of the cane, and do not embrace thrashing and cutting in which black labour is employed.

Mr. CONROY.—If the honorable and learned member will again refer to Coghlan he will find that his figures cover the cost of thrashing and cutting and the transport of the cane to the mill. He points out that 2s. 11d. is the lower rate for black labour, and 3s. 5d. is the rate for white labour, the difference being 6d. per ton. In this Bill we are asked to vote as a bonus eight times that amount. If we say that instead of 6d. the difference in cost between sugar produced by white labour and that produced by black labour is 1s. per ton, we are then being asked to vote four times as much as we should. If it is intended to depart from the provisions of the old rebate arrangement in the way which has been proposed we should certainly consider whether we should not also depart from the provisions of clause 3 of this Bill.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I referred only to the method of contribution.

Mr. CONROY.—If the honorable member for Moira, as indeed I understood him, only referred to the method of contribution, I cannot include him amongst those who appear to desire that the whole question should be re-opened. Under the last clause the suggestion was made that despite the provision in the Excise Act we should extend the bonus to all sugar produced by white labour after February, 1902, and if there is to be a re-opening of the whole question, I think I shall be justified in raising the matter of the amount of bonus to be paid, and in suggesting that 4s. per ton is too much. If the Bonus Bill is brought forward, as I understood it was to be, purely in the place of the existing rebate provision, and if, so far as possible, exactly the same conditions are to prevail, I shall not discuss the matter further; but if we are to go into the whole question again, I submit that it is our duty to consider the present position, and not to act as we acted in times past, hurriedly and without the consideration that a measure of this sort should receive. If I am assured by the Treasurer that in the event of clause 2 being altered in the way which has been suggested, we shall be given another opportunity of discussing clause 3, I shall be satisfied.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I shall try to meet the honorable member.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 6 agreed to.

Clause 7—

All rebates of excise duty on sugar paid before the commencement of the Act shall be taken to have been paid as bonuses under this Act.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON (South Australia).—I intimated when speaking upon the second reading of this Bill, that I think it proposes the introduction of a very bad system in our legislation. Utterly irrespective of the sentimental aspect given to the question by some honorable members, it is misleading to make a surcharge virtually upon the various States for sums of money which they have received, and which the Government now think should be contributed by them towards making up this rebate of excise duty. Some honorable members have said that when the rebate was proposed, they were under the impression that it was to be divided per capita amongst the people of the Commonwealth as the establishment of a white Australia and the encouragement of white labour on our sugar-fields was a national question, and to this extent I have no doubt that many honorable members did consider that some sacrifice on the part of the States was necessary. It is pointed out in the papers which the Treasurer has kindly handed to us that one of the States which would be in a somewhat bad position owing to the existing system of making a reduction in the rate of excise merely on white-grown sugar, is New South Wales—a State which from the figures before us appears to have consumed by far the largest quantity of Australian-grown sugar. I would point out that when the Excise Tariff Bill was before us the question of the relative contributions by the States under its provisions did not arise. Those States which were likely to consume, and have consumed, the greater portion of the white-grown sugar of Queensland have been placed in this position—that instead of receiving a credit of £3 per ton excise duty on black-grown sugar, or £6 per ton Customs duty on imported white-grown sugar, they have received a credit to their revenue of only £1 per ton excise duty on white-grown sugar. I am not aware of the method which has been adopted by the Treasurer in the payment or distribution of this rebate to the growers. The Excise Tariff Act distinctly says—

The rebate to be allowed at the rate of £2 per ton on the sugar-giving contents of the beet. All rebates to be allowed at the time of delivery of the cane or beet on the ascertainment in manner prescribed of the sugar-giving contents.

The word “rebate” has a common every day meaning. It is simply an allowance in respect of white-grown sugar, and instead of charging £3 per ton excise duty to the grower, or producer, or manufacturer—that is, to the man who last handled it—as we do on black-grown sugar, we charge only £1 per ton. We charge £3 per ton virtually, but we make an allowance of £2 per ton, and that allowance was to be calculated on its sugar contents when the sugar was brought to the mill. I am a little in the dark by reason of the fact that I missed hearing a portion of the Treasurer's speech the other day, and I do not think that he has really explained the modus operandi which has been adopted with regard to the rebates. It appears to me that the clear reading of the Excise Tariff Act is that, having ascertained when the sugar-cane or beet was brought to the mill for treatment, and discovered by analysis the sugar contents of the sugar-cane or beet, it is then a question of whether its owner should pay an excise duty of £3 a ton, or whether he should pay an excise duty of £3 per ton with a rebate of £2 per ton—in other words, £1 per ton on the ascertained sugar contents. Whatever may have been understood by some honorable members, whatever may have been thought of the mode in which this loss of revenue by States consuming the white-grown sugar was to be regulated, it was not embodied in the Act, and the proposal to go back upon that legislation, and to ask the States to pay a sum of £60,000 in order to recoup to the States which have used the white-grown sugar the sum of £2 per ton rebate on that sugar seems to me grossly unjust. It is a bad departure in principle. It is extremely dangerous to go back on a legislative enactment which has been on the statute-book for twelve months, and under which certain sums have been paid and certain accounts have been adjusted with regularity between the States, and ask those States for a surcharge provided for by new legislation. It is a departure which, as regards the past, I cannot understand, but which, as regards the future, may be perfectly just, now that the question is raised for the first time in Parliament. That appears to me to be a strong point. I should like the Treasurer, by interjection, to enlighten me as to the manner in which the rebates have been paid or allowed. It is clear that the Excise Tariff Act contemplated a mere rebate or virtually the collection of £1 per ton on the sugar contents instead of £3 per ton. It provides that the rebate shall be allowed at the rate of £2 per ton on the sugar-giving contents of the cane or beet, at the time of the delivery of the cane or beet on the ascertainment of the sugar-giving contents in the manner prescribed. Where is the delivery of the cane or beet to be made? Undoubtedly it is to be made to the mill or place of treatment where the sugar contents are to be ascertained, and the excise duty of £1 per ton collected from the producer of the sugar, which would give him the advantage of a protection of 5 per ton against foreign sugar. That was considered by many honorable members on this side to be a very high rate of protection—such a rate as would encourage the growth and production of sugar by European labour. Section 93 of the Constitution Act distinctly says that—

The duties of excise paid on goods produced or manufactured in a State, and afterwards passing into another State for consumption, shall be taken to have been collected, not in the former but in the latter State.

That is to say, that the State where a ton of this sugar is consumed shall be credited with the excise duty. What excise duty? Surely the Treasurer will not tell me that he has first credited the States with the £3 per ton excise duty, and then debited them with the £2 per ton rebate—that a host of financial operations have had to be gone through, instead of the simple operation contemplated by the Excise Tariff Act of collecting and crediting to the States only £1 per ton on the sugar contents of white-grown cane, instead of £3. I cannot understand the Government not seeing that—whether this policy is one which Australia will approve of in the future or not—it is an injustice to pass retrospective legislation, and to go back on our previous legislation. I trust that the good sense of the Committee will see that it is inadvisable and unfair at this very early stage of our existence, not only to amend our legislation, but to go in for a retrospective surcharge on the various States, which will be a tax on some of their revenues.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The question of fixing the mode of dealing with the rebate, as it was unfortunately called, on white-grown sugar gave the House a considerable amount of trouble. We were all anxious that the rebate should go to the grower of the cane, and we knew well that, if we had an excise duty paid by the manufacturer of the sugar and allowed the rebate off the duty, then there might be a little difficulty about the whole of the rebate getting back to the grower. The Act provides for an excise duty of £3 per ton on the manufactured sugar, and we are bound to collect that sum. We cannot collect only £1 per ton. The Act tells us that on the manufactured sugar we are to collect the excise duty. My honorable friend opposite seems to think that we ought to collect the excise duty from the grower when he takes his cane to the mill, but that would be utterly impracticable.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Or from the mill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We collect the Excise duty when the sugar produced from the cane goes into consumption, and it is not collected for many months after we have had to pay the rebate to the growers—in some cases probably fifteen or eighteen months, because a considerable stock is carried over from one year to the other.

Mr. HIGGINS.—At what stage is the rebate paid?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We pay the rebate to the grower immediately the sugar-cane is delivered at the mill. Our authorised officers at the mill give a certificate which is equal to cash. It is cashed on presentation at the Treasury or other convenient places throughout the State.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The rebate is paid on a sum which has not been collected?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Certainly. "Rebate" may not have been the right word to use, but it was very difficult to find a word which would have better answered our purpose. But the object was perfectly clear—that the grower immediately he delivered his cane at the mill should be entitled to receive his certificate, and to get that certificate cashed as quickly as possible afterwards. The mode adopted in administration has enabled him to get that money within a day or two of the delivery of his cane at the mill. The excise itself can only be collected on the sugar produced from the cane, and that is collected from persons entirely different from those who grow the cane. There is no other means of carrying out the Act in a fair and reasonable manner than by adopting that practice, which gives to the grower what Parliament intended, 4s. per cwt. for sugar grown by white labour.

Mr. WILKS.—As a subsidy.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—As a subsidy to enable the grower to make up for the loss—though the honorable and learned member for Werriwa says there is very little loss—supposed to be caused by the employment of white labour instead of black. When we had to pay this rebate we had no money appropriated by Parliament for that purpose; and the only course open to me was to take whatever excise was collected, put it in a trust fund, and pay the rebates out of it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—What about section 89 of the Constitution, requiring that money to be paid to the States?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I continued to do that until I saw how the matter was working out. I quite admit that, in strictness, I might have been bound to hand the money over to the States as collected.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Bound by the Constitution, in exclusive terms.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No doubt.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The Treasurer still has that money?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes; and shall hold it until Parliament directs it to be distributed. But what is the difference? Suppose I had paid the money over to the States, I should still have asked Parliament to allow the charge to be borne on a population basis. What I did made not the slightest difference to the States, except that if I had handed the money over to them, they might have spent it and might have found it very awkward at the end of the year, when they expected to receive a certain amount, to discover that they were not to get any money from the Treasury at all. Looking at the matter from a fair and equitable point of view, I thought that I was perfectly justified, until Parliament had an opportunity of dealing with this matter—because the matter arose after Parliament had ceased to sit at the end of last session; it came under my notice in the middle of the next January—in saying—“In the interim I will place this money in a trust fund until Parliament has an opportunity of saying whether the charge shall be distributed on a population basis or not.” I took the proper course. When Parliament deals with the matter the money which is still in the trust fund and amounts to a considerable sum will be distributed within 48 hours. While it was not in strict compliance with the terms of the Constitution to do as I did, I think it was the right and proper thing to do under the circumstances. No one is injured, because, as I have pointed out, had I paid over the money to the States and Parliament directed that the charge was to be borne on a population basis, I should simply have had to make a charge against the States after they had had the money and spent it. That would have been much worse for them.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Treasurer would never have got it back from them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I should have got it back by taking it out of the next money to be paid to them.

Mr. GLYNN.—Parliament would never have permitted that to be done.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The determination of the question rests with Parliament, whose hands are not tied. It is quite possible for Parliament to say that for this year the distribution shall be made on the old system, and that the new system shall apply only in the future. Parliament is not injured in any way. In fact, no one has been injured by the action which I took; and I consider that that action was amply justified, and was in the best interests of all the parties concerned in the distribution of the money. The question as to whether we ought or ought not to make this change apply to this year is one which has to be considered by the Committee. I think it is admitted on all hands that it is unfair to compel the States to pay in the mode in which the Act would have compelled them to pay. If it is unfair for the next and the following years, to my mind it is equally unfair for the past year. If it is wrong in principle, as we admit it is, to make the charge in one way, and we say that it is to be made in another way, surely we should begin by making the charge in a proper manner from the start. That was the object which I had in view—so that the hands of Parliament should not be tied, and so that the money should not be paid over to the States, with the consequence that it would have to be taken from them afterwards. I thought that the fairer plan was to keep the money in hand, so that Parliament might have an opportunity of dealing with the question.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—What money has the Treasurer kept in hand?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The whole of the excise collected, less rebate paid; with the exception that Queensland was anxious to have a certain amount of the sum due, and I advanced £25,000.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The Treasurer has only kept in hand £1 per ton for white-grown sugar?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes; I took the excise as it came into the Treasury, and charged the rebate to the trust fund. Then there were two of the States which required a sufficient amount of money by way of transfer to enable the rebate certificates to be honoured when they were produced. We had no other course open to us. We could not expect the growers to wait until the amounts were collected on the sugar produced from the cane—even if we could have distinguished which was the sugar produced by particular growers at that time, which we could not have done. We thought that they ought to have the money due to them at once, that the remainder of the money should be kept in a trust fund, and that Parliament should say whether the charge for this year was to be made on a population basis or a consumption basis. I say that we should adopt the same plan all through, whatever we do. We made a mistake at the beginning, and should rectify it from the beginning.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—The principle upon which we are acting is not sound. It is a bad thing for Parliament to go in for retrospective legislation. To Victoria alone, what is proposed makes a difference of £16,000, which I think the Treasurer of the State might very fairly expect to receive. It is true that very little difference is made to some of the States, but a marked difference is made in the case of others. The difference is on the plus side in regard to New South Wales. I think, however, that it will be very unwise of the Federal Parliament, especially at such an early stage of its history, to indulge in retrospective legislation, and I, for my part, shall oppose it. Therefore, I shall vote against the clause.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I am not aware that this clause is in the nature of retrospective legislation in the slightest degree, because this is the first opportunity that we have had of determining upon what basis the rebate charge shall be distributed throughout the Commonwealth.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—We had that opportunity when the primary legislation was framed.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That legislation only says that a rebate shall be paid to the growers from the revenue of the Commonwealth, and does not say in what manner it shall be charged. As far as I can understand, the Act is silent on that point, and this is the first opportunity that Parliament has had of determining it. So far as Victoria is concerned, she is quite prepared to deal with the question in that Federal spirit which, from time to time, we have been advised to adopt. From that point of view, I hope that the honorable and learned member for Werriwa will not press the question to a division. Victoria is quite prepared to bear her share of the cost of the policy of a white Australia. She is not going to suffer an irreparable loss even if this Bill is made retrospective to the extent of asking her to part with £16,000 out of last year's revenue.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9.—Application of Regulations in respect of rebates.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It is only fair to point out that this clause might be affected by, or affect clause 2. Clause 9 speaks of regulations already made, and under the circumstances I propose to ask the Committee to allow this clause to pass on the understanding that I will recommend it in connexion with clause 2.

SUGAR REBATE ABOLITION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 11th June (vide page 795), on motion by Sir GEORGE TURNER—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—As we have already passed a Bill to provide for a bonus on sugar, it seems to me that the measure before us is absolutely necessary; and, under the circumstances, I do not propose to discuss it. No matter what steps honorable members might think fit to take in regard to the Sugar Bonus Bill, we are bound to vote for the present measure.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time, and reported without amendment; report adopted.

JUDICIARY BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 11th June, vide page 842).

Clause 1.—(Short Title and Divisions.)

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—I move—

That clause 1 be postponed.

This is simply an index clause, the significance of which depends on what follows. Consequently, it would be better to deal with matters of substance as they arise, and to afterwards alter this clause to agree with the final determination of the Committee.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I ask the Attorney-General not to postpone this clause unless he also consents to postpone clause 3, which fixes the number of Judges who shall constitute the High Court. There is far more in the motion of the Attorney-General than will perhaps be at once grasped by honorable members. Unless we at once raise the question of the jurisdiction we are to vest in the Court, we cannot determine the number of Judges, and the Attorney-General, probably feeling that, asks us to take the extraordinary course of postponing the clause in order to prevent the possibility of the question of jurisdiction being raised at this stage. I desire to propose an amendment on clause 1, with a view of testing the question of the original jurisdiction of the High Court, but I shall not do so at this stage if clause 3 be also postponed. In the absence of any promise as to the postponement of the latter clause, the sooner we test the question of the original jurisdiction the better.

Mr. WATSON.—Some honorable members would, in any case like to see the question of the original jurisdiction raised on clause 75.

Mr. GLYNN.—I have given notice of an amendment on clause 1 which will immediately raise the question of the original jurisdiction, and this may have something to do with the anxiety of the Attorney-General to have the clause postponed. When the Bill was before us last week, the Attorney-General was particularly anxious that clause 1 should be passed at once as a merely formal clause, but I immediately asked that it should be discussed, with a view to its improvement by the omission of certain words. The amendment of which I have given notice would have the effect of confining the original jurisdiction of the High Court to the matters contemplated by section 75 of the Constitution.

Mr. WATSON.—We ought first to settle the jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN.—And this is a convenient clause on which to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In this matter I am entirely in the hands of the Committee. If honorable members are of opinion that we are in a position to deal with the questions raised on this purely index clause, I am prepared to deal with it, though to me that course appears most undesirable. When the Bill was last before us, I regarded it as a clause which might have been passed without question, because it must necessarily be amended to correspond with any alterations the Committee may make in other parts of the Bill. If clauses are altered substantially, the index to the Bill must necessarily be altered, and consequently I then regarded it as a matter of no importance. But the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr.

Glynn, sought on this clause to raise the question of the jurisdiction with which the court was to be invested, and that appeared to me so undesirable a course that I now propose a postponement of the clause instead of asking honorable members to pass it as a matter of form. If we deal with the question of jurisdiction, surely we had better deal with it on the clauses which specifically endow the court.

Mr. THOMSON.—What clause?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The clauses as we come to them. If the Committee prefer, however, to deal with the question of jurisdiction before touching the question of the number of Judges, I am prepared to postpone clause 3 along with clause 1. But I do not think that the most desirable method of procedure. I fear that the connexion or proportion to be established between the jurisdiction and the strength of the Bench cannot, even in the minds of professional members, be clear and beyond dispute. It is a matter on which every two professional men, in the Chamber or out of it, may well entertain different opinions. One professional man might say that if we gave the whole original jurisdiction asked for, it would mean another Judge or another two Judges, while a second professional man of equal experience might be of opinion that we could give that jurisdiction without adding a single member to the Bench. So far as I can judge, the discussion of the jurisdiction, and we must discuss it—the Bill—is not likely to effect the minds of honorable members in regard to the strength of the Bench in any precise way.

Mr. WATSON.—It will very materially.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If so, I am prepared to bow to the decision of the Committee; but my own opinion is that the discussion will not and cannot have such an effect. I will take no unfair advantage of the Committee, even though honorable members are under what appears to me to be a misapprehension. Therefore, if it be the general desire, I will agree to the postponement of clause 3 until the clauses dealing with the jurisdiction have been disposed of. If honorable members believe that the consideration of those clauses will afford them a better foundation for a specific decision as to the number of Judges to be appointed, I bow to their wish, though I think they are mistaken.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—Before we determine the number of Judges to be appointed, we should make up our minds as to the amount of work which they are to be called upon to perform. It is of no use to decide to appoint five Judges, and then to determine what work they shall do; we must determine the work to be done before we say how many Judges are to be appointed. I disagree with the Attorney-General when he says that the number of the Judges is not relevant to the amount of work to be assigned to the Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did not say that.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—If we assign to the Court only the constitutional original jurisdiction and an appellate jurisdiction, it will not have the same amount of work to perform as if the additional and optional jurisdiction relating not only to Federal matters, but to such matters as Admiralty cases and disputes between residents of the States, which belong absolutely to the States Courts, were assigned to it. The Bill also provides for the removal of suits in Federal matters from the States Courts to the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am prepared to omit that provision.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—If that provision is not omitted, and power to try criminal cases is also given to the Court, the Judges will have to be even more numerous than is now proposed. Five Judges will not be enough, and before the end of a year there would be a demand for an addition to their number.

Mr. GLYNN.—Would it not be better to test the question of jurisdiction upon this clause?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not think it would be convenient to do so.

Mr. GLYNN.—If we do not test it on this clause, it will be necessary to postpone a great many clauses.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I suggest the postponing of clauses 1, 2, and 3. Before we proceed further, we should deal with the question of jurisdiction. Afterwards we can decide how many Judges will be required.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—In support of the view put forward by the Attorney-General, I would remind the Committee that if we come to a decision as soon as possible as to whether the Court is to be merely an appellate court or a court of large original jurisdiction as well, we shall know how to deal with a number of subsequent clauses. I think we cannot too soon determine the jurisdiction of the Court. If it is to be almost wholly an appellate jurisdiction, many of us will say that three Judges are enough; but, if it is to exercise the wider jurisdiction provided for in the Bill, all legal members know that more than five Judges will be required. It will, however, be difficult to consider many of the clauses until we know what the jurisdiction of the Court is to be. I can understand honorable members saying that five Judges would be required even for an appellate court, on the ground that it would be better that the Judges should have a certain amount of spare time than that suitors should practically be denied justice by the delay and consequent expense in hearing causes. On the other hand, if the jurisdiction provided for by clause 40 is conferred, five Judges cannot be enough. If the Committee intend to determine the question of jurisdiction on clause 1, well and good. But if before dealing with the question of jurisdiction it is decided to limit the number of Judges, a great many of the clauses will have to be re-drafted, and the Attorney-General could not be expected to say on the spur of the moment what clauses should and what clauses should not be amended.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I agree with other honorable members that the question of jurisdiction is the vital substance of the Bill, upon which its other provisions hinge, and I suggest to the Attorney-General that, to get at the root of the matter, Parts I., II., and III., should be postponed, and that we should commence at clause 31 in Part IV. Although those parts are in their proper places, so far as the drafting of the Bill is concerned, they involve a hundred questions our decisions upon which will depend upon our determination in regard to Part IV.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I ask the Attorney-General to accept the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. It would be better to test the question of jurisdiction on clause 31 than, for reasons into which I need not enter now, to meddle with clause 1.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—I hope that the Attorney-General will agree to the postponement. I am sure that we do not think that he would take advantage of the Committee, but it is known that the question of jurisdiction and the number of the Judges are both agitating the minds of many honorable members, and as, if we decide to limit the jurisdiction of the Court and to reduce the number of the Judges, the reconstruction of a large portion of the Bill will be necessary, I think it would be well to postpone all clauses which might require redrafting until we have dealt with those questions.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—According to the legend inscribed on the pavement in the vestibule—"In the multitude of counsellors there is safety," but that saying is not borne out by what we have seen this evening. I am anxious to do what is right in connexion with this Bill, but the conflicting counsels of the legal members of the Committee leave me very much in a quandary. I do not agree with the honorable and learned member for Bendigo that if the Court were merely an appellate one there would not be enough work for five Judges, because my experience of Judges is that they are always overworked, and that the Bench is always undermanned. I think it would be better to decide the question at issue now, and thus save the waste of time which would be involved by dealing with clauses which might afterwards have to be re-considered.

Motion agreed to; clause postponed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have looked through the Bill, and have come to the conclusion that the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is, under the circumstances, the right one to adopt. My only apprehension is that there may be a disposition to determine the questions raised by the provisions of Part IV. without the full apprehension of the consequences which attach to any amendment of them. However, the responsibility in that matter will be mine, and if I am not able to bring my own conclusions home to honorable members in connexion with those clauses, I should be unable to do so in connexion with other clauses. I move—

That clauses 2 to 30 be postponed.

Motion agreed to; clauses postponed.

Clause 31—

In addition to the matters in respect whereof original jurisdiction is conferred on the High Court by the Constitution, the Court shall have original jurisdiction in respect of all matters—

- (a) arising under the Constitution, or involving its interpretation;
- (b) arising under any laws made by the Parliament;
- (c) of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;
- (d) relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different States.

Provided that, with respect to matters which are by the laws of the Commonwealth required to be instituted in courts of summary jurisdiction or other courts of inferior jurisdiction, the original jurisdiction of the High Court shall not be exercised except by way of removal of the matter from the Court in which it is pending into the High Court and thereafter hearing and determining it in the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I wish to remind honorable members, before they commence to discuss this clause, that it is not proposed to make the jurisdiction herein conferred exclusively that of the High Court. The proposal is to allow the Judges of the High Court to deal with the subject-matters set forth in the clause, but not to exclude the States Courts from dealing with them. The original jurisdiction conferred on the High Court by section 75 of the Constitution is printed in small type at the foot of page 7. It is not competent for us to either reduce or alter that jurisdiction. But section 76 gives us the right to extend it by adding the subject-matters set forth in the clause. Our first intention was to give to the High Court all the original jurisdiction with which it was possible to endow it; but, upon further consideration, and having regard to the debate upon the second reading, I propose to move the omission of paragraph (c), which confers jurisdiction in respect of Admiralty and Maritime causes. The effect of the amendment will be that all such cases must be commenced, in four of the States in the Supreme Courts, and, in New South Wales and Victoria, in Admiralty Courts. We realize, even in regard to the provision allowing the power of removal from the States Courts to the High Court, the arguments for leaving Admiralty and Maritime jurisdiction—which may involve the detention of a ship, and should be exercised with extreme rapidity—with the States Courts. It is true that, even if paragraph (c) remained in the clause, the States Courts would not be deprived of their jurisdiction in respect to those matters, but the arguments of honorable members, when the second reading was under discussion, showed that, in their opinion, the States Courts are so circumstanced that they are well able to deal with this class of cases, and the omission of the paragraph does not amount to more than a convenient reduction of the original jurisdiction of the High Court. But I hope the Committee will not strike out the remainder of the clause, because all that it does is to provide that when we have a High Court in existence litigants may commence suits of this kind before that tribunal. It does not do away with any of the jurisdiction at present existing in the States Courts, but leaves litigants free to take their choice.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But that liberty is taken away by clause 41.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I propose to ask the Committee to strike out clauses 42 and 43, and the greater part of clause 44, retaining only such parts as it may be necessary to attach to the remaining clauses. I want the Committee to carefully consider before they amend the clause, what will be the effect of their action. They will prevent the Judges of the High Court from dealing in the first instance with cases which arise under the Constitution, or which involve its interpretation, or cases which arise under the laws of the Commonwealth, or cases which relate to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of the different States. Surely in many instances it is likely to prove most desirable, if not necessary, that cases which arise under the Constitution or involve its interpretation, or cases which arise under the legislation passed by this Parliament, should be brought before the High Court, not only on appeal, but in the first instance. It is not intended to compel litigants to go to the High Court, and we shall not impose any inconvenience upon them if they wish to resort to their own States Courts; but if the Committee strike out the clause they will deprive the High Court of an opportunity of dealing, in the first instance, with cases arising under the Constitution, or involving its interpretation, or cases arising under the laws made by the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. MCCAY.—The Constitution contemplated that possibility.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, just in the same way that it contemplated the possibility of there being only three Judges. But many of those who voted in favour of both these possibilities did so, not because they believed that to be the best course to pursue, but because they knew that the Parliament of Australia would be intrusted with the creation of the Federal Courts. Now, I am submitting to the Parliament of Australia reasons not why it should exclude States Courts from jurisdiction, but why it should not exclude the High Court from jurisdiction in two classes of cases which, besides questions of appeal, it might prove desirable to submit for the opinion of the High Court. If a Justice of the High Court happened to be available in any State, and a question affecting the Constitution arose, why should we direct that a case must, in the first instance, be taken before the State Court? Why, in a matter peculiarly of Federal jurisdiction, should the doors of the High Court be closed against litigants? A litigant might consider that the case in which he was interested was one specially suitable for reference to the High Court, and one which it might be very undesirable to submit to a State Court.

Mr. McCAY.—Probably the other party would think otherwise.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Why allow the plaintiff the choice of his court under the States laws and deny it here?

Mr. THOMSON.—The defendant has the second choice under the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; but that provision is to be altered. The ordinary choice of courts under the States laws is not to be departed from. What is now proposed is not contrary to the ordinary practice. It seems to me necessary to advance special reasons when the Committee are asked to say that cases arising under our Constitution, and involving its interpretation, must first be taken before a State Court and not direct to the High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Is it proposed to give power to litigants to bring their cases before the States Courts?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, under the amendments which we intend to propose, the amplest opportunity will be afforded to litigants in cases arising under the Constitution, or involving its interpretation, or arising under the Federal laws, to go first to the States Courts, if they prefer to do so. While that liberty is left to every person who believes himself aggrieved, why should we shackle their choice?

Mr. McCAY.—Why should the litigant be allowed to go to the State Courts in cases such as those described and not in other cases?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Because we cannot provide Federal Courts in all the States. If the Treasury could bear the strain of the expenditure involved, the proper course would be to provide Federal Courts in all the States, but we accept the existing jurisdiction, and take the utmost advantage of it. Therefore, following the dictates of economy, we do not propose to close the States Courts against suits which arise in this manner. At the same time I would ask honorable members why they think it necessary to close the High Court against original jurisdiction in these cases?

Mr. McCAY.—Why open it?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Because the High Court is the most suitable tribunal to determine questions arising under our Constitution or under the laws of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Let the High Court determine those questions as a Court of Appeal.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It will still be a Court of Appeal, but there is no reason why it should not deal with these cases as a court of original jurisdiction with the same freedom as if it were a Court of Appeal only. Consequently, if we endow the Justices of the High Court with this original jurisdiction we shall enable those who prefer the High Court to bring directly before it any case arising out of the Constitution, or involving its interpretation. If the litigant is not satisfied with the decision of the single Judge on circuit before whom the case may first be tried, he may appeal to the High Court sitting in Banco.

Mr. PAGE.—How does the Attorney-General propose to get over the difficulty if only three Judges are appointed?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If honorable members decide at a later stage not to go one step beyond what the Constitution requires, and to appoint only three Judges—if they will not take the further step which I think is necessary and desirable and appoint five Judges—all we can do is to provide that in the case of an appeal from the decision of one Judge, the remaining two Judges must be in agreement, or the original judgment shall stand. That is the only recourse we have. In that case we shall have the matter tried before the whole Federal Bench: first by the one Judge, and then by the remaining two Judges, and at least two Judges must be in agreement. Consequently, the number of Judges is not directly involved in this question. The point is whether honorable members are willing to give litigants an open choice between their own State Courts and the visiting Justice of the High Court, who may be on circuit in a State, or to shut the door of the High Court and declare that litigants must in the first instance repair to the States Courts.

Mr. McLEAN.—If the work of the Court is increased, will it not involve an increase in the number of Judges?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That may happen hereafter.

Mr. McCAY.—Then why not say at once that it is intended to appoint five Judges?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The difference is this—that, before the number of Justices can be increased beyond that fixed in the Bill, it will be necessary to come down to Parliament and satisfy it that other Judges are necessary.

Mr. CONROY.—That will have to be done.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Opinions differ. I am confronted by two absolutely antagonistic statements from the opponents of this Bill. One section say that there will be no business for the High Court to transact, whilst other honorable members say that there will be so much business that we shall have to double the number of Judges. Who am I to believe? I prefer to follow my own opinion, namely, that the whole of the business likely to be done in the High Court for some years to come, under the measure as framed, can be transacted by the number of Judges proposed.

Mr. THOMSON.—Why open two shops in order to sell the same article?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Why should we, when we have to open a shop to carry on a wholesale business—that of hearing appeals—prevent it from carrying on a retail trade as a court of original jurisdiction?

Mr. THOMSON.—Because it will involve more expense.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It will involve no more expense. It may be the fault of my comprehension, but I cannot see how the expense will be increased. Supposing the honorable member had a case which involved the interpretation of the Constitution, he could, under our proposal, avail himself of his own State Courts, and from their decision appeal to the High Court.

Mr. THOMSON.—I mean that there will be more expense involved in providing the High Court with all the necessary paraphernalia.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I beg the honorable member's pardon. May I, at this early stage of the debate, put in one modest but earnest appeal that the blessed word "paraphernalia" shall not find a place in this discussion, unless its meaning is first defined. When I endeavoured to induce some of the critics of the Bill to indicate in what way the cost of the Court would be increased to the large extent they represented, I was told that the extra expense would be involved in providing "paraphernalia." When I asked the meaning of that word, I was told "paraphernalia."

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Will not the Circuit Courts involve great expense? They will be part of the paraphernalia.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The word "paraphernalia" cannot apply to the Circuit Courts. It may be, in one sense, made to apply to certain necessary parts of the machinery of the Court, but it always has a secondary meaning suggesting unnecessary and expensive ornamentation. I may say at once that there is no proposal for any unnecessary or ornamental expenditure in connexion with the High Court. The only proposal here is for the provision of the necessary machinery.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—For sending Judges all over the continent to exercise primary jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That depends on the number of Justices. If honorable members decide to cut down the number, the original jurisdiction of the High Court will be available to only a limited extent, because three Judges cannot go on circuit as often as five. The circuits and their extent will be determined by the number of Judges, and not by the jurisdiction of the Court. By conferring this additional original jurisdiction upon the High Court, honorable members will not necessarily increase the expense, but they will increase the opportunities enabling litigants to avail themselves of the Court. Very few opportunities will, however, be afforded in the more distant States for the exercise of the original jurisdiction of the High Court if the number of Judges is reduced.

Mr. McCAY.—That is to say, if we appoint fewer Judges than is proposed, the original jurisdiction conferred on the Court will be practically a dead letter.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. I do not mean that, but the original jurisdiction can only be exercised to a limited degree because the Judges cannot visit the various States with the same frequency as if the Bench were stronger, and, therefore, fewer opportunities will be presented to local litigants. If the number of Judges is cut down from five to three, I shall still argue in favour of the endowment of the Judges with original jurisdiction, because wherever they may be they should have it. Where they are, litigants should be able to take a constitutional case before them in the first instance, should such a case arise. If they are not there it cannot be put before them then.

Mr. GLYNN.—They could deal with those cases under section 75 of the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But I wish the Court to be able to deal with these cases under section 76 in addition. If the suitor does not desire to wait for the visit of a Justice of the High Court, he has the option of taking his case before his own State Court. The Justices of the High Court will visit the different States at regular intervals, so that litigants will have their choice between that tribunal and the States Courts.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Will the Judge have any knowledge of what cases are to come on?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Then proceedings must have been commenced previously.

Mr. DEAKIN.—At certain dates there will be regular visitations by a Justice of the High Court. If occasion requires, there may be visitations at other times, but there will be certain fixed dates upon which a Justice of the High Court will visit different States. When he is there, why should we say to litigants, "You shall not go to him. If you wish to commence an action involving a constitutional question, which is pre-eminently a Federal question, you must do so in a State Court?"

Mr. WATSON.—What is the object of giving that opportunity only to a small percentage of suitors?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In answer to the honorable member I would point to the experience of the Justices of the different States Courts when upon circuit. As honorable members know, it occasionally happens that a Judge of a State Court upon circuit arrives at a town in which he is presented with a pair of white gloves to symbolize the fact that there are no criminal cases to be tried, and often there may be only two or three civil cases listed. When High Court Justices visit some of the less populous States, it is just possible that they may be presented with white gloves, and have only a short appellate list with which to deal. But such contingencies, if they ever arise, will be much rarer if we allow suitors an opportunity of bringing their cases in the first instance before visiting Justices of the High Court, because, then, the possible range of jurisdiction will cover not only the appellate, but this extra-original jurisdiction. Thus suitors who prefer the Federal to the State Court will be able to come before the Justices of the High Court, and there will be fewer instances of visits being made at which few suitors present themselves.

Mr. MCCAY.—Is there some mysterious attraction about these visiting Justices?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If not, there is no harm done.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—But more money is spent.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. If we have a Court it must sit at certain times and places. We do not increase the expense of that tribunal by enlarging its original jurisdiction. The only argument that can be urged against me, is that if we give this original jurisdiction we may find the High Court circuit and other sittings crowded with business, and have an application from the Government of the day to Parliament to appoint additional Judges. In such a contingency it will rest with the Parliament to say whether it prefers to appoint additional Judges or to decrease the jurisdiction of the Court.

Mr. THOMSON.—It cannot do that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Why not? Do honorable members who make that statement believe that the High Court will be called upon to transact a great deal of business?

Mr. THOMSON.—We had better begin on a small scale and expand.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I would rather see the High Court begin its existence by having to transact a large amount of business than by having a smaller amount than it is able to deal with. Let us give litigants the choice between the States Courts and the Federal Court.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It will involve unnecessary expense.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In what way? If we have only three Judges armed with appellate and certain original jurisdiction, we must still make arrangements to allow of their visiting the States at various times. What extra expense would be involved in empowering the Court to deal with a little more business than it could otherwise transact? It will cost a suitor no more to pay a barrister to appear before this Court than it will to pay him to appear before one of the States Courts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—What special convenience will be conferred upon suitors under the Government proposal?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The convenience of having, in addition to the ordinary States Circuit Courts, the Federal Circuit Courts.

Mr. A. MCLEAN.—If we vest the court with this original jurisdiction, does the Attorney-General think that three Judges will be sufficient?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the Committee insists upon the appointment of only three Judges the extra amount of original jurisdiction vested in the Court will not overburden them. If honorable members reduce the number of Judges to three, I still prefer to vest them with this original jurisdiction in the interests of the suitors.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Evidently the Attorney-General is beginning to think that the sooner these clauses are eliminated the better. This is the first occasion upon which I have seen a Minister rise—before a single word has been said against a clause—to enter upon an elaborate defence of it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There were one or two interjections.

Mr. GLYNN.—Evidently the suspicions of the Attorney-General are aroused, and he is becoming doubtful of the wisdom of retaining the clauses relating to the original jurisdiction which it was proposed to confer upon the High Court. Since last week, acting upon the excellent suggestions of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, he has "caved in" to some extent by cutting out of the Bill, without a single word of further debate, the provisions which sought to centralize jurisdiction in Admiralty and Maritime matters. Those provisions meant nothing more than the centralization of justice. The Attorney-General talks about giving litigants the option of going to the High Court, or to the States Courts. But the Government proposal simply means that a suitor in a distant State, instead of having recourse to the Judges of his own State, will be dragged before the High Court which will probably be sitting in the very heart of Australia. It is really a question of centralization with its accompanying great expense. The Attorney-General has shown that he is doubtful of the expediency of conferring upon that tribunal all the powers that we can confer under the Constitution, because he has given notice to eliminate some of the provisions relating to the power of removal of causes—provisions which were expedients adopted to extend the jurisdiction of the High Court. He is now willing to excise clauses 42 to 44 inclusive, under which a defendant is given power, before a defence is entered, to remove as of right a cause from the jurisdiction of the States Courts to that of the High Court. The Attorney-General has made an elaborate defence before being attacked. He has yielded to the suggestions put forward by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and, on his own initiative, he proposes to excise the clauses relating to the power of the removal of causes.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member for Indi supported the suggestion to limit the power of the removal of causes.

Mr. GLYNN.—Then why not go further, and accept the suggestions of the honorable and learned member for Indi in their entirety? In his speech that honorable member suggested cutting down the original jurisdiction of the Court to the matters referred to in the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS.—I said that I agreed with the honorable and learned member for Bendigo as to the removal of causes, and as to the wisdom of not depriving the States Courts of any jurisdiction which they already possess.

Mr. GLYNN.—That practically means that we should not confer upon the High Court any greater jurisdiction than is already assigned to it. Under the Constitution that Court is given original jurisdiction in regard to five matters. The Attorney-General has said that the Judges must go to the various States to sit, because we must give them original jurisdiction irrespective of whether we like it or not. But I do not suppose that one case will arise in two years, perhaps not one in ten years, under section 75 of the Constitution.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—What about cases in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought?

Mr. GLYNN.—Very few cases will arise under that section. None will arise under any treaties or as affecting Consuls. There may be cases against the Commonwealth, but these can be dealt with by the States Courts. This is an original jurisdiction that is not exclusive

Under this Bill actions may be taken in the States Courts, so that very few cases will arise under section 75 of the Constitution, because though the original jurisdiction cannot be taken away from the High Court to the extent that it has been vested by the Constitution, in most of these matters jurisdiction is actually possessed by the States Courts. That is so in cases of State against State, or even in the case of an action against the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Surely the States Courts could not entertain an action in which State was against a State.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes; they could do so even before the Constitution was passed. It has been the opinion of the highest Judges that a suit could have been brought in any State if that State had been made the defendant. There may have been a disinclination to do anything of the sort, but the power existed before this Constitution was framed. Any State could sue another State in its own Court, and any citizen of a State could sue another State in its own Court. It is true that actions of the kind may be very infrequent. Although we are always talking of these matters in this House, I do not remember a single case in which a State has taken action against another State. So far as that provision is concerned, its exercise will be very infrequent; but it will be concurrent with a power already existing in the case of States, though, of preference, no doubt a suitor may occasionally wish to go to the High Court. Perhaps, a writ of mandamus may be asked against an officer of the Commonwealth, but up to the present we have not conferred the power under any Act of Parliament to issue a mandamus against the Commonwealth. Last year, when I tried, during the discussion upon the Claims Against the Commonwealth Bill, to have a provision inserted under which the Minister for Trade and Customs might be made to deliver up documents, upon which he had been sleeping perhaps for months, the Government were horrified at the idea of a power being given by prerogative writ to compel action by a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. WATSON.—There would not be the same objection to giving the power to the High Court of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not see that the change of Court would make the slightest difference. Suppose an application were made to compel a Minister to disgorge moneys he held over—and in this connexion I need only refer to the proceedings of this afternoon in connexion with the Sugar Bonus Bill? An application of that kind may be made by a State to proceed against the Commonwealth.

Mr. WATSON.—To a State Court? I object.

Mr. GLYNN.—I would remind the honorable member that there might be as great a chance of a Federal leaning in the High Court as of a State leaning in a State Court.

Mr. WATSON.—I should prefer the Federal leaning.

Mr. GLYNN.—We should have an applicant representing, as it were, the State and a defendant representing the Commonwealth, and why, if we desire equality of opportunity, should we say that the Federal Court is to be the one in which proceedings must be taken?

Mr. WATSON.—Because it concerns Federal affairs?

Mr. GLYNN.—Not Federal affairs exclusively, but affairs arising under the Constitution which cover, not the rights of the Commonwealth alone, but the rights of the Federation, which includes the States.

Mr. WATSON.—Such cases should be decided by an Australian Court.

Mr. GLYNN.—I think the honorable member sometimes confuses the Constitution with the Commonwealth. The Federal Courts are to be the guardians not of the Commonwealth, but of the Constitution, and the Constitution declares the right not only of the Federal Executive, or of the Federal State, as we may term it, but the rights of the States which are units in the Federation. A Federal court therefore is no more a court of the Commonwealth—though it is a court of the Constitution—than is a State Court. The obligation of the laws is as imperative upon the States Courts as upon Federal Courts, because as a matter of fact they all have their source in an Imperial law equally binding upon all.

Mr. WATSON.—There must be a wide margin for the personal equation in every instance.

Mr. GLYNN.—If we follow the lead of America in this matter we shall find that original jurisdiction is there confined to cases in which a State sues a State or a State sues the Commonwealth or where Ambassadors, public Ministers, or Consuls are concerned. In no other case is original jurisdiction given to a Federal Court in America.

Mr. WATSON.—Cases arising out of Federal laws.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—The Circuit Courts have original jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN.—In no other cases is original jurisdiction given to the Supreme Court of America. Original jurisdiction is given to the Federal Circuit Courts for reasons which are not applicable here. In America, there was no power under the Constitution to confer Federal jurisdiction upon States Courts, and for that reason they were obliged in the first year, I think in 1789, at the same time as they created the Supreme Court of America, to create a series of Federal Courts to localize justice. But under our Constitution, anticipating that there would be no necessity for many years to come to create Federal Courts, power is expressly taken, to vest jurisdiction in the States Courts. Still it is true that the Supreme Court of America has original jurisdiction in exceedingly few cases. We have, by our Constitution, given original jurisdiction to the High Court in those cases, and in one or two more. Surely it will not be said that the efficiency of our existing courts is not adequate for the discharge of original matters that may arise? Surely it would be far better for honorable members to allow the Supreme Court of a State, for instance, to hear an appeal from a court of summary jurisdiction upon a matter involving some point arising under the Customs Act? Whether we give original jurisdiction or not to the High Court in matters arising under section 76 of the Constitution summary jurisdiction will still remain in the summary courts of the States, so that a Customs information would be heard, not by a Federal Court, but the court of summary jurisdiction. Would it not be better, therefore, that in the first instance an appeal from a conviction in a Customs case should be heard by the Supreme Court of a State than by a Federal Circuit Judge going once in four or six months to a State to hear cases? In the first place we should get the point decided by three Judges, and the chances would then be that unless there was a divergence between the decisions of various States upon some question the matter would not be taken to the High Court of Australia. But, if the matter is taken before a single Federal Judge on circuit, in nine cases out of ten the chances are that it will go on to the High Court.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—No, it is the other way according to the experience of America.

Mr. GLYNN.—The honorable member is again bringing in the experience of America, forgetting that under our system we shall have one circuit Judge, whilst in America the Circuit Court consists of three Judges. In America the Circuit Court is practically a court of final appeal.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In some cases.

Mr. GLYNN.—In nearly all cases.

Mr. CROUCH.—What is the full strength of the Supreme Court of America?

Mr. GLYNN.—There are nine Judges of the Supreme Court of America, but the Circuit Courts act as courts of appeal and courts of original jurisdiction. I think there are three Judges sitting at these Circuit Courts—the District Judge and two Judges of the Supreme Court of America. In all cases where they do not certify that a point ought to be reserved or unless the Supreme Court of America on special application, as of grace, grants an appeal, which very seldom occurs, the decision of the Circuit Court in America is final. So that really in America the Circuit Court would be equal to our proposed High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Indeed it would not.

Mr. GLYNN.—I think it would, because as I have mentioned in nine cases out of ten an appeal would not go beyond the Circuit Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That does not make it equal.

Mr. GLYNN.—I am not contending that it would be of equal ability, but that it would be equal in point of efficiency, which means expedition and cheapness. The question of ability is a matter of the personnel of the court, and we cannot predicate that the Australian Court will be better than the American Court or, say, that the American Court is better than the Australian Court will be. Before we can speak upon that point we must wait until we see the calibre of the Judges appointed to the High Court, and the less political such appointments are the better they are, as a rule.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I was speaking of their jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN.—Of course they are not equal in that respect, because they have not the ultimate appellate power. But, in addition to the powers they have to which I have already referred, and the fact that the tribunal consists of three Judges, nearly all the removals in America are not to the Supreme Court, but from the States Courts to the Circuit Courts. Nearly all the removals there are from District Courts which are Federal Courts or from States Courts, which are allowed to exercise Federal jurisdiction under certain conditions, to the Circuit Courts. This shows that they are tribunals of almost equal importance to the High Court which we propose to establish. It is shown also that in America these tribunals promote the decentralization of justice. It is certain that if we allow original jurisdiction here we allow it to be exercised by a single Judge upon circuit, and the cases must wait until the circuit is made, which in America occurs only once in six months. Consequently if the decision is to be that of a single Judge in a majority of cases it will mean the carrying of the cases on to the High Court with consequent additional expense. The Attorney-General will surely be influenced by an authority such as Cooley on this question. Cooley is a writer on purely constitutional measures, not like Story and some others who are general writers on American laws, and who incidentally deal with constitutional questions. Books which are directed purely to matters of constitutional interpretation and constitutional rights will, I, think, be admitted as authorities of greater weight than those in which such matters are incidentally referred to in a general discourse upon law. After mentioning that as an interpreter of the Constitution that must be a Court of Appeal, that the Supreme Court is necessary to secure uniformity as an appellate tribunal, and that the same principle does not apply to original jurisdiction, Cooley says:—

These reasons do not, however, apply to the original jurisdiction over a case, but only to the formal application in the case of the rule of law that shall govern it. The full purpose of the Federal jurisdiction is subverted if the case, though first heard in the State Court, may be removed at the option of the parties, for final determination, to the Courts of the States.

That is the opinion of one of the chief constitutional writers in America on the working of their Constitution, and surely honorable members will accept that as a weighty authority—that justice, except in a few matters arising under the Constitution, should be left to the

Mr. Glynn.

States Courts. There is another authority, who should to some extent influence the Attorney-General, and that is Mr. Garran. I am not referring now to the work which has so justly merited the eulogium of every one who has looked at it—Messrs. Quick and Garran's work on the Constitution—but to a little work entitled The Coming Commonwealth, published before the inauguration of the Commonwealth, by Mr. Garran, who is now secretary to the Attorney-General, and who probably has had something to do with the framing of these Judiciary and Procedure Bills. What does Mr. Garran say?—

In practice it will probably be found that the original jurisdiction will only be required in a limited class of cases; for instance, where the Commonwealth is a party, where one State is proceeding against another, or where the representatives of other countries are affected.

These are, of course, cases in which original jurisdiction is given under section 75 of the Constitution. Mr. Garran goes on to say—

In other cases it will probably be better to leave the original jurisdiction wholly to the State Courts subject to the right of appeal to the Federal Court.

That is what we are asking for, and I give it on the authority of the Secretary to the Attorney-General. That appears in a book published just before the Convention began to sit in order to influence the judicial provisions of the Constitution.

MR. DEAKIN.—Those were his first thoughts.

MR. GLYNN.—I think that his first thoughts happen to be his best thoughts in this case. Let us look at what would be the effect of conferring this jurisdiction upon the States Courts. It would mean that in every case where legislation had been passed under section 51 of the Constitution the Federal Circuit Judge would have equal power to hear disputes with State Judges. That would include all taxation matters—

MR. L. E. GROOM.—Jurisdiction has been given in the Customs Act and the Excise Act.

MR. GLYNN.—Original jurisdiction is given as a temporary provision, but in summary matters it is given absolutely. The Government have up to the present time point-blank refused to bring in a Bill conferring full original jurisdiction on the Courts of the States. In a piecemeal way they have given jurisdiction in various Acts. They have given jurisdiction in the Customs Act, and—forced upon them by the House—in the Post and Telegraph Act. It was a jurisdiction, as at first proposed, only conferred until the High Court was created. Surely honorable members will remember that in several Bills—the Property for Public Purposes Acquisition Bill, the Post and Telegraph Bill, and others—the Government proposed to give only temporary jurisdiction to the States Courts, and that the provision was that automatically on the establishment of the High Court the Federal jurisdiction conferred on the States Courts was to cease? The Government have not proposed to give the States Courts the full jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, I believe that the States Courts have jurisdiction, in spite of them; but they have shown a disinclination to absolutely confer the jurisdiction so that it should be beyond all doubt. If we confer this original jurisdiction on the High Court, and a question on a promissory note arises, the jurisdiction will be vested in the Circuit Courts as well as the States Courts. I ask honorable members to say how can matters of Insolvency and Bankruptcy be determined by a Circuit Judge? It is not an ordinary issue, to be determined at a single sitting. It is not a question of fact which goes before a jury. Bankruptcy proceedings extend over months. There are the adjunction, the first hearing, various examinations before receivers and accountants, occasional references to the Bankruptcy Judges, and the final hearing. Generally the proceedings extend over many months, and require very elaborate machinery. How, then, can it be said that in a matter of that sort the Federal jurisdiction can be properly exercised by the Federal Circuit Court? It cannot be done unless you go to the High Court. The result will then be as has been indicated—a complete centralization of jurisdiction. So far as the Bill is alleged to give more efficient decisions in Federal matters, or to expedite proceedings, or to secure economy, it is a perfect farce. It will be inefficient for the reasons I have mentioned; it must be more expensive, and as the Judges cannot go on circuit more than, perhaps, once in six months without delaying the appellate jurisdiction, it will lead to considerable delay in the meting out of justice. I should like to refer the Attorney-General to a very recent authority. In the Annals of the American Academy of Social and Political Science for March last—a volume which only came out by the last post—I find a very excellent article by Professor Harrison Moore, who has already published a very fair work on our Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is an admirable article, which I have read.

Mr. GLYNN.—I am sorry that the honorable and learned gentleman had not an opportunity to read the article last week. If he had then thought it an admirable article he would have proved his conviction by not bringing in the Bill. Professor Harrison Moore points out, as we have endeavoured to do, that there is no immediate necessity to create the High Court; at all events to arm it with very extensive jurisdiction. He says—

The establishment of the High Court is likely to be deferred.

He mentions that probably the country would not stand the appointment of political Judges—I do not know what right he had to make that remark, because, of course, there is no talk about doing that—and he goes on to say—

Again, the legal issues presented to the courts can hardly be of the same supreme importance as those which have arisen in the United States, where again and again the courts have been faced with problems affecting the national security. Finally, the Constitution can be amended with comparative ease.

In fact, the object of his article is to show that the problems which are likely to affect us for many years to come will be very few, and are not likely to be big national ones, which require extensive jurisdiction in our courts, and he says that the work can be properly done by the States Courts. Of course, we shall be told again that we want a purer tribunal. Let us not idealize the Supreme Court of America too much. Mr. Woodrow Wilson, whom I am sure the Attorney-General respects as an authority, has stated that it has almost invariably taken its colour from the prevailing political opinion of the day. We have heard an apostrophe from the Attorney-General on two occasions to the genius of that court. Even in Marshall's time it was federalist, because the federalist party was then in power. In his work on Congressional Government, Mr. Woodrow Wilson says—

It has been during comparatively short periods of transition, when public opinion was passing from one political creed to another, that the decisions of the Federal Judiciary have been distinctly opposed to the principles of the ruling political party.

Let us not be led too much by this excessive eulogy which has been given to the High Court, and imagine that the States Courts are not likely to be free from undue influence in coming to their decisions. We know that the Supreme Court of America, for ten years after Marshall's time, a democratic Government being in power, gave decisions that were purely democratic. I have not endeavoured to impugn the purity of the Federal Court, but whenever the States Courts are mentioned, we are immediately met with the statement that we cannot trust the interpretation of the Federal laws to them. When honorable members use that class of argument, I ask them to prove the assertion that the Federal Court is likely to be purer than the States Courts in the administration of justice. When I go to authorities in America, I find that the Supreme Court there has not been so absolutely pure. Being a single court, and having a final voice, it did of course reconcile decisions. Whether the judgment was sound or unsound, it had to give the last word, and therefore it did lay down finally what was the interpretation of the law, but it was sometimes affected by the prevailing opinion of the party in power—in Marshall's time by Federal views, and for ten years afterwards by purely democratic views. That is a class of argument which we have not used, but it has been used by the Government, and for that reason I refer to it. I hope that honorable members will excise the clause, and confine the original jurisdiction of the High Court to matters arising under section 75 of the Constitution. By doing so they will justify a smaller Bench, expedite justice, render it cheaper, and, on the whole, secure the requisite Federal efficiency.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I sincerely hope that the Committee will not eliminate the clause except to the extent which the Attorney-General has indicated. I think we ought to consider also some of the concluding words. I do not know whether he really intended to include the question of removals in his observations with regard to some later clauses. I think it is rather consequential on what he said.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I propose to ask the Committee to retain the power of removal for special cause—that is why I did not mention those—but to delete the power of removal as of right.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable and learned gentleman does not mean that he is going to retain the concluding words with regard to removals—at all events, in their present form!

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is another matter.

Mr. ISAACS.—Confining my observations to the substance of this clause, I think it is only right that it should be retained. Under the Constitution the High Court has original jurisdiction in all matters—

Arising under any treaty.

That is to say, no matter between whom they may arise or under what circumstances—

Affecting Consuls or other representatives of other countries.

In which the Commonwealth or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth is a party.

No matter what the question is or under what law it arises—whether it arises under the Customs Act, or the Post and Telegraph Act, or the Excise Act, or under the Constitution itself—if the Commonwealth or any person representing the Commonwealth sues an individual, the High Court will have original jurisdiction, and vice versa, if any individual sues the Commonwealth under any circumstances the High Court will have original jurisdiction. So that nearly all the cases with which we have been familiar in the past under Federal law will be within the original jurisdiction of the High Court, whether we give this additional jurisdiction or not. Honorable members will not eliminate original jurisdiction if they strike out this clause. We shall require to have the opportunities for deciding these cases; we shall require to have the Judges in sufficient number—whether it be three, four, or five—and with sufficient opportunities to decide these cases, and all that these other clauses do, as far as I can see, is to give the same opportunity to private individuals as between themselves or between corporations and private individuals, to go to the High Court to get decisions that an individual suing the Government, or the Government suing an individual would have. Therefore, I think it means very little difference, if any, so far as I can see as regards expense. You must have the Court sufficiently equipped, furnished with means, and established with the proper opportunities to decide these cases, in original jurisdiction, mark you, as between the Government and the private individual. And it seems to me only to be right to afford litigants the opportunity, if they so desire, to go to the High Court in the first instance, when they will, perhaps, be quite satisfied without any further appeal; and if there is any further appeal, it cannot go to the Privy Council.

Mr. THOMSON.—What is the use of duplicating courts?

Mr. ISAACS.—If I have succeeded in conveying my meaning aright, we are not duplicating any court. The High Court must be there in any event; it must be there for the purpose amongst others—a purpose that cannot be taken away, because it is embedded in the Constitution—of deciding such cases as we have heard of in the past.

Mr. THOMSON.—It does not follow that we need provide a High Court in every State if the States Courts are invested with the jurisdiction.

Mr. ISAACS.—Perhaps I have not conveyed my meaning yet. I have no intention to support a proposal to prevent the States Courts from deciding these cases, and to make this jurisdiction exclusive in the High Court.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—The Bill does that.

Mr. ISAACS.—Not in this clause. While I should support the States Courts having the fullest means of deciding these particular cases, because it is impossible, with the means at our disposal, to provide a High Court machinery to sufficiently cover the ground; on the other hand, I say that we cannot take away from the High Court the power of deciding questions arising under the Federal laws, and under the Constitution. Whether it is a civil or a criminal matter, we cannot deprive the High Court of the jurisdiction, and we must furnish it with the means of deciding the cases. Supposing that we have the High Court; supposing that we have a Judge there with inalienable power to decide these cases as between the Commonwealth and the individual, we are not increasing the expense, so far as I can see, by one penny by saying that the same Judge, with the same opportunities before him, shall decide any similar question between two private individuals. That is all I mean to convey.

Mr. CONROY.—We cannot take the Judge to the individual.

Mr. ISAACS.—He is there.

Mr. CONROY.—The Supreme Court of the State where the individual is, has also the power, so that this Bill is duplicating power.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Supreme Court of the State is located in the capital. It has to visit various parts of the State. So that the honorable and learned member might as well say—there being local courts in the different parts of a State—“Why take the Supreme Court to those parts?” The same argument would deprive all the Supreme Courts of the States of their original power, because you have in the various parts of the States, Courts of General Sessions, Courts of Quarter Sessions, District Courts, and County Courts, all doing the same work. It is impossible for an honorable member to look at the jurisdictions exercised in his own State without seeing that there is an alternative power given to act to the various courts; but at the same time you do not shut a man out from going to the Supreme Court. And it seems to me, that you should say to litigants—“You are not forced to go to the State Court; you are not forced to go to the High Court; you can go to which you like. There it is. The doors are open. There is not a penny more expense. The Judge is there.”

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The honorable and learned member cannot convince me that there will not be a penny more expense.

Mr. ISAACS.—You have the jurisdiction in all these local courts. Do not forget that. We have had in the past cases which would have come under the jurisdiction of the High Court, as given in the Constitution. All Customs cases such as those of which we have heard would be within the original jurisdiction of the High Court in any event.

Mr. CONROY.—What court would carry on the appeals if the Judges were occupied with other matters?

Mr. ISAACS.—What courts carry on the appeals in the States Supreme Courts when the Judges are on circuit?

Mr. CONROY.—If we are to have the same number of Judges as the States Supreme Courts have, I agree with the honorable and learned member.

Mr. ISAACS.—I must try to keep within the bounds of the clause before the Committee. We were told that we were not to discuss clause 3—that we were not to consider the number of Judges until we had decided the work that they would have to do. My honorable and learned friend now wants to draw me into a discussion upon clause 3, irrespective of that. I am prepared to discuss the question of the number of the Judges if we are in order in doing so. As to that, I agree with the Attorney-General, that to do the work set out by the Attorney-General himself, we cannot do with less than five Judges. We cannot do justice to the smaller States without that number. It seems to me that to say that there shall be three Judges sitting in one of the larger States, and that people shall be compelled to bring their appeals to that Court, will be wrong to the other States. To make the High Court a peripatetic Court of three Judges, wandering around without doing other work, is almost impossible to contemplate. When we come to the clause in question, I shall be prepared to deal with it, but I am talking of this question of jurisdiction; and it seems to me that we do not sufficiently recollect the new jurisdiction that already exists by virtue of the Constitution. It is not as though we were taking a class of cases—say cases arising under Federal Acts of Parliament or under the Constitution—and giving them absolutely to the High Court for the first time; because, as I have pointed out, the vast number of these cases, perhaps the majority of them, will be within the grasp of the High Court whenever it is constituted.

Mr. GLYNN.—Are they not mostly matters of summary jurisdiction—under section 75, sub-section (3) for instance.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the honorable and learned member mean cases in which the Commonwealth is a party? Surely that embraces all cases in which those conditions occur.

Mr. McCAY.—They will be mostly cases of individuals.

Mr. ISAACS.—They may not be. They may be cases of great importance where, say, under the Customs Act, a person sues for a refund of customs duties paid.

Mr. GLYNN.—Many of them are matters concerning individuals.

Mr. ISAACS.—I happen to be engaged in one or two cases myself, and I know perfectly well their nature.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—There may also be cases for the recovery of duties paid under the Excise Act.

Mr. McCAY.—They are very rare actions: the majority of them are otherwise.

Mr. ISAACS.—No one can tell what the majority of such cases will be. I know that there are a number of important actions pending now, in which the High Court would have jurisdiction. Therefore, I say that by voting against this clause, honorable members will be cutting away the rights of individuals in suits between themselves, whereas we cannot help giving the right—we are in presence of a right which we cannot take away—in cases where an individual is a party on the one side or the other, and the Commonwealth is the opposite party. Then there are cases between States and the Commonwealth in which a writ of mandamus or injunction is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth. That is a matter in which the High Court will have jurisdiction in any event, and it is a class of case in which the Commonwealth ought to be represented as a Commonwealth. It seems to me that we shall be doing a wrong, and doing something anomalous unless we pass this clause. Without referring to the larger consideration to which the Attorney-General alluded it seems to me that we should not be doing right if we did not permit the High Court—the grand expositor of this Constitution in Federal matters—to have the opportunity of hearing cases if litigants choose to come to that tribunal and say—“We desire to have this matter determined by the High Court.” The litigants may be perfectly ready to abide by the judgment of one Judge of the High Court. They may not want to go any further.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—One of them will be content.

Mr. ISAACS.—Of course in one sense my honorable friend is right. But both parties may be content, and may not want to go any further with the case. Persons are very often satisfied, and say—“I have had this case fairly fought out: I am satisfied to have had a judgment of a Judge of the High Court,” and no appeal is taken. I think that the extra expense involved is infinitesimal. That is the view which I wish to put before the Committee.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I have listened with great interest to the view of the honorable and learned member for Indi, but I think that throughout the whole of his remarks he has been assuming the real point at issue between the two parties in connexion with this clause. He has really not only been assuming that it is desirable to give to the High Court what we cannot stop it from having, the original jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution; but also to put that jurisdiction into active operation by providing courts and Judges to hear these suits, and thereby, so far as possible, taking the jurisdiction away from the States Courts, to whom we can give original jurisdiction at the present time.

Mr. CROUCH.—Did not the second reading of the Bill assume that?

Mr. McCAY.—It did not assume it as far as I am concerned.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Does the honorable and learned member contemplate a court without original jurisdiction?

Mr. McCAY.—I contemplate doing without a High Court for the present. The second reading of the Bill has affirmed the principle that there shall be a High Court, but this Committee has a perfectly free hand to decide what the character of that Court shall be, within the limits prescribed by the Constitution. What I say is, that if we are to have a High Court, let us limit it to the functions so magnificently described during the second-reading debate, when we were told that the Commonwealth Court was to be constituted to harmonize all the conflicting currents of judicial decision throughout Australia. We want only an appellate court to do that; and not a court of original jurisdiction, where the jurisdiction is exercised by individual Judges. To say that we are giving the High Court original jurisdiction in these matters, is not correct. We cannot help the High Court from having that jurisdiction. But the Court may be so constituted that the original jurisdiction will not, as a matter of fact, be exercised by it, but primarily by the Supreme Courts of the States, if we give the jurisdiction to them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Surely litigants ought to have the opportunity of going to the High Court in the first instance if they choose.

Mr. McCAY.—Litigants will not want to go to the High Court in 99 cases out of 100 unless it is as convenient to them as the Supreme Court of their State will be. That Court for all practical purposes is at the door of most litigants, and continually at their demand; and unless you make the High Court of Australia as available as the Supreme Court of a State it will not get the original jurisdiction. Suits involving original jurisdiction will not be brought before it. Every additional piece of jurisdiction you confer upon the High Court means a very considerable increase of expense to the Commonwealth—that is, to the States and to their constituents. Unless you are going to say that the Judges of the High Court exercising original jurisdiction are to be such a superior class of persons as compared with the Supreme Court Judges of the States, that their decisions will be accepted as final without appeal, there will be no new benefit offered to litigants going to the High Court in the first instance. The Attorney-General is on the horns of a dilemma in this matter.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I think he is on the wrong horn.

Mr. McCAY.—If he has five Judges of the Supreme Court he will not be able to provide enough Circuit Courts to make the attendance of the High Court Judges sufficiently frequent to enable them to compete—other things being equal—with the States Courts so far as the personal convenience of litigants is concerned.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The States Courts are not equal. The honorable and learned member is looking only to Victoria.

Mr. McCAY.—The Attorney-General is wrong if he refers to the calibre of the Judges.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Both the calibre and the number.

Mr. McCAY.—In South Australia they have only three Judges.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In Tasmania only three.

Mr. McCAY.—There is not the same population in either South Australia or Tasmania, and three Judges for the latter State form a larger proportion than do five or six Judges for Victoria. If we are to have sufficient Judges to make the visits of the High Court to the various portions of the Commonwealth sufficiently frequent to suit litigants, I am afraid that five Judges will not be enough, assuming, as the Attorney-General seems to assume, that all the business will flow to the High Court. If, on the other hand, there are not sufficient Judges to provide sufficiently frequent Circuit Courts, the business will not flow to the High Court. It seems to me that five is a betwixt and between number—not sufficient for the one purpose, and too many for the other. I am influenced by the view I take of the Bill as a whole; and, although the second reading has been carried, we are still in a position to question the extent of the jurisdiction. Every additional piece of original jurisdiction is an additional excuse for increasing the expense, either with regard to the number of Judges or with regard to the frequency of the Circuit Courts, with, if I may be permitted to use a forbidden word, all their “paraphernalia.” It is quite true, as the honorable and learned member for Indi pointed out, that a very large number of the cases which occur are already within the original jurisdiction of the High Court under the Constitution. So far as one is able to judge, I should say that, at any rate, two-thirds of the cases up to the present are within that original jurisdiction. These cases have been dealt with by the States Courts, and I have not heard any excessive complaining about the decisions given. The point has been emphasized that a State Court might decide one way, whilst another State Court decided another way.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That has happened.

Mr. McCAY.—There have been differing decisions; but it is not original jurisdiction, but appellate jurisdiction which is required to cure that difficulty, always assuming that appeals will go to the High Court and not to the Privy Council. For myself I do not think that appeals will go to the High Court in preference to the Privy Council, but I am assuming they will, for the purpose of argument. If it be urged that, considering all the original jurisdiction already conferred on the High Court, it will not matter much if we do confer a little more, that must be on the assumption that courts of sufficient frequency and sufficiently widely distributed are to be provided in order to transact all the business instead of leaving it to the States Courts. The argument is that, with all this jurisdiction, more Judges are wanted. The proper question ought to be—What is the least number of Judges with which we can do? There is no need to provide for frequent Circuit Courts to enable the jurisdiction to be exercised, so long as we have States Courts able to exercise it, and so long as the financial circumstances of the States are as at present. We should be exercising a wise discretion if we did not confer extra jurisdiction, not so much from the point of view of the expense, as from the point of view of the excuse for expense that would be offered. We have heard a great deal about the mandatory character of the section in the Constitution as to the establishment of the High Court; but there is nothing mandatory as to the constitution of the Court. It seems to me that every option the Constitution gives, is being exercised in connexion with this Bill, except the option of delaying until a convenient time the establishment of the High Court.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—There is a saying to the effect that—“Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.” It seems to me that the specially organized and particular opponents of this Bill, who voted against its second reading, are determined to make the measure as inefficacious as possible. Honorable members from New South Wales would appear to know a tremendous lot about the working of such courts as that under discussion, but I venture to wager £50 that no man here has been in a Federal Court, or had a law suit there, except myself. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, described the American Supreme Court as poisoned by political influences before its construction. But we ought to remember that Lord Salisbury, the late Prime Minister of England, said that if there was one thing he envied America, it was her Supreme Court; and I heard Lord Rosebery, one of the ablest men to-day in England, express similar sentiments in Pittsburg years ago. Why should I or any other citizen of the Commonwealth be deprived of the right to commence an action in a Federal Court? Is it because my legal friends wish me to run up such a bill in a State Court that I shall not be able to give security on appeal to the High Court? Why should litigants, say, on the West Coast of Tasmania, be deprived of the right to have their cases heard in the Federal Circuit Court in preference to the Supreme Court of that State? In the case of Sarah Hill against Sharon, heard in the Supreme Court, California, the plaintiff was successful in having herself declared the wife of the defendant, and on that decision would have participated in the division of over five millions of money. Mr. Justice Field, of the United States Supreme Court, came to Sacramento and spent that decision. Did Mr. Terry, the counsel for plaintiff, appeal to Washington? No; he at once surrendered on the ground that as the question had been decided by one of the United States Judges, it was not worth while appealing.

Mr. CROUCH.—Did that court consist of one Judge or three Judges?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—The court consisted of one Judge from Washington. Then honorable members may remember the case of the United States marshal who shot Terry, because the latter threatened to shoot the Judge. Legal members, with very few exceptions, know nothing about Federal judicial power. In the United States, in case of doubt, the Supreme Court always overrides the State Court. The whole must be greater than the part, and the State is only a part; but the great misfortune is that the majority of Victorian representatives still believe that Victoria runs the Commonwealth, and do not seem able to reason beyond the bounds of that State. In Western America we had land cases, horse-stealing cases, murder cases, and constitutional cases tried in these Circuit Courts, and I have never known a case which was presided over by a Judge from Washington appealed against. My contention has been that Federal jurisdiction ought to be given to the States Supreme Courts, and that three Judges are all that is necessary for the High Court; but, if in the judgment of the Committee five High Court Judges are necessary, I am not going to stand in the way of their appointment. In the United States, if a citizen of Arkansas has a law suit with a citizen of Texas, he takes it into the Federal Circuit Court. Why? Because he knows that when he gets a decision it will be to the satisfaction of both parties. But some honorable members want the democrats of Australia to fight their cases through every State Court before bringing them to the High Court. Many a man, however, would be too poor to be able to put up the requisite security for an appeal to the High Court, although he could get an attorney to appear for him if he could go to the Court direct, and it would be a denial of a fundamental right of democracy to prevent him from doing so. Surely, every one of the Judges whom the Ministry appoint will have the confidence of the people! The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr Glynn, spoke of men being biased, but do honorable members remember the Dred Scott case in America? At that time the people of the States were almost in arms, and there was immense excitement. Charles Sumner, Wendall Phillips, and others declared in the grand old Faneuil Hall in Boston, where hang the pictures of Washington, Hancock, and Otis, that they would never surrender a fugitive slave, but Chief Justice Taney, of the Supreme Court, decided that they must send the niggers back from Massachusetts. Was that an instance of yielding to popular clamour? And the same firmness has been shown in many other instances. Such a case occurred only the other day. The Goulds, the Rockfellers, the Vanderbilts, and the Pierpont Morgans—people who could buy up Australia, and yet have enough afterwards to be rich—formed a syndicate called the Northern Securities Company, but when the legality of such a trust was questioned before Judge Thayer, he upset the whole business, though the States Courts were afraid to tackle the case. All the newspapers in the States, with the exception of Randolph Hearst's, are in their hands, yet this Judge gave a decision in a case involving billions against the monopolists and in favour of the people. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa is trying to upset an institution which will be the climax of the Federation. We must have the Executive, the Legislative, and the Judiciary to complete the Commonwealth power. The present Chief Justice Fuller gave up a practice of £30,000 to accept his present position at £2,100. All the Judges of the United States Courts are men who were successful practitioners for at least 25 years. Perhaps some of our friends here think that they are men who could be bought for a £5-note. There is the feeling in some countries that if you are an American you can be bought. Only the other day a big business man told me that President Roosevelt could be bought for a few thousand pounds, and yet I suppose the President could buy and sell any five men in Victoria, and have money enough left to throw at the birds. I hope that honorable members will awake from their parochialism and their narrow provincialism, and stand up for a High Court which will be a credit to the whole Commonwealth.

ADJOURNMENT.

ESTIMATES: SUPPLY OF NEWSPAPERS.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I wish to know from the Attorney-General when we are likely to have the Estimates. It is now the 16th day of the last month of the financial year, and it is highly desirable that they should be laid before us as soon as possible. If we continue to drift as we have been doing we shall lose all control of the expenditure. In England, and at one time it was so in nearly all the States, the Estimates for the forthcoming year are always laid on the table at the beginning of the year. I do not ask for a detailed account of the revenue and receipts during this year, but the latest figures on that subject, so far as they are obtainable, should also be put before us. When we are asked to vote money after it has nearly all been expended, our supervision is practically worthless.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I have to complain, Mr. Speaker, that the Melbourne Herald is not placed in the labour members' room on the days upon which Parliament is not sitting. If it is considered necessary, the members of the labour party will take up a collection in order to provide the funds necessary to insure the regular delivery of the newspaper in their room.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—In answer to the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, I may say that the Estimates have been in preparation for some little time, and will be ready shortly. As the honorable and learned member must be aware, it is not the custom to lay the Estimates upon the table until they can be accompanied by the returns of the expenditure for the financial year immediately preceding. These returns cannot be completed till after the end of the current month.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 17 June, 1903.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Will he take the necessary steps to lay upon the table of the Senate all correspondence that has passed between the Imperial and Commonwealth Governments relating to the proposed new mail contracts, especially having regard to the employment of coloured labour on mail steamers?

Senator DRAKE.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

The papers will be laid on the table of the Senate in due course.

POST OFFICE: WOOLLAHRA.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Will he take the necessary steps to lay upon the table of the Senate all papers relating to the erection of new post and telegraph offices at Woollahra, New South Wales?

Senator DRAKE.—The following is the answer to the honorable senator's question:—

The papers are very voluminous, and the cost of making copies to place upon the table of the Senate would be considerable. There is no objection to placing a précis on the table, and the whole of the papers can be perused by the honorable senator if he desires to do so.

CUSTOMS FINES.

Senator WALKER (for Senator PURFORD) asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What was the amount of fines collected in Victoria, year by year, during the ten years ending with 1900, and in 1901 to 8th October, for breaches of the Victorian Customs Act?

2. What is the aggregate amount of the fines collected in Victoria for breaches of the Federal Customs Act to the latest date for which it can be given?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

CUSTOM-HOUSE : HOBART.

Senator WALKER (for Senator MACFARLANE) asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. When will the new Custom-house in Hobart be occupied?

2. The reason for the many months delay since its completion?

3. Are there any other buildings in the Commonwealth unoccupied for the same reason?

Senator DRAKE.—The following are the answers to the honorable senator's questions:—

1. Early in the next financial year.

2. Because it was not deemed necessary to incur the expense which was not provided on the Estimates. The building was commenced by the State Government before Federation, and has since been completed by it, except furniture, fittings and out-houses, for which a Federal vote is required.

3. No.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH :

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The PRESIDENT.—I have to inform the members of the Senate that His Excellency the Governor-General has fixed three o'clock on Friday next at the Treasury-building to receive the address in reply to his opening speech.

STANDING ORDERS.

In Committee (consideration resumed from 12th June, vide page 875) :

Standing Order 273.

Motions — "That the Committee do now divide," "That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again," and "That the Chairman do now leave the chair," shall be moved without discussion, and be immediately put and determined, and no such motion shall be repeated within fifteen minutes of any of these motions having been negatived: Provided that the senator in charge of a Bill or resolution, or a Minister of the Crown, may at any time move to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Upon which Senator Staniford Smith had moved by way of amendment—

That after the word "divide," line 2, the following words be inserted:—"which motion shall not be carried unless by a majority of four."

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I think it necessary very briefly to state the circumstances which surround the proposal before the Committee, in order that honorable senators who were not present last Friday may know what we are about to do. The standing order under consideration enables the motion, "That the Committee do now divide"—which is a closure motion—to be applied to any debate. Those who oppose that standing order failed to carry a provision that there should be a two-thirds majority in favour of such a motion, and it is now proposed by Senator Smith that the closure must be carried by a majority of not less than four. I submit that that is a just proposal. It would be in the power of a majority of four, if they so wished, to close the mouths of those senators who had not spoken to the question under consideration. I learn that the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives have considered a proposal of this kind, and have rejected it absolutely. That House has not in its draft standing orders anything approaching the proposal now put forward by our Standing Orders Committee. Surely if the House of Representatives, consisting of 75 members, can get along without a standing order of this kind, a more limited House like the Senate, consisting of only 36 members, can do without it.

Senator CHARLESTON.—The House of Representatives has not tried it yet.

Senator HIGGS.—I do not know the meaning of that interjection. The honorable senator is like a boy who throws a stone into a yard. He does not aim at anything, but hopes that he will hit something. No other legislative body in the world has such a standing order as this. Let us understand how it came to be put into operation in the Legislature of South Australia. I understand that there was there a gentleman named Ash.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The standing order was in operation long before Ash came into the House of Assembly.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—It was in operation before Ash was ever thought of.

Senator HIGGS.—I learn from a member of the House of Representatives that the only time that he saw this standing order used was when Mr. Ash conceived it to be his duty to "stone-wall" at great length a Factories Bill which was under consideration. I believe that he kept the House of Assembly up all one night, and that the members, with the exception of the Minister in charge of the Bill and the Chairman, left the chamber. Strangers were excluded from the gallery, and the affair became such a scandal that it was deemed absolutely necessary to put the standing order into operation. If I am mistaken on the point I have been wrongly informed, and some South Australian senator will be able to correct me. But I have had occasion to look at the debates of the South Australian Parliament, and, democratic and liberal as the people there generally are, the majority did some autocratic and tyrannical things. They took up a very dictatorial attitude towards a small minority opposed to them.

Senator PLAYFORD. — If this standing order has only been used once in South Australia, how can it be said that the majority was tyrannical on many occasions?

Senator HIGGS. — I said that the majority in the South Australian Parliament had been guilty of tyranny in several respects. I saw that in one debate when Senator Symon was speaking, though the matter was of extreme importance, somebody objected, and the debate was closed.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER. — That would have been on an informal motion.

Senator HIGGS. — However, it did not prevent him from saying what he had to say later on. But under a rule of this kind Senator Downer will see that if a representative of Western Australia or any other State brings forward a motion, makes his observations, and sits down, another honorable senator can get up and say, "I move that the Senate do now divide"; and if there is a majority against the mover of the motion, the Senate will divide, and an end will be put to further debate.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. — The mover must be a bad lot, then.

Senator HIGGS. — The honorable senator knows that if the Senate were in an excited state, the mover of the motion might not have a bad case and might yet be closed up. Take a state of feeling such as existed in Melbourne on what was called "Mafeking Night." I believe that every individual who came into Melbourne that night had to put on his colours, or submit to be buffeted about by the populace. I should not be surprised to hear that Senator Fraser was one of those who pulled a man out of a cart in Bourke-street because he did not wear his colours.

Senator FRASER. — I am getting too old for that sort of thing now.

Senator HIGGS. — The honorable senator would have done it when he was a younger man. There are times when people become intolerant. Their minds are made up; they think that the very last word has been said on a particular subject; that they have all the wisdom, and that nobody need say anything else because there is no other side to be put. We want to give the minority an opportunity of being heard. I may not be in a minority always. I know that some honorable senators think that I am looking after my own interests in this matter, but it is possible that I may be in a majority some day, and I might want to close up Senator Playford. I wish to be prevented from doing that sort of thing. I feel certain that honorable senators from New South Wales and other States, which have had no experience of such a standing order as this, will not tolerate anything of the kind, and will vote for Senator Smith's amendment.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). — The honorable senator who has just sat down says that there is no such stringent provision as this in the standing orders of any Parliament in the world, except that of South Australia. He must have forgotten the closure rules of the British House of Commons, which are infinitely more stringent. Prevention is often considered better than cure. In the House of Commons the rule provides that any member may move at any time "That the question be now put," and the Speaker rules. If there is a division on the question, the only qualification is that 100 members, out of a House consisting of 670 members, shall vote in favour of the closure motion. I venture to say that there is no danger in this provision. It has been proved to work well in the Senate, as well as for a great number of years in the Parliament to which I have been more accustomed. The standing order was not instituted in South Australia in consequence of the conduct of Mr. Ash. I went into the South Australian Parliament in 1878, and the rule had been in force a great many years before that; in fact, I believe it is as old as the original standing orders of that State. The informant of Senator Higgs told him two things which were utterly inconsistent with each other. One was that this standing order had only been used there in a case of very exceptional abuse, when a man kept members up all night wasting time. In the next breath he spoke of the dictatorial way in which the minority of South Australia were used by the majority. I appeal to all my honorable friends who come from South Australia to say with me that there has never been any dictation there any more than there has been here; and no one can assert that our proceedings in the Senate have not been conducted with great decorum. We have been conducting our proceedings with this standing order in force all the time, and no one can say that it has been abused. In South Australia it has never been complained of by anybody, and during the number of years I was there there was no party on either side of the House that wished to get rid of the rule. But I do not think the matter is of very much importance. We are not a very large body in the Senate. There are only 36 of us. But we do not want a set of circumstances to arise, under which we shall be kept here all night, supposing any honorable senator, becoming recalcitrant and troublesome, endeavours to delay business, rather than produce any result, or to delay producing results. We may pass the standing order with confidence, inasmuch as it has been in operation for many years in another Parliament, has never caused any trouble there, and has met with universal approbation. Now it is proposed that the closure motion shall be carried by a majority of at least four. When real obstruction has set in a large number of members go away. The attendance gets thinner and thinner, and it might be a matter of immense difficulty to get a majority of four at the very time when the closure motion was most wanted.

Senator MILLEN.—Would it not be better to close up if the Senate gets into that condition?

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—My honorable friend knows the emptying powers of a Member of Parliament who has got up to talk all night simply for the purpose of obstruction. We know that very well. I think it is a very wise standing order as it stands at present, and the amendment proposed ought certainly not to be agreed to.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I wish to say, in reply to the statement of Senator Downer, that this standing order has never been abused in South Australia, that we have in this Chamber two honorable senators representing that State, Senators Baker and McGregor, who have told us that it has been abused on occasions. Senator Baker said that it had hardly ever been abused, and Senator McGregor told us that there were exceptions to the general rule that it had not been abused.

Question—That the words proposed to be inserted be inserted—put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Amendment negatived.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I move—

That the words "Provided that a vote on the question, 'That the Committee do now divide,' shall require at least thirteen affirmative votes" be inserted after the word "determined," line 6. I shall not labour the matter. What I now propose is practically the New South Wales Legislative Assembly provision. It is a very fair proposal, and should need no words from me to commend it.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—I think we should have some intimation from Senator Drake and those who show so much enthusiasm in supporting the infamous gag, as to how they feel disposed to treat the new amendment. Many of the proposals we have made are exceedingly fair, and the least we have a right to expect from the representative of the Government is an intimation as to whether he is prepared to accept them or not. I believe Senator Higgs has already referred to the matter, but I take advantage of this opportunity to mention the remarkable fact that the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives, representing a House of 75 members, cut out every one of these closure standing orders. And yet we have the Standing Orders Committee of the Senate submitting an infamous standing order of this description, and the Government supporting it.

Senator MILLEN.—Does not the Government invariably do in one Chamber what they oppose in the other?

Senator DAWSON.—I am not prepared to answer that question in general terms, but in this case they are certainly doing one thing in the House of Representatives and quite another here. While I have nothing but commendation for the action of the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives, words fail me to describe the action taken by the Standing Orders Committee of the Senate in recommending the adoption of this standing order.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General). — I should like in this matter to be able to rely upon members of the Standing Orders Committee for a general support of the standing orders recommended in the report which they have submitted to the Senate, but I find that they do not agree amongst themselves. We have been told that, according to the practice adopted in South Australia, when this standing order is put into operation Ministers and those who have already spoken do not vote for the motion.

Senator DAWSON.—In Queensland they do quite the opposite.

Senator DRAKE.—We have never had this standing order in Queensland, and therefore I am unable to see how cases quoted from Queensland history can apply. If there is to be a minimum vote of thirteen in favour of the motion "That the Committee do now divide," and if Ministers and those who have already spoken are not to vote—

Senator PEARCE.—Will the honorable and learned senator allow me to point out that he has laid down a different practice in this Chamber.

Senator DRAKE.—I have not laid down any practice. We are told that it is the invariable practice in South Australia that Ministers, and those who have already spoken, do not vote for such a motion, and it seems to me that if we are to adopt the South Australian practice, and to require a minimum vote of thirteen to carry this motion, the whole thing will be rendered nugatory. If, on the other hand, we do not adopt that practice, by insisting upon a minimum vote of thirteen in support of this motion we make it more stringent than if we allow the standing order to remain as it is, with the understanding that the South Australian practice is to be followed. I hope Senator Pearce will not press his amendment.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia). —It is all very well for Senator Drake to speak of what has been the invariable rule in South Australia. The honorable and learned senator has become very credulous all of a sudden. He must know that the rule to which he referred was not followed in this Chamber. Honorable senators from South Australia ought to know that it has not always been followed in that State. There have been men in the South Australian Parliament who were prepared to vote when even the Constitution would prevent them, and it is within my knowledge that members of the South Australian Legislative Council who had already spoken upon a question voted when it was to their interest to have the motion put—"That the House do now divide." Senator Downer says that what we have proposed would make the standing order impracticable. But why would it make it impracticable? The honorable and learned senator has said that in the House of Commons, which honorable senators are so fond of quoting and following, it requires 100 to apply the "gag." I cannot call it anything else. If 100 are required in the House of Commons where the attendance, unless in very exceptional cases, is never more than between 200 and 300, surely 13 in the Senate, where the attendance is very often up to 30, is not an excessive vote to require in favour of such a motion. It does not matter a great deal to me, but when there are honorable senators from other States who have suffered from the application of the closure I think some consideration should be given to their views.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—They have not suffered in this Chamber.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I understand that Senator Zeal, when President of the Legislative Council of Victoria, used in this Chamber to put such a motion himself. I have been told that it was quite usual for the honorable senator to tell a member of the Legislative Council of Victoria that he had said enough already. He had the closure in his own hands, and the honorable senator, while President of the Legislative Council, was a standing order unto himself, and, I believe, a very good one. Here we have a reasonable request that at least thirteen senators shall assent to any motion of this description. If there are not thirteen senators present prepared to vote for stopping a debate, no great harm can be done by allowing the debate to continue until the absentees had an opportunity to return. Therefore, I hope that the Committee will support the amendment. I do not waste very much time in the Senate, and I hope the gag will not be applied to me here as it was applied to me in the Legislative Council of South Australia where, we are told, it has been the invariable rule for Ministers not to vote on a motion for the application of the closure.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—The Postmaster-General has addressed to the Committee an argument from which he has attempted to show that the practice ruling in one State Parliament will necessarily be adopted here. But why should the practice of the South Australian Parliament, more than that of any other State Legislature, be taken as necessarily indicating the practice which will be adopted here? In the New South Wales Legislature, where a provision somewhat similar to that proposed by Senator Pearce is in vogue, it has been the invariable practice of Ministers to vote, as I contend that they ought to vote, on such a question. No honorable senator, whether a Minister or otherwise, should shirk his responsibility by retiring from the Chamber when a vote of this character is submitted. Whatever may be the result of this amendment, I hope that no such practice as that which I am astonished to learn is countenanced in South Australia, will be adopted in the Senate. I think the suggested minimum of thirteen is most reasonable. We require that a quorum shall be present for the transaction of our business, and is it too much to ask that there shall be at least thirteen senators voting in the affirmative on a question involving a somewhat similar principle?

Senator DAWSON.—The application of the gag will stop the whole of the debate.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator reminds me that a very much more important question is involved than that of whether an individual senator shall be allowed to continue his speech. The whole debate upon what might be an important question might be terminated in this way; and is it too much to ask that before such a thing can take place, at least thirteen honorable senators shall have expressed their concurrence? I propose to vote for the amendment. If any alteration is to be made, it is far better that it should be in the direction of increasing the latitude of honorable senators rather than of restricting them in debate.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—The honorable senator who has just resumed his seat did not hear the discussion which took place last week, or he would not have said that in South Australia Ministers invariably leave the chamber when what has been called this "infamous gag" is applied. I have never known of an instance in which they failed to vote on the question. The rule is that they vote against the application of the gag. That was the position taken up by Ministers in South Australia during my experience as a member of the State Legislature from 1868 until I entered the Senate. There may have been one or two instances in which they did not follow that rule, but that was the practice. It is very singular that Senator Dawson should call this an "infamous gag." He quite forgets that when the South Australian labour party was organized, they were thoroughly familiar with the standing orders governing the State Parliament: and they thought this such a wise provision that they adopted it in their own standing orders. Thus this "infamous gag" is the gag of the labour party in South Australia. The fear that this standing order will be unfairly applied is altogether without reason. Even Senator McGregor cannot say that the similar provision in the South Australian standing orders was unfairly applied to him on the occasion when he was speaking in the State Legislative Council. He was unmistakably "stone-walling" at the time, and the closure was rightly applied in that instance. He cannot bring forward any case in which it was not rightly applied there. It is much better that we should leave the standing order as it is, for I feel sure that in a Chamber like this it will never be applied unless it is richly deserved by the party against whom it is directed.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I regret that I cannot share the enthusiasm that Senator Playford evidently entertains for all the doings of the South Australian Ministry. I am also unable to find myself in agreement with the Postmaster-General, who has indicated a ready willingness to submit himself, for all futurity, to the practice and precedents of the South Australian Parliament. That is an attitude of which I cannot approve, and which, I think, is utterly unworthy of the Postmaster-General. I have consistently voted for this standing order, believing that in doing so I was maintaining majority rule. I still propose to maintain majority rule. There are two ways in which a minority might carry out their desire. A minority might have their way in the Senate if they were allowed to continue a debate in spite of the wishes of the majority, and they might also have their way in preventing a debate. Unless at least thirteen vote for the application of a provision like this, we shall have practically minority rule. The reason why I support this amendment is because I believe in majority rule, and because I object to a minority of less than thirteen deciding any question in the Senate. The amendment is a wise one, although I do not know whether those who are most anxious for its adoption know what it really means. It may be argued that thirteen is an arbitrary number. It is not, because we have to recognise that twelve form a quorum in this Chamber. It is because thirteen is one more than the number required to form a quorum that I am going to vote for the amendment.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—Under our Constitution twelve honorable senators are required to form a quorum, but the amendment practically proposes that when twelve honorable senators are present we should not transact any business if some honorable senator moves "That the Committee do now divide." In such circumstances some honorable senators might leave the chamber, just as we have seen them do before. If there were sixteen senators present, and twelve voted for the motion, "That the Committee do now divide," while four voted against it, when there would be a majority of eight in favour of the question, it would still be impossible for the Committee to close the debate. In other words, four honorable senators would out-vote twelve, because the amendment is that at least thirteen shall vote for the application of the "gag," as the standing order has been called. It is true that in the House of Commons there must be 100 affirmative votes for the application of the closure. That is practically one-seventh of the total number of members. In the Senate a seventh would be a little over five, or say six senators, so that, by requiring that at least thirteen honorable senators shall vote in the affirmative, we shall make the rule quite as difficult of application as it is in the House of Commons.

Senator DAWSON.—In the House of Commons 40 is sufficient to form a quorum.

Senator WALKER.—May sets forth that the rule in the House of Commons is as follows:—

Pursuant to the Standing Orders Nos. 23 and 26, whilst the Speaker, or the Chairman of Ways and Means, is in the chair, after a question has been proposed, if a member rising in his place moves "That the question be now put," that question shall be put forthwith without amendment or debate, unless it appears to the Chair that the motion is an abuse of the rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority; and if, when a division is taken, it appears by the numbers declared from the Chair that not less than a hundred members voted in the majority in support of the motion, it is decided in the affirmative.

Thus, practically, one-seventh of the total number of members of the House of Commons must vote in the affirmative to allow the closure to be applied, and if we provide that there shall be at least six votes cast in the affirmative, we shall relatively carry out the practice of the House of Commons. The amendment proposed by Senator Pearce is really worse than that which was moved by Senator Smith. I shall vote against it.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—We have listened with very great pleasure to Senator Walker's arithmetical calculations, but if we are to compare the House of Commons with this Chamber, we must make the comparison complete in every way. Twelve honorable senators, or one-third of the total strength of the Chamber form a quorum, and Senator Pearce proposes that the number of affirmative votes cast in favour of the motion, "That the Committee do now divide," shall be one more. Forty members form a quorum in the House of Commons, or slightly over one-sixteenth of the total number of members, and yet the number of affirmative votes necessary to impose the closure is 100, or two and a half times the number of the quorum. If we followed that rule we should, therefore, require 30 affirmative votes. It is only necessary to carry out the analogy to the full extent in order to see how ridiculous it is. I have often said that it is absurd to compare our procedure with that of the House of Commons. We are here representing a new country and a new Constitution. We are building from the foundations, and we should build according to our own ideas. I am very much surprised that, in a Chamber where so many of the foremost constitutionalists of Australia find a place, an attempt should be made to deprive the representatives of the people of the rights which are conferred upon them by the people. I have often seen, in connexion with legal procedure, the words "ultra vires." I do not know their exact meaning, but I have a faint impression that they mean that some individual has done something which he has no right to do. In any case, it appears to me that the Senate is attempting to do something which, under the Constitution, it has no power to do. That is the position I take up. Senator Fraser is a great admirer of the Constitution, but by supporting this standing order, it appears to me that he is trampling it underfoot. Why are we sent here? Are we not elected for the purpose of representing the ideas and wishes and aspirations of our constituents?

Senator FRASER.—Some of us do so very badly.

Senator STEWART.—The honorable senator has formed a very correct estimate of his own capacity, I regret to say. We are here sent by our constituents to represent their case here, and yet a majority of honorable senators desire in this standing order to usurp the power which belongs to only the constituencies. For instance, if my constituents sent me to Melbourne to support a certain proposal, the majority of the senators could deprive me of my right to speak. What is the object of this standing order? Is it not to stifle discussion? If Senator Dobson had twenty witnesses to examine in a court who could each testify to a particular thing, what would he think if after the tenth witness had been examined the Judge quietly said, "Mr. Dobson, I do not want to hear any more evidence; my mind is made up?"

Senator DOBSON.—There is no analogy.

Senator STEWART.—Certainly there is. The honorable and learned senator would complain, and very fairly, that an injustice was being done to his client. The evil of the rule appeals to him immediately when it is applied to a case in a court, and it is intensified a hundredfold when it is applied to a question in the Senate, where the interests of the community are at stake. Seeing that nothing better can be done, I intend to support the amendment. It is, I think, a very fair compromise. It is not asking for very much. It places the power of stifling discussion in the hands of thirteen senators in a House of 25. What more do the friends of the gag want? Surely that is quite sufficient for them? If they want anything more they must be epicures in the matter of gagging.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—I am surprised at the opposition which is shown to this very reasonable amendment. I do not believe in closure rules. I have always voted against their application in Queensland, and I shall always vote against their application in the Senate. I am very anxious to ascertain the motives which actuate honorable senators to favour the adoption of the closure. During the last two years has there been any sound reason advanced why the closure should be applied? It has been applied once or twice. To my regret it was applied once against the Government when I was very anxious that they should win. It seemed to me to act unfairly on that occasion. If there was no strong justification for the application of the rule during that long session, when most controversial measures were debated, why is it now desired that it should be embodied in our code of standing orders? It appears to be feared by some honorable senators that something serious may happen, and that it will be well to have this weapon available to silence those whom they do not wish to hear on a question. Supposing that, in a reasonably full Senate, we are discussing a question of very great moment, affecting, it may be, the welfare of the people of Australia—at any rate, the people of some State. What objection can there be to a rule requiring that thirteen honorable senators shall support a motion to close such a debate. Some honorable senators have found fault with the Postmaster-General because he supports the standing order. I presume that, as acting leader of the Senate, he is bound, in fairness, to take the course which he has taken. I know that he has smarted more than once under the very stringent rules of the Legislative Assembly of Queensland. I have smarted there time and again, and I am not anxious to smart in the Senate. I am very much disappointed that honorable senators cannot see their way to support this very reasonable amendment.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—Any question relating to what is termed "the gag" is always received most unpopularity in a House, because honorable members do not like to interfere with the fair opportunity of every member to express his opinions in his own way, so long as he shows fair consideration for the opinions of others. In New South Wales I had experience of the application of "the gag," and I believe that, like Senator Millen, I always voted against its application. The Standing Orders Committee prepared this code with the desire of meeting as many cases as might possibly arise in the future. We had to bear in mind that if we determined upon having a rule of this kind it could only be enforced by a majority of the senators present. The statement of Senator Clemons that he supports the provision because he believes in majority rule will be seen to have no weight at all. Supposing that we had a rule to the effect that no clause of a Bill should be passed unless at least thirteen senators voted in the affirmative, should we not be reducing our legislation to a farce? The Constitution says that twelve senators shall form a quorum, and shall be empowered to transact all the business which may be presented. If we were to provide that no question should be decided in the affirmative unless thirteen senators had so voted, we should be doing the very thing which Senator Pearce suggests with regard to the closure? The strong sense of justice in the majority of the senators will always prevent any unfair use being made of "the gag."

Senator DAWSON.—Cannot the honorable and learned senator see that the application of "the gag" does not silence one senator, but all discussion, and that the senator who offends is not punished?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—If a question has not been discussed fairly and fully, there will probably be a number of honorable senators who will desire to speak, and who, if for no other reason than that, will oppose the application of the rule, unless they recognise that such gross abuse is being made of the privilege of speech that it is better to close the debate than to speak themselves. In Committee a senator can speak as often and as long as he likes, and if we had no closure rule, four or five determined men could prevent the Committee from coming to any decision within a reasonable time. We do not desire that sort of thing to happen. We wish to be in a position to say to honorable senators—"You have debated this question for a long time. You know that you are defeated, but as you are determined to "stone-wall" and make it almost impossible to pass the clause under discussion, we will put an end to the debate at once." I am not a believer in applying the gag where it can be avoided. But I do not think that we should be justified in introducing such an amendment as that proposed. If we have 25 senators present it would mean that the closure motion could be enforced, but if there were only 16 or 17 senators present there would be no possibility of closing the debate, if there were a few who were determined that it should not be closed. Senator Higgs has been fighting this question very determinedly. On reference to the report of the Standing Orders Committee, however, I find that on the 4th July, amongst other senators present at a meeting of the Standing Orders Committee was Senator Higgs. The minutes of the committee for the day say—

Standing Orders 263 to 331 agreed to.

They were agreed to without amendment or debate. Those standing orders embraced the one under consideration. So that Senator Higgs' new-born zeal was not evinced at that meeting of the Standing Orders Committee. Although he was present when this rule was debated he directed no attention to it. He could have had a discussion upon it there and then, and might have caused the committee to come to a different decision, but he did not see fit to debate it.

Senator HIGGS.—Would the honorable and learned senator have altered his view if I had then suggested an amendment?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I do not know what arguments the honorable senator would have adduced. As to the question of majority rule, I would point out that if a majority of thirteen be required to stop a debate, by the same parity of reasoning there should be thirteen to decide any question put to the Senate. To insist on that would be to reduce the whole business to an absurdity. I intend to vote against the amendment, although I have every objection to interfering with honorable senators' speeches. But the majority have a right to some consideration when there is "stone-walling" going on. Four or five men could effectually "stone-wall" in a Senate of sixteen senators, and it would be quite impossible if this amendment were carried to put an end to a debate of that kind unless a large number of those present walked out of the chamber.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—The principle of our Constitution is that every question before the Senate shall be decided by a majority; not an absolute majority, but a majority of those present. The number fixed by the Constitution as necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate is twelve. That number being fixed as a quorum by the Constitution, the Act goes on distinctly to say, in section 23, that—

Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and each senator shall have one vote.

We do not depend on a standing order to say that the quorum shall consist of twelve. The Constitution says that the number of the senators shall be 36, and that the quorum shall be twelve. The jurisdiction intrusted to the Senate can be exercised by twelve senators.

Senator STEWART.—The Constitution did not contemplate the gag.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER. — The Constitution does not decide questions arising in the Senate, but in making standing orders controlling our proceedings we must be careful not to insert any provision that would be distinctly ultra vires. Assuming the standing orders not to be ultra vires—and I think there can be no doubt about that—then comes the question: Is there any power to put in this limitation which is sought to be imposed? The amendment, under cover of regulating proceedings in the Senate, says that the quorum to determine a certain question shall not be twelve, but shall be at least fourteen. The amendment thus requires to carry a motion more than the quorum settled by the Constitution for deciding the most solemn questions over which the Senate can exercise jurisdiction. Leaving out the question of the "gag," about which Senator Stewart holds strong views, and assuming that it is a correct principle to prevent debate being stopped, the amendment before us at present is not only beyond our power to pass, but is, I submit, unreasonable, because it requires that, in order to exercise the power of necessary control over debate, the number of honorable senators present shall exceed the number which the Statute has authoritatively fixed as a quorum for conducting business.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I find that the amendment is on all fours with a standing order which has been in force in the State from which I come, for nine years. Strangely enough I find that it was passed there on the 11th July, 1894, so that it has actually been in force in the New South Wales Legislative Assembly—which is the largest deliberative body in Australia—for nine years. It has been found to work admirably there. Seeing that we have had an account given of the experience of another State where the Parliament is smaller than the New South Wales Parliament, and in view of the fact that in a Parliament, which at the time the standing order was passed numbered 141 members and now numbers 125, it has been found to work admirably, and it has never been proposed to alter it—I, for one, think I shall be justified in supporting this proposal.

Senator CHARLESTON.—What about the constitutional point?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not think there is anything in the constitutional point. In fact, it is not a constitutional point, but merely a little legal sophistry. The amendment is not a proposal to alter the quorum of the Senate, which remains the same as laid down in the Constitution.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It would prevent the Senate from determining a question by a majority of votes.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There is no proposal to alter the Constitution in an amendment upon a standing order to the effect that a certain number of votes shall be required before the rule shall be effective. The question of the quorum has no more to do with it, than the price of wax matches in Kamtschatka. It is a mere legal sophistry to say that the quorum fixed by the Constitution is interfered with by determining that a certain majority shall be required to carry a certain motion. I submit that the very eagerness displayed by a section of the Senate to obtain this power is the best possible evidence of the risk to which minorities will be subjected if this amendment is not adopted. I have listened attentively to the debate, and have heard senator after senator with a fine flavour of toryism—I am a bit of a tory myself, but not of this kind—making a dead set to do what? To destroy the right of free speech on the part of minorities. It is not the majority for whom standing orders of this kind are required. It is the minority who should be principally considered, because the majority have the power of voting, whilst the minority have nothing but the power of speech by means of which to advocate their opinions, and to seek to attain that for which the people sent them here to struggle. For these reasons I think that there should be a fixed number required to carry the motion of closure. I am not wedded to thirteen. Thirteen is a very unlucky number in the view of some people. I do not want to establish a “Thirteen-club” or anything of that sort here. I do not mind if the number is fixed at eleven or twelve, and, if the present amendment is not passed, I shall be willing to make one to fix the number at such a figure. If it were fixed at eleven or twelve, the point submitted by Senator Downer would be destroyed. But I am absolutely against placing the power of closure within the control of a bare majority, no matter how many are present. Are we going to say that when business is being conducted with a statutory quorum of twelve senators, seven are to have the power to shut up the other five, and not allow them to be heard, nor allow the views of those who sent them here to be represented by one word in the records of the Chamber? Such a proposal is abhorrent to any one’s sense of constitutional rule and parliamentary methods.

Senator FRASER.—Should the seven be allowed to retard the business of the Senate?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Do honorable senators seriously suppose that it would be better to have the Senate counted out than to allow a senator to express the views he is sent here to represent. The matter is a great deal more serious than some honorable senators appear to think. It means that for fear one senator may make his observations at undue length all other senators may be prevented from expressing their opinions. Such procedure strikes at the very base of all argument. There are people in the world who are afraid to hear discussion. If such people take advantage of this rule and move the closure, and it is carried, others will have to submit without one word of discussion. That is a very much more serious thing than that there should be a little prolixity on the part of one honorable senator. To suggest that honorable senators who are sent here from the four winds of the Commonwealth are to have their mouths closed because there happens to be one more opposed to them than there is on their own side, is a proposition that cannot possibly, upon reconsideration, meet with the support of a majority in this Chamber. I again repeat, that if this proposal for an affirmative vote of thirteen be not assented to, I shall be prepared to vote for any less number. In New South Wales, the affirmative vote required is 40 out of a House of 125 members. Whether the number fixed here be 10, 11, 12, or 13, I care not, but there should be some specified affirmative vote required before the right of free speech, which is supposed to be guaranteed by the Constitution, is taken away from honorable senators.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—“The right of free speech” is a splendid sounding phrase, especially in the ears of the labour party. But what would be said if the minority were to permanently override and gag the majority? In plain English, what is desired now is that Parliament shall be controlled by the minority. We have had to listen to many grandiloquent phrases about “gagging,” and all the rest of it, and while I admit that there are some very decent men amongst the labour party, I think they need to be educated, and that they did not get enough of the mother’s birch in their young days. Are we to conduct our business by minority or majority? Honorable senators appeal to their constituents, forsooth, for sanction to defy the majority, but they have no such sanction, and will never get it. The constituents are wiser in their generation than to allow a small minority to override the majority in Parliament. They may at times not like what majorities do, but they come round in a little time to the view that it is safer to trust the majority than to trust the minority. I think that our safest course will be to oppose the amendment, however simple it may appear. I agree with Senator Downer and others who say that the amendment is in contravention of section 23 of the Constitution, which provides that the majority in the Senate shall rule. Google

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I think that legal members of the Senate should be very careful before getting up to make rash statements about the meaning of the Constitution. There is just a possibility that some unsophisticated layman like myself may, perhaps, attempt to show that they have given a verdict upon the question without having looked into it very fully. That is one reason why we should have an Appeal Court. On this occasion I think that Senator Downer has been led astray by Senator Playford, his compatriot, presenting him with this wonderful mare's nest when he had no time to closely examine it. Section 23 does not contain the final word in the Constitution upon this question. If section 23 had stood alone, Senators Downer and Playford might jubilate; but we have to turn to other sections. In section 49 I find the following:—

The powers, privileges, and immunities of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and of the members of the Committees of each House, shall be such as are declared by the Parliament, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom and of its members and Committees at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That is subject to the general rule that we cannot go beyond what our Constitution provides.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—That does not get us one bit further.

Senator PEARCE.—I have not said my final word yet. I say that one of the privileges of members of the Senate is the privilege of debating questions, and a privilege we acquire, I take it, from the House of Commons is that of speaking to a question, and it cannot be affected except upon the lines laid down by the practice of the House of Commons until we have fixed our own standing orders. I am very doubtful whether the word "questions" as appearing in section 23 would refer to a motion "That the Senate do now divide," because it seems to me that such a motion is merely part of the procedure of the Senate, or of a rule laid down to enable questions to be dealt with. We are discussing now the procedure for dealing with the questions referred to in section 23, and not one of those questions itself. Section 50 of the Constitution provides that—

Each House of the Parliament may make rules and orders with respect to—(1) The mode in which its powers, privileges, and immunities may be exercised and upheld: (2) The order and conduct of its business and proceedings either separately or jointly with the other House.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That does not take away the right to decide questions by a majority vote.

Senator PEARCE.—That is a section of the Constitution giving us power to lay down rules for the order and conduct of our business. Section 23, to which Senators Downer and Playford have referred us, provides that—

Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and each senator shall have one vote.

I would ask Senator Downer whether all questions arising in the Senate are decided by a majority of votes? I do not need to tell the honorable senator that they are not, and that there are some questions which have to be decided by an absolute majority of the Senate. If honorable senators will turn to section 57 of the Constitution they will find that, after stating the provision made for a disagreement between the two Houses, the section provides—

The members present at the joint sitting may deliberate, and shall vote together upon the proposed law as last proposed by the House of Representatives, and upon amendments, if any, which have been made therein by one House and not agreed to by the other, and any such amendments which are affirmed by an absolute majority of the total number of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be taken to have been carried.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—That has nothing to do with it.

Senator DRAKE.—That is not a question arising in the Senate.

Senator PEARCE.—There is also a provision for the suspension of the standing orders, and it was determined again and again in this Chamber during last session, that to carry such a motion an absolute majority of the Senate was required. Section 23 of the Constitution deals with questions of laws—questions concerning Bills—and there must be a majority to carry those questions. It would, perhaps, be unconstitutional for us to say that they should be carried by a two-thirds majority, or by a majority of four. But when we come to deal with standing orders for the conduct of business in the Senate, I contend that we have unlimited power under section 50 to make such standing orders as we please for the purpose. If it were not so, will honorable senators contend that the framers of the Constitution were ignorant of what they were doing when they passed section 23?

If they were not, why did they not in section 49 insert the words "subject to the limitation laid down in section 23"? The reason is that they recognised fully that they had laid down no such limitation. I recognise that certain members of the Senate have made up their minds upon this amendment, not upon its merits, but simply because they intend to use the power given by the standing order "willy-nilly," and no argument will move them. I see nothing at all in the constitutional objection which has been raised to the amendment, and I ask honorable senators to support it.

The CHAIRMAN.—I think it is only fair that when an important question has been raised I should give some ruling upon it. I admit both the difficulty and the importance of this question. Section 23 of the Constitution says—

Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and each senator shall have one vote.

Under section 50 of the Constitution it is provided that—

Each House of Parliament may make rules and orders with respect to the order and conduct of its business and proceedings either separately or jointly with the other House.

In my opinion the word "questions" in section 23 refers to questions involving some principle or other which are to be dealt with by the Senate, and it does not include matters merely of procedure, as to how the Senate shall conduct its business. The matter immediately before us refers to what may be done in Committee, but in the Senate itself the same rule will apply. The amendment is taken from the New South Wales standing orders, and we have to look for guidance in regard to those standing orders to the New South Wales Constitution Act. The Constitution Act of New South Wales contains a provision similar to that in the Commonwealth Constitution. Section 23 provides that—

The presence of at least twenty members of the Legislative Assembly, exclusive of the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the said Legislative Assembly for the despatch of business, and all questions, except as herein excepted—

That refers to questions as to absolute majorities—which shall arise in the said Assembly, shall be decided by the majority of votes of such members as shall be present, other than the Speaker, and when the votes shall be equal the Speaker shall have the casting vote.

Having quoted the terms of the Constitution of New South Wales, which are somewhat similar to our own, I turn to the standing orders of the New South Wales Legislative Council. Standing Order 175 provides that—

At any time during the proceedings of the House, or during the proceedings of a committee of the whole, any member may move without notice or debate "That the question be now put"; and such motion shall then be put without debate, but shall not be decided in the affirmative unless by a vote of a least 40 members in favour thereof, and if such motion be carried the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees, as the case may be, shall forthwith put the question to the vote: Provided that whenever it is decided that any question shall be put, the mover of the matter pending shall be permitted to speak in reply (where any reply is allowed) for 30 minutes before the question be put.

I do not mean to say that the precedent I have quoted necessarily concludes the matter; but it affords some guidance to the Senate. Having regard to the terms of our Constitution, and the specific power which is therein set forth that we are to make our own standing orders as to the regulation and conduct of our business, I think that the amendment is essentially one relating to the conduct of our business, and is therefore in order. Incidentally I may state that, in my opinion, the word "questions" in section 23 of the Constitution relates to questions involving practically some important matter of principle and not of procedure.

Question—That the words proposed to be inserted be inserted—put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Amendment agreed to.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I move—

That the words "and provided further that no such motion shall be put unless the Chairman be satisfied that the question has been sufficiently discussed" be inserted after the word "votes."

Senator Downer has mentioned the House of Commons practice in this regard, and my proposition is that we should adopt it. At page 212 of May, 10th edition, it is set forth that—

Pursuant to the Standing Orders Nos. 25 and 26 whilst the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means is in the chair, after a question has been proposed, if a member rising in his place moves "That the question be now put"

That is similar to our own provision "That the House do now divide"— that question shall be put forthwith without amendment or debate, unless it appears to the Chair that the motion is an abuse of the rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority; and if, when a division is taken, it appears by the numbers declared from the Chair that not less than a hundred members voted in the majority in support of the motion, it is decided in the affirmative.

I propose to leave it to the Chairman of Committees or to the President, as the case may be, to decide whether the rights of the minority are being infringed on such occasions. I should even be prepared to leave the matter in the hands of Senator Zeal, who, when President of the Legislative Council of Victoria, used to say to a member "You sit down, you are only repeating what another honorable member has already said."

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is a fable.

Senator HIGGS.—I saw the statement in the Sydney Bulletin, and therefore it must be correct. I say that I would be prepared to leave it "even" to Senator Zeal, because he has been such a strong opponent of any interference with the rights of a bare majority to close the mouths of honorable senators. I am afraid that certain honorable senators forget that those who have not spent such a long series of years in political life as they have done, may occasionally have something to say. These honorable senators have had a long career—some of them have been in politics for half a life-time—and have made up their minds in regard to all political questions.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They are fossilized.

Senator HIGGS.—I do not say that they are fossilized, but there are certain grooves along which their thoughts run, and it is very difficult to get them out of those grooves. I would urge them not to say that this standing order should be passed without the addition of a provision such as I have proposed. I am sure that in such a crisis as that described the other day by Senator Playford, when honorable senators generally were thoroughly tired of the whole debate, the Chairman would be satisfied that the question had been sufficiently discussed. Unfortunately, the debate regarding this standing order has ranged almost completely round the case of honorable senators who might desire to obstruct business, and take up the time of the Senate by "interminably talking," as Senator Zeal said just now. Those are the honorable senators whom the Senate is trying to get at. But we also want to protect honorable senators who may desire to speak to a question, but have not had an opportunity of doing so.

Senator DRAKE.—I am perfectly satisfied that if thirteen honorable senators supported a motion "That the Committee do now divide," it would be upon an occasion on which it was perfectly clear to the Chairman that the subject had been thoroughly discussed. I do not know that the amendment would have very great effect in view of the amendment just carried, but I have no objection to it, because I do not think thirteen honorable senators will be prepared to terminate a discussion in a case in which it is not apparent to the Chairman of Committees that the matter has been sufficiently discussed.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—It seems to me to be very singular that honorable senators of the labour party who have been fighting against majority rule in the Senate should now propose that the Chairman of Committees shall decide as to when any honorable senator has spoken too long or too frequently upon a particular subject. If this amendment be carried, a word from him will be sufficient to cause a division to be taken.

Senator DRAKE.—There must be thirteen members of the Senate voting "Aye."

Senator CHARLESTON.—After the Chairman has said that the discussion has lasted long enough, a vote has to be taken, and thirteen senators must vote in the affirmative.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—Senator Charleston has got into a fog. In the first place, a senator has to move "That the Committee do now divide." The Chairman cannot interrupt the debate and say—"We shall take a vote." He has to decide whether, in the interests of the minority, that question should be put to the vote. I rose chiefly to express my astonishment that Senator Drake, after fighting us as he did, should be prepared on a question of minor importance to concede this right to one senator. Surely, if he is prepared to concede to the President or the Chairman the right to say—"I consider that this motion infringes the right of the minority, therefore I shall not put the question," he ought to be prepared to concede that right to thirteen senators? He is taking up a very inconsistent position.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—I do not think that the proviso ought to be made, because it will prejudice the position of the minority who wish to continue the debate. In the first instance the Chairman would have to decide whether, in his opinion, the motion should be put. Any senator who had not been paying very much attention to the debate might be influenced by the opinion of the Chairman, who had heard all the discussion, and for that reason he would probably vote for the motion. It would be a mistake to put the Chairman in that position. The motion does not involve debate. It has to be put at once, and the rights of the minority are protected by the provision that thirteen senators must vote in the affirmative. Almost the full strength of the Chamber is behind the senator whom any one is trying to stop. I feel sure that it will not be possible to get thirteen senators to vote unfairly to close any one's mouth. But certainly the "Yes" or "No" of the Chairman will put the question before the Committee with added force. I do not wish to see such a power placed in the hands of one man.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—It seems to me that Senator Higgs has made a mistake. The first part of the standing order says that the motion shall be made without discussion, and immediately put and determined; but it is now proposed in this amendment that—

No such motion shall be put unless the Chairman is satisfied—

In the interests of the Committee, as well as in the interests of the Chairman, I object to the amendment. I do not think it is fair to put him in the position of deciding the question whether the motion shall be put.

I voted for a majority of thirteen being necessary to enforce the closure. But I shall not vote for allowing, practically, the Chairman alone to decide the question.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I suggest that this question ought to be looked at from the Chairman's point of view as well as the member's point of view. Is it not very unfair to ask the Chairman to unnecessarily place himself in possible antagonism to three or four senators who think that they ought to be allowed to continue the debate? It will bring the Chairman into unnecessary friction with senators, and that is not fair to him.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I was very much surprised to hear such a speech from Senator Baker. When a senator accepts the position of President or Chairman of Committees he knows quite well that at some time or other he will by reason of his decisions have against him certain senators. For instance, last session, because the President voted in Committee in a certain way, certain senators got an animus against him, and it still lives in their breasts and is likely to do so for years. Every presiding officer has to undertake that risk. Evidently in the interests of the minority, members of the House of Commons demand that their Speaker shall take the risk of incurring the animosity of individual members. It is only human nature for a senator to think that the Chairman is wrong when he rules against his own view. Since, apparently, honorable senators are determined that a majority of thirteen shall silence those who have not spoken, it is only fair that we should adopt the House of Commons practice, and let the Chairman, who sits there as an umpire, decide whether the question shall be put. If, as Senator Baker suggested, two or three senators are likely to be actuated by animus against the Chairman, it is quite possible that in a time of heated discussion thirteen or fifteen senators may be actuated by that feeling and try to stop a senator. The President or the Chairman is always more cool and collected than any other senator, and he can see whether there is an attempt on the part of a simple majority to infringe the rights of the minority. Surely it is not asking too much of the presiding officer to undertake that duty? If at any time three or four senators are filled with animus against the Chairman, the majority will always see that he gets fair play, as they have done in the past. I do not like the standing order at all, but, since the majority demand that it shall be passed, they might give the minority the benefit of the House of Commons procedure in its entirety.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—I think it is very undesirable to put the Chairman or the President in the very invidious position of having to decide whether or not a subject has been sufficiently debated. To say that that decision will be received with equanimity at all times is to deny that knowledge of human nature which we all possess to some extent. Nothing is more necessary than that the presiding officer should be kept in a strictly impartial position, and should not be charged with the invidious duty of expressing opinions on subjects which we have to decide.

Amendment negatived.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I am only anxious to see that a senator who has not spoken to the question and who desires to speak shall get an opportunity to address the Chamber before the gag is applied. I do not ask that he shall be allowed to speak more than once to the question, but I do ask that he shall get an opportunity of speaking once.

Senator WALKER.—Nine hours' speeches.

Senator HIGGS.—If a senator is likely to speak for nine hours, he will probably take the opportunity of speaking before the time comes for the application of the closure. I shall make another attempt to insure that the minority shall get a chance. I move—

That the following words be added—"Provided further that such motion shall not be put if any senator present who has not spoken wishes to speak and rises in his place to do so."

Senator DRAKE.—I could not accept that amendment, because it seems to me to go dead against everything that the Committee has done up to the present time.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN.—It will be necessary to strike out the word "such" and to insert the words "mentioned in this standing order." The part of the standing order upon which we have been engaged will then read—

And no motion mentioned in this standing order shall be repeated within fifteen minutes of any of these motions having been negatived.

Amendments (by Senator DRAKE) agreed to—

That the word "such," line 6, be omitted; and that after the word "motion," line 9, the words "mentioned in this standing order" be inserted.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I should be glad if the Chairman would now read the standing order as amended.

The CHAIRMAN.—It reads as follows:—

Motions—"That the Committee do now divide"—"That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again;" and "That the Chairman do now leave the chair," shall be moved without discussion, and be immediately put and determined; Provided that a vote on the question "That the Committee do now divide" shall require at least thirteen affirmative votes, and no motion mentioned in this standing order shall be repeated within fifteen minutes of any of these motions having been negatived: Provided that the senator in charge of a Bill or resolution, or a Minister of the Crown, may at any time move to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Order 274 agreed to.

Standing Order 275—

An order for a call of the Senate shall be made for any day not earlier than fourteen days from the day on which such order shall have been made.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I suggest that the term be made 21 days instead of fourteen. In the case of senators from the distant States fourteen days is insufficient notice.

Amendment (by Senator DRAKE) agreed to—

That the word "fourteen" be omitted, and the words "twenty-one" inserted in lieu thereof.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 276 to 279 agreed to.

Standing Order 280. (Senators not attending during the day).

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—This refers to a call of the Senate. Should we not provide in this standing order for fining, or in some other way punishing, a senator who does not attend after receiving due notice? It is rather farcical to send out such a notice and yet provide no punishment whatever for those who do not attend, though they may be able to do so. If there is no penalty the standing order is useless.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Order 281 agreed to.

Standing Order 282—

The senators to serve on a select committee may be nominated by the mover, but if three senators so demand they shall be selected by ballot.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—This standing order should be amended in order to allow select committees to be chosen by ballot in all cases. The method of selection by ballot is very properly provided for in Standing Order 347. I can anticipate no practical difficulty. It is wrong to cast upon any three senators, it might be, the odium of demanding a ballot as against the mover of a motion for the appointment of a select committee. As it stands, the standing order requires that three senators shall immolate themselves by casting themselves into the breach, and doing something which may be unpleasant. I move—

That the words "may be nominated by the mover, but if three senators so demand they" be omitted.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—This standing order follows the practice which we have adopted ever since the Senate has been in existence. Every committee we have appointed has been chosen on the motion of the mover. That has been the case with the House Committee, the Library Committee, the Standing Orders Committee, and all other select committees. If there is no objection it seems to me that the course proposed in the standing order will facilitate business.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—It may expedite business, but when a senator wishes to get a particular person appointed to a committee he has to do a very unpleasant thing. He has to move that the matter be decided by ballot, and thus has to place himself in antagonism to the mover of the motion for the committee. There is no possible objection to the course proposed in this standing order applying to formal committees like the Library Committee and the House Committee. In the South Australian Parliament the personnel of select committees is decided by ballot. That is the fairest way, and it avoids any unpleasantness. When an honorable senator moves the appointment of certain senators to form a select committee, other honorable senators do not like to oppose him, although they may feel that he has made a mistake in the composition of the committee which he proposes. It is a great deal better to have a ballot by which the Senate will be able to act freely in selecting the men to be appointed to a committee. When a member of the Senate, in moving, for instance, that a Bill be referred to a select committee, chooses the members of that committee, he will probably choose those who hold opinions similar to his own. I think it is far better to adopt the South Australian practice, under which all these committees are balloted for. I shall support the amendment.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—The argument appears to be that because some one may be destitute of sufficient moral courage to do that which he believes to be right, the Senate is to be burdened with the process of going through a ballot on a motion for the appointment of a select committee, when in not one case in a dozen will there be any conflict of opinion. Senator Playford seems to think that the amendment proposes that the names of the members nominated to a select committee shall be submitted, and that we shall then go to a ballot, but Senator Clemons has not proposed that any names shall be submitted. If no names are submitted, how can a reasonable result be arrived at? Some one moves for a select committee, and then, without any names being submitted or the Senate having any knowledge of the honorable senators who may be willing to serve on the committee, we go to a ballot. What kind of nonsense is that? Last session the only select committee appointed on a private motion was one to take evidence with reference to steam-boat communication with Tasmania, and there was absolute difficulty in obtaining seven members of the Senate to serve on that committee. If we have a ballot without names being submitted, it may result in the selection of members of the Senate who will not serve. We shall have carried the motion for the committee, and will have failed to appoint them. This is an entirely new proposal. Apparently it is not new in South Australia, but what is proposed in the standing order is the practice of the House of Commons, the House of Lords, and I take it of the vast majority of Legislatures—that a senator proposing the appointment of a select committee shall name the senators whom he proposes shall serve on that committee, and then, if it is desired, a ballot is taken. Under the standing order it is proposed that three honorable senators may demand a ballot, and I should be willing to permit any one member of the Senate to demand a ballot, but certainly the names of those who are willing to serve should be submitted in order that honorable senators in balloting may know what they are doing. I take it that there is sufficient moral courage amongst members of the Senate to demand a ballot without such a demand being regarded as a reflection on the mover of the original motion for a committee. On the argument which has been used we should lack the moral courage to move an amendment to any question. If I were in order I should be prepared to move an amendment to provide that one voice should be sufficient to demand a ballot. I am willing to meet Senator Clemons to that extent, but I say that to have a ballot without having the names of honorable senators first submitted seems to me perfectly childish.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—It is not a question of moral courage at all, and there is no difficulty about the naming of the members of the committee under the practice which I suggest. It is found to be a very simple process indeed, because the mover of the select committee always issues his list, and those opposed to him issue their list. The question then goes to the ballot, and the majority decide. The mover of a committee would go round to ascertain whether certain members of the Senate would be willing to serve upon his committee, and those opposed to his views would probably do the same, and there would then be the two lists upon which the majority would decide. That is certainly the best way in which to appoint all these committees.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—I do not think there is the slightest difference between the two propositions. As Senator Playford has pointed out, in our practice the names are not in the first instance mentioned, and there is simply a motion for a committee. If there is a motion for a ballot, and it is carried, the House proceeds to take a ballot. All the invidiousness arises when the mover of the motion for a committee submits his list of names. According to the argument which has been used, it would then be difficult for any one else to submit any names other than those already submitted. It is said that there would be a feeling of delicacy in doing anything of that kind. But under the South Australian practice, whenever either the Government or the Opposition have proposed a committee, there has never been the slightest delicacy or hesitation in opposing the list of names submitted. What difference does it make whether the mover of a motion for a select committee mentions in his motion the names of honorable senators whom he desires to serve on the committee, or, a motion having been carried for the appointment of a select committee, a list of names is submitted?

Senator CLEMONS.—That is not the point.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There can only be a ballot under the standing order if three honorable senators demand it.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I agree with Senator Neild that a demand for a ballot by one honorable senator should be sufficient. It may be that a ballot is not desired, and that when the names are mentioned there is no objection to them; but if the standing order is altered in the way suggested there must be a ballot, and time will be wasted in voting upon a matter upon which everybody is agreed. I was referring merely to the question of invidiousness, and to submit a list of names in antagonism to one already submitted is certainly more invidious than to demand a ballot. From the point of view of convenience, I prefer the standing order as proposed, and if there is any invidiousness in the matter it exists in each case.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I do not think that the amendment proposed will improve the standing order as submitted. I see no reason for departing from what is almost the invariable practice of the House of Commons, and the practice also of most of the States Legislatures, simply because in one State there happens to be the rule now proposed. We have it on the authority of two honorable senators that that rule is a perfect farce, the list handed round being in almost every case accepted. The ballot is taken and time is wasted in arriving at a conclusion in that way which could be arrived at upon a simple motion. If the time comes when the mover of a motion for a committee in connexion with a contentious matter has not selected his committee fairly, any three members of the Senate could protest and demand a ballot. I doubt whether one honorable senator should be allowed to demand a ballot. Let us adhere to the usual practice, unless it is shown to be wrong, and do not let us depart from the usual practice, when it is shown that the departure proposed works out in exactly the same way as the rule ordinarily followed.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—The arguments of the last speaker seem to me to be very much confused. The honorable and learned senator started by saying that the whole thing would be a farce. What he intended to convey, I think, was that it would be a farce to have a list submitted and a ballot taken, because the whole thing would have been cut and dried. But my whole object is to secure a ballot in all cases, and that is what Senator Dobson has entirely overlooked. Under the standing order we could not get a ballot unless three honorable senators demanded it.

Senator DOBSON.—We do not want a ballot unless three honorable senators demand it.

Senator CLEMONS.—I do. I say that this thing has become a farce under the present practice, because owing to the fact that three honorable senators must demand a ballot under our rules no ballot is asked for, and the nomination of the mover of the committee is accepted in nine cases out of ten. I think that there should be a ballot, and I think the means of securing a ballot should be made as simple as possible. Senator Playford has pointed out how this can be done. We have heard some ludicrous remarks about the difficulty of obtaining a ballot unless somebody nominates certain senators, but there is no difficulty in the world in obtaining a ballot because a list is sent round, and Standing Order 347 prescribes the method of taking a ballot.

Senator DOBSON.—It is no trouble, but it is a waste of time.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am glad the honorable and learned senator admits that it would be no trouble. If that is admitted I wonder that any honorable senator should object to a ballot. If it is worth our while to appoint a select committee, the personnel of that committee should not be determined merely by the nomination of the honorable senator who moves for it. It should not be competent for any honorable senator to name the seven members of the committee to be appointed, and to find that in every case he had succeeded practically in obtaining their selection.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It could be dealt with by ballot under Standing Order 347.

Senator CLEMONS.—It is my desire that we should deal with the matter by ballot. I am anxious that the appointment of select committees should not be a farce. If we allow them to be appointed merely on the nomination of the mover—and we have seen that practice adopted here—we shall allow their selection to become farcical. We should at least leave it open to any honorable senator to move that the matter be dealt with by ballot.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—I strongly object to the adoption of the ballot in the Senate. Honorable senators should have sufficient courage to openly declare their intentions, not only in regard to the appointment of committees, but in reference to all matters that come before us. I do not believe in the ballot here.

Senator FRASER.—Does the honorable senator favour open voting at elections?

Senator GLASSEY.—That is another matter. We are the representatives of the people, and to attempt to shield ourselves in any way by means of the ballot would be to display a kind of moral cowardice altogether unworthy of us.

Senator WALKER.—The adoption of the ballot system might save time.

Senator GLASSEY.—On the contrary, it would not save time; but I do not object to the proposal from that stand-point, for it is not a very valid objection. I contend that inasmuch as honorable senators are chosen to serve the people they should be prepared to let the people see exactly how they vote in every capacity. If the appointment of a select committee were desired, and certain honorable senators were nominated to act upon it, it would be quite possible for an honorable senator having a distinct bias against any one of them—but wanting the requisite courage to openly say so—to shield himself by means of the ballot and to vote against that honorable senator whilst at the same time appearing to him to be a very nice fellow. That kind of conduct should not be tolerated by us. I always opposed the adoption of the ballot system in the State Legislature of Queensland, and I shall vote against its adoption here.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I think honorable senators will agree that I sometimes display a good deal of courage, but I must confess that I should not care to rise as one of three honorable senators to oppose the nomination of five or six others named for appointment on a select committee. To do so would be to give the honorable senator objected to a direct slap in the face. Such a course should be unnecessary.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Should we rather hit him on the sly?

Senator FRASER.—No; but we should conduct our proceedings in a decorous manner. We might think that some better nomination could be made, and by means of the ballot we should be able to record our vote without creating any disturbance or unpleasantness.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable senator does not like to unnecessarily hurt people's feelings.

Senator FRASER.—Exactly. Why should we do so when there is no necessity for anything of the kind. When there is a necessity to speak out we should not hesitate to show our courage. Courage is sometimes a very high attribute, but there are many occasions in which its display is out of place. I see no great objection to the original proposal, except that under it three honorable senators would have to rise in their places to demand a ballot. The selection of a committee is sometimes a very serious matter. A committee may be appointed to deal with questions to which the Senate attaches great importance, and it may involve a great deal of expenditure. Therefore, the best way of making a selection would be by the corporate vote of the Senate as proposed by the amendment.

Senator DRAKE.—I have not heard of any great objection to the practice which has been followed in the case of sessional committees, which are appointed at the beginning of each session. We have endeavoured to secure the separate representation of each of the States upon those committees, and to see that honorable senators are so distributed over them that as far as possible each shall have something to do. That is a matter requiring careful arrangement and much consideration, and I do not think that result would be obtained by the adoption of the ballot system. If that system were followed, we should probably have the same names recurring in the list of members of all the committees, while a number of honorable senators would not be asked to perform any duty in connexion with them. Some select committees are of very great importance. An honorable senator who is deeply interested in some particular subject and moves for the appointment of a committee to consider it, has generally taken care to ascertain who will be willing to serve on that committee.

Senator PLAYFORD.—And whose views are similar to his own.

Senator DRAKE.—Perhaps so. No doubt he seeks to have the different States represented on the committee, and to a very great extent he may also desire to insure the presentation of a report in a particular direction. Surely if it were a contentious matter of that kind, and if the object of the honorable senator were to obtain a committee which would bring up a report of a particular character, three honorable senators could be found ready to move that the committee be appointed by ballot. I think, therefore, that the standing order provides fairly for these two cases. So far as the sessional committees are concerned, I have not heard a single complaint with regard to their composition. I have not heard the slightest whisper of any dissatisfaction. In nominating them I endeavoured to meet the general desire of the Senate.

Senator FRASER.—Sessional committees might be excepted.

The CHAIRMAN.—They are excepted.

Senator DRAKE.—If it refers to select committees other than sessional committees there can be no difficulty.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I should like to point out that no reference is made in chapter 8 to the way in which committees to be created under that chapter shall be appointed. It is simply set forth that a Standing Orders Committee "shall be appointed"; that a Library Committee "shall be appointed," and so forth. It was not intended that the mode of appointment should be set out there; the matter was left to the particular chapter with which we are now dealing. On behalf of the Standing Orders Committee, I may say that it was intended that the most convenient practice—the practice which would take up as little time as possible—should be adopted. I do not think it would make any material difference whether we required three or only one honorable senator to demand a ballot. If there is any desire for a ballot it should be granted, but if there is not, why should not the mover be allowed to propose that the committee be appointed.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable and learned senator is right; sessional committees are not excepted.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia). I should like the Committee to consider whether it would not be well to adopt a provision similar to that which exists in the standing orders of the House of Representatives of the United States, which provide that—

Unless otherwise specially ordered the Speaker shall—appoint certain committees. We have followed very much the same wording in providing that—

Unless otherwise ordered all select committees shall consist of seven honorable senators.

If the words "Unless otherwise ordered" were inserted at the beginning of Standing Order 282 the matter would be left in the hands of the Senate. Surely, in the case of sessional committees we do not need to follow the course which has been indicated by Senator Clemons. The Senate represents the States, and it is desirable that each State should have a representative on every committee. It should not be made possible for the representative of two States to compose a select committee to report upon any subject.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—All committees which are not committees of the whole Senate are select committees. They may be standing committees or committees appointed to inquire into a Bill, but they are selected. A committee of the whole Senate is not selected because it consists of every Senator. Any committee which is selected out of the Senate is a select committee.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—I hope that the Committee will not adopt the proposal of Senator Clemons. It has been pointed out very clearly that the object of allowing the mover to nominate the committee is to save time when there is no objection to the personnel. In other cases it may be better that the committee should be selected by ballot. The Senate has first to determine whether it will appoint a committee and incur all the incidental expense. The mover generally takes good care to nominate those men who he thinks are generally in accord with his views, but who nevertheless are prepared to see that a fair inquiry shall be made into the subject-matter. All the proceedings are reported, and if any undue bias is shown there is the corrective which comes afterwards when the Senate has to deal with the report. If a ballot be taken, it will be quite impossible to insure that a committee shall be composed of a representative from each State, and the probability is that more senators will be chosen from one State than from another. I am not, however, carried away with that argument, because I wish the fact to become recognised that it is the duty of a senator, no matter what State he represents, to do what is fair to all the States. Take an ordinary case where a senator moves for a select committee, and nominates three or five men from one State, and two from another State. If I recognised that the subject-matter of the inquiry was one of general importance, and that the nominees were generally fair men, and the Senate seemed to think it was desirable to hold an inquiry, I should not object, because I believe that the committee would act straightforwardly. We represent the Commonwealth as a whole, and the sooner senators recognise the fact that they represent all the States, the better it will be. I think that the balance of advantage is in favour of leaving the standing order as it is. I am under the impression that the standing committees of the House of Commons are appointed under similar circumstances. In New South Wales it has been the inviolable practice for the mover to nominate those whom he desired to serve on any select committee, but it was open to any member to demand a ballot, and, if he did, his action was not regarded in an unfriendly light.

Senator DRAKE.—I quite agree with the spirit of the remarks of Senator Gould, but I think he has rather misunderstood me as to the reason why I have tried to put a senator from each State on each of the standing committees.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—That is all right for sessional committees.

Senator DRAKE.—If, for instance, a question as to the best course to adopt with regard to printing arises, there will be on the Printing Committee a representative from each State, who will be able to state the local practice. In the case of ordinary select committees, it should not count for much that one senator is from one State and another senator is from another State. It is desirable to do away with that distinction as much as possible.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—When I moved the amendment I had in my mind the cases of select committees, which are obtained by a private senator on his own nomination. I have no desire to interfere with the proper right of the Ministry to nominate certain committees at the beginning of each session, nor do I wish to interfere with the right of the President to nominate a particular committee under chapter 5. I do not desire to interfere with the chapter that deals with standing committees, which are totally different from select committees. What I desire to secure is that no select committee shall be granted to a private senator without a ballot being taken. I am prepared to alter my amendment. I can see no way of securing that object except by moving to insert this proviso—Provided that in the case of a select committee, other than any ordinary standing committee, the senators to serve on the committee shall be selected by ballot.

The CHAIRMAN.—I thought that we had followed the House of Commons practice, and distinguished between select committees and standing committees. Clearly there is a difference between standing committees and select committees in the House of Commons practice. If it is desired that that alteration should be made, it will be necessary to insert a new standing order in chapter 5 when it is reached. The only thing we can do is to remodel No. 282 with that object, and a portion of No. 283 will certainly have to be transferred to chapter 5.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—We had better make it clear at once that a select committee "shall" be nominated by the mover. If no senator makes a nomination, what is to take place? The word "shall" should be substituted for the word "may." It will be well to distinguish between sessional committees and select committees. I am quite willing to allow ordinary committees to be nominated by the movers, and, if necessary, to leave out the concluding words of the standing order.

Senator DRAKE.—Seeing that we are dealing with all these committees in this chapter, the standing order might be amended to read in this way—

The senators to serve on the Standing Orders Committee, Library Committee, House Committee, Refreshment Committee, and Printing Committee may be nominated by the mover, but if three senators so demand other select committees shall be selected by ballot.

We all agree that the standing order should remain as it is with regard to the standing committees.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There might be a necessity for appointing some other sessional committee.

Senator DRAKE.—We might use the term "sessional committee" if it is clearly understood to cover all committees appointed for that purpose.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—Would it not be advisable in the first place to deal with the proposal of Senator Clemons to omit certain words? If we take that course we shall get a test division and know exactly where we are. If it is in favour of his contention it will be easy to frame a proper standing order to meet his case.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I should like Senator Clemons to withdraw his amendment to enable me to move the substitution of "shall" for "may."

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—May I suggest that it will save time if we take a test division, and that if Senator Clemons succeeds in carrying his amendment, the matter be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee to redraft this standing order?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I support the amendment suggested by Senator Playford. I am delighted that at last he has come to see the force of the argument which I put forward, that it is positively necessary that the mover of a motion for the appointment of a select committee shall nominate the members of it. Otherwise the Senate will be balloting in the dark. All sorts of observations were made as to the wisdom of what I said, but my point of view is put in a concrete form by Senator Playford, whose suggested amendment I have much pleasure in supporting.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—I wish to point out to Senator Neild that I suggested the amendment because I thought it was the wish of the Senate to make a distinction between ordinary standing committees—which it is right and proper that the Government should nominate—and select committees appointed at the instance of an individual senator.

Senator DRAKE.—The shortest way of expressing the opinion of the Committee would be to vote on a proposal to omit the words "select committees," with a view of substituting the words "sessional committees."

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—All committees are sessional, and last merely for the term of the session. I think that it would be better for honorable senators to leave the standing order alone.

The CHAIRMAN.—Perhaps we can test the feeling of the Committee by voting on a proposal to strike out the words "a select committee." If those words are omitted the standing order will go back to the Standing Orders Committee to be redrafted.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—If the words mentioned are struck out it is to be understood that the Committee of the whole Senate desires that the Standing Orders Committee shall re-draft these standing orders so as to provide that standing committees shall be appointed on the motion of the mover, and that all other committees shall be appointed by ballot?

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—My desire is to provide that in the selection of all committees, except those prescribed by chapter 5, and other committees that may be appointed under similar conditions to those, a ballot shall be taken. Senator Baker will see that a certain number of committees are specified in chapter 5—the Standing Orders Committee, the House Committee, the Printing Committee, and the Committee of Disputed Returns and Qualifications. The practice, even if it be not prescribed by our standing orders, is that the Government nominates the standing committees, and the President nominates the Committee of Disputed Returns and Qualifications. It is quite conceivable that there may be other committees similar in character to those which ought to be similarly appointed. I do not propose to deal with any committees that have an official stamp upon them. The committees that I am aiming at are those which are nominated by a private senator. I wish the members of such committees to be balloted for.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—When we were discussing this matter in the Standing Orders Committee we took a great deal of trouble about it. We had the South Australian Standing Orders before us, and also the standing orders of other legislative bodies, including those of the Imperial Parliament. We came to the conclusion that what we propose is the shortest possible way of getting through the business. The suggestion of invidiousness never occurred to us, and after having heard the discussion that has taken place it does not appeal to me now. There will be no secrecy in voting by ballot in the Senate. It will practically be open voting. At present the practice is that the names of the senators who are to be members of a select committee are handed round. The list of various parties are submitted for the consideration of honorable senators, and there is no more secrecy about it than if the names were nominated openly. The first thing that a mover for the appointment of a standing committee does is to pass round the names of the members he suggests. What does it matter whether the names are chosen in that way, or whether they are balloted for? If the names suggested by the mover commend themselves to the Senate, why waste time in having a ballot? If they do not suggest themselves to the Senate, another list can be passed round.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—We are told by Senator Downer that the Standing Orders Committee gave a considerable amount of attention to this standing order, and that they had under consideration the South Australian Standing Orders, those of the House of Commons, and of other legislative bodies. I turn to the part of the committee's report dealing with the consideration of this standing order, and I find that Senator Downer was not present on that occasion, and that the standing order was passed without comment.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Could I not work at the standing orders when I was not there?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It seems to me that there was no discussion of the question; there certainly was no division. I believe that what Senator Clemons has suggested will meet the wishes of the majority of the Senate, and that it would be advisable to make an alteration in the direction indicated.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—A great deal of impatience was shown when I was discussing a certain proposal this afternoon, and I now feel inclined to move—"That the Committee do now divide."

The CHAIRMAN.—The Committee can test the question at issue by voting on a proposal to strike out the words "a select committee."

Amendment withdrawn.

Amendment (by Senator CLEMONS) proposed—

That the words "a select committee" be omitted.

Question—That the words, "a select committee," proposed to be omitted, stand part of the standing order—put. The Committee divided.

Amendments (by Senator PLAYFORD) agreed to—

That the word "may," line 2, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

That the word "three," line 2, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "one."

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I move—

That the following words be added—"A senator proposing a select committee shall be a member thereof."

That is the standing order in New South Wales and in other States, and it is certainly the rule in the Imperial Parliament.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—It is undoubtedly the rule and the practice, but the Standing Orders Committee, in considering this matter, thought it was not wise to bind the Senate. It might happen that in the opinion of the Senate the particular honorable senator moving for the appointment of a select committee might not be a proper person to be a member of it. The matter is of small importance, because in 99 cases out of 100 an honorable senator moving for a committee would be appointed a member of it. I desire merely to point out that the standing order has not been submitted in the form in which it is before the Committee, inadvertently. The Standing Orders Committee considered the point, and came to the conclusion to which I have referred. I might add that in one instance in South Australia the mover of a select committee was not appointed a member of it.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—If an honorable senator moves for the appointment of a select committee, and is desirous of serving upon it, having the power to nominate the members of the committee, he will nominate himself.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—He should not be allowed a committee unless he is prepared to sit upon it himself.

Senator CHARLESTON.—If afterwards an honorable senator who, while agreeing that the inquiry proposed should take place, believes that the honorable senator who has moved for the committee should not take part in it, he can demand a ballot, and the senator who is objected to may be left off the committee if the majority think that desirable.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I intend to oppose the amendment for the very good reasons which Senator Baker has told us guided the Standing Orders Committee. It by no means follows that an honorable senator who asks for the appointment of a select committee should be a member of it, or will be a desirable person to appoint as a member of it. I see no reason why, because an honorable senator chooses to move for the appointment of a select committee, he should be exempted from the ordinary rule of ballot. Senator Gould has suggested that an honorable senator moving for the appointment of a select committee should be prepared to do his work by acting upon the committee. In nine cases out of ten a committee is moved for by an honorable senator because he desires to secure a certain position. I do not agree that because the Senate consents to the appointment of a select committee, it is to be assumed that the honorable senator who moved for it is better fitted than any other honorable senator to take part in its proceedings.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—Senator Neild in proposing his amendment is following the invariable practice adopted in appointing select committees. When an honorable senator moves for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into a certain matter, he will have seized himself of the particulars connected with it, and will be in a position to take the lead in the inquiry proposed. He does not invite a number of his fellow senators to form a committee to inquire into a matter to which he has given no special consideration. I think it is necessary that the mover of a motion for the appointment of a select committee should be a member of that committee, and he should recognise that if he asks for a select committee, it is a duty cast upon him that he shall be in a position to advise the committee on the subject of their inquiry, and to point out the sources from which evidence is available.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why should he funk the ballot?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It is not a question of his funking the ballot, but the honorable senator moving for a committee will probably be better qualified than most other honorable senators to deal with the subject of inquiry. If an honorable senator is strongly imbued with the necessity for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into any matter, and moves its appointment, it will be a very extraordinary thing for the Senate to decide that the matter shall be inquired into, but that the honorable senator who moved for the committee shall take no part in it.

Senator DONSON.—Suppose he jumps some other honorable senator's claim?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Whose claim is it but that of the honorable senator who first puts the business on the paper? I think it would be very much better to follow the practice which has existed for so long. It is all very well to say that we should make new precedents, but most of the new precedents suggested are proposed by honorable senators who have had no previous parliamentary experience. It may be that they are better qualified to suggest the way in which business should be conducted than those who have had parliamentary experience; but when we can point, as in this matter, to the practice of the Imperial Parliament, we have a very good authority for following a practice which has already been adopted in all the States, and which I hope will be adopted by the Senate.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I intend to oppose the motion for the reason actuating Senator Gould in supporting it. At present the honorable and learned senator is anxious that we should follow the Imperial practice, but a little time ago he did not care so much about it. Senator Gould must be very innocent in matters political, or they must be a very fine people in New South Wales, if it has never happened there, even to the honorable and learned senator himself, that after he has taken a very great deal of interest in discussing a question and is just on the point of moving for a select committee to inquire into it, some other member jumps up and does it before him. In such a case Senator Gould might be just the man to appoint to the committee, and might be qualified to act as chairman of it, and yet, under the amendment which the honorable and learned senator is prepared to support, there may be no room for him on the committee because some one else, merely for the sake of being on a select committee, and for the sake of taking the wind out of Senator Gould's sails, moves for its appointment, and under the amendment must be a member of it. If the appointment of a select committee is left to the good sense of the Senate, and anything of the kind I have suggested occurs, the other members of the Senate will, I think, have grace enough left to see through a dodge of that description, will appoint senators who are entitled to be members of the committee, and may even leave off the man who has jumped another fellow's claim. I hope that the amendment will be negatived, and that the selection of these committees will be left entirely to the Senate.

Amendment negatived.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 283 to 299 agreed to.

Standing Order 300—

The evidence taken by any select committee . . . shall not be disclosed or published by any member of such committee, or by any other person.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I think it would be well to add the words "unless the Senate otherwise orders" at the end of this standing order. The Senate would thus have power under the standing orders to make public the evidence of committees. No doubt it would do so in any event, but I think the alteration is desirable.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—This standing order refers only to evidence which has not been reported to the Senate, and I was under the impression that it was designed to prevent any disclosure during the inquiries of a committee.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—But the Senate might desire to say that the proceedings should be reported.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I think this standing order is designed to render it impossible for a member of a select committee to go behind the backs of his fellow committeemen and make a disclosure to an outside person. For example, a special inquiry might be proceeding in regard to which it was undesirable to give any information until its close; but some one might make a disclosure, and the facts would then become public property. If the Senate ordered a report to be given, it could be obtained at any time.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Perhaps the amendment is not necessary. I shall not move it.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Orders 301 and 302 agreed to.

Standing Order 303—

The chairman shall read to the committee convened for the purpose the whole of his draft report. . . A senator objecting to any portion of the report shall propose his amendment at the time the paragraph he wishes to amend shall be under consideration, but no protest or dissent shall be added to the report.

Senator DRAKE.—This standing order contains something new, and I think some consideration should be given to it before it is agreed to. I refer to the words contained in the last two lines, "but no protest or dissent shall be added to the report." It is usual for a minority to be asked to embody their views, as a rejoinder, to the report, and although I have no fixed opinion in regard to this matter, I should like to hear some argument before agreeing to the standing order.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—I move—

That the words "but no," line 6, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof "a."

This amendment will test the question. I think it is most desirable that an honorable senator should have power to add a protest or dissent to a report. I do not know whether the Senate has agreed upon the principle involved, but as one who has been a member of a select committee, I think it would be a distinct advantage, both to the Senate and to the committee concerned, if a minority report could be presented.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales). I desire to confirm the view which has just been put forward by Senator Pearce. During last session I was a member of a committee in which the minority held a fairly strong view, but had no power to explain them in the report. I believe even now that the view held by that minority was the right one.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I wish to point out to honorable senators that this standing order follows the practice adopted, so far as I know, in every Parliament.

Senator WALKER.—In the Queensland Legislature?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I am not prepared to say that the practice is followed in the Queensland Parliament, but I know that it is in the House of Commons and in the South Australian Legislature. It may not necessarily be right because that is so, but the theory of all parliamentary proceedings is that the majority rules. Undoubtedly protests and minority reports are brought up sometimes by Royal Commissions. They are also presented in the case of select committees, but they appear in the proceedings. The theory upon which this is done is that the chairman of a select committee prepares a report and submits it to the members clause by clause. When that is done any member of the committee may move to strike out any clause, and to insert some fresh provision.

Thus every member is in a position to make his protest known. The votes and proceedings of a committee, which are brought in with the report, set forth how many members support it, so that the same object is effected, although in a manner different from that suggested by Senator Pearce. If it is the desire of the Committee that power shall be given to a select committee to bring up a minority report, just as a minority report may be brought up by a Royal Commission, it will be necessary to alter the whole of this standing order. The procedure would have to be different, otherwise minority reports would be presented twice. We should have them in the Votes and Proceedings, and also as an addendum to the committee's report. It is not a matter of substance where the report of the minority appears, because not only the minority report but the opinion of every individual member of a select committee who differs from the chairman appears in the Votes and Proceedings. It is only a question of procedure.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—There is no provision in the South Australian Standing Order as to the addition of any memorandum of dissent to a report. It leaves the matter an open one. There is a great deal of force in Senator Baker's statement that when a report drawn up by the chairman is discussed clause by clause, and when the committee has the fullest power to move amendments, the members are able to give full publicity to their views, and therefore that there is not the necessity that exists possibly in the case of Royal Commissions to provide for minority reports. Very likely the reports of Royal Commissions would not be agreed to in the way prescribed in this standing order. There is no standing order regulating the way in which they shall work. They work as they please. I have been a member of various Royal Commissions, and I have had occasion, sometimes, to dissent from what has been done. In some of these cases, perhaps, one or two other members of the commission have shared my views; while others have dissented from the report of the majority on different grounds. It often happens that, by being able to state the grounds on which he dissents from a report, a member is able to bring before the people views which he holds upon particular questions which would otherwise not be put before them owing to the fact that no regular procedure is followed by the commissioners. Under this standing order, however, a regular procedure is provided. Amendments can be moved in the draft report, new clauses can be proposed and added, and the Senate, as well as the public, are able to see what are the views held by those forming the committee. I think we might adopt the South Australian Standing Order, and refrain from providing that honorable senators shall not be allowed to append protests. An instance might occur in which they might wish to append a protest. Owing to reasons over which they had no control, they might have been absent when the report was being prepared; and, therefore, they might desire to embody their views in the form of a protest of some kind. Perhaps it would be as well to strike out the latter part of the standing order.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—It appears to me that the amendment is somewhat unnecessary, and I am inclined to think that it would be mischievous. There is the fullest opportunity for every member of a select committee to express his views as to the adoption of the report or otherwise. It is generally brought up by the chairman, but it may be drafted by another member of the committee, and to every clause amendments can be moved, and frequently are moved. If any members do not think a matter of sufficient importance to move an amendment of course their views do not get so amply recorded in the proceedings as they otherwise might do. But any man who has or thinks he has good reasons to differ from the report can move an amendment to every line, and in that way he has the fullest opportunity to record his protest. Therefore, it appears to me that it is unnecessary to alter the rule which is in accordance with the practice. I am inclined to think that the amendment will work out in a mischievous manner. Suppose that a select committee is inquiring into some subject of intense feeling or of party politics. To gain time in expressing your opinion may be of great advantage. A member who did not exactly consent to the report adopted might give some hints as to making a protest. He might go outside the premises and hear of some telegram or public feeling in some part of his State, and then intimate to the chairman that he did intend after all to enter a protest. He might then set to work to compile a protest based upon evidence and opinions of electors which he had heard practically after the report had been adopted. In that way, in one case out of a hundred or a thousand the amendment might absolutely work a mischief. Even if it is adopted, I think it ought to be provided that any such report or protest ought to be handed in immediately after the report has been adopted. I hope that the standing order will be passed as it is.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).

—I cannot understand the position which is taken up by Senator Dobson and others with respect to the reports of select committees. I have been on Royal Commissions and select committees. When the report of a Royal Commission is drawn up, every commissioner has the right to move amendments, and the Senate, if necessary, has just the same opportunity of seeing the evidence of a Royal Commission as it has of seeing the evidence of a select committee. Because it has been the practice in some Parliaments to allow no dissent from the report of a select committee, is that any reason why it should be adopted here? If any members of a select committee differ from the majority, they have the right to embody the difference in a protest or dissent. Supposing that a member of a select committee endeavours to amend the report and his amendments are defeated, does Senator Dobson imagine that in the Senate any senators will look through the record of proceedings to ascertain what positions different senators took up? They generally look to the report of the select committee, and leave the record of proceedings alone. It would be much to the advantage of the senators who disagreed from the report, and of other senators who might like to discuss the report to see in a concise form the reason for such difference.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I am afraid that this matter is not properly understood. Senator McGregor says that a member of a select committee who dissents from the report cannot make a protest. He can make a protest. Certainly it is not called by that name but it is just as effective. I have been on a great many select committees, and when I have disagreed with the chairman or the majority, I have always put my protest on record. On one occasion the chairman brought up a draft, and I moved that clause 1 be struck out and that another clause be inserted in lieu thereof, as the report of the committee. What was that but a protest? My protest appeared, not in the report, but in the proceedings.

Senator MCGREGOR.—You can do the same in a Royal Commission.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—In a Royal Commission the practice is different, though I admit that the result is just the same. After all, we are really fighting a question of practice, not a question of principle. Either on a Royal Commission or on a select committee any one who disagrees can put his dissent on record, and it is brought up and is considered by the appointing body. Supposing that a select committee is appointed, and a senator is in opposition but is in a minority, all he has to do when the draft report is considered is to say—"I object to this clause, and I move another clause in lieu thereof," or, "I object to the whole of the report, and I move another report in lieu thereof." The whole of the protest or objection in both cases is put on record. I can see no difference in substance between them. If honorable senators wish to call the dissent of a member of a select committee a protest, I have not the slightest objection to their doing so. I do not see that there is very much objection to their putting it in as a protest, but I say that they ought to amend the whole of Standing Order 303 and adopt a new procedure. I have the standing orders of the Legislative Council of Victoria, the House of Assembly of South Australia, and the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and they are all identical.

Senator WALKER.—And Queensland?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—And Queensland, too, I have no doubt.

Senator DRAKE.—No.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—In the Queensland Standing Orders is there any statement to the effect that a protest can be added?

Senator GLASSEY.—Protests are always added.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—In practice is any protest ever added?

Senator DRAKE.—Yes.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I think the honorable and learned gentleman is mistaken. I believe he is confusing the practice of Royal Commissions with the practice of select committees.

Senator DRAKE.—It is done in connexion with select committees of the Legislative Council of Queensland.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Will the honorable gentleman show me any standing order in Queensland which says that a protest can be added?

Senator DRAKE.—No; the standing order of the Legislative Council is silent.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Then the practice of the House of Commons prevails according to their standing orders, and no protest can be added. I may be mistaken; but I do not think that any protest has ever been added to the report of a select committee; it appears in the record of the proceedings. What difference in substance is there between the two things? None that I can see. It is only a question whether a dissenting senator shall enter his protest in the ordinary manner in which it has been done, in my opinion, not only in the House of Commons, but in every Legislative Assembly in Australia. The practice has been that no such protest shall be added to the report.

Senator DRAKE.—I withdraw my statement that in Queensland the standing order is silent. It says—

A member disagreeing with a report may require a statement of the reasons of his disagreement to be appended to the report.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—There is no doubt that they always are. Where I have dissented from the majority I have brought up a report of my own with my reasons, too. I have said—"For the following reasons I dissent from so and so," and my report was absolutely as complete as the report of the chairman.

Senator CLEMONS.—What happened to it? Was it ever read to the House?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—The same thing happened as if there had been a protest. The dissent with the reasons came before the House in the report of the select committee. If honorable senators will refer to the report of the Standing Orders Committee, they will see that every proceeding, including the divisions, is recorded, and that is done in the case of every select committee. However, I am not going to labour the question, as I do not think it is of much importance whether the dissent is called a protest or an objection. I can see no reason for departing from the ordinary practice of legislative bodies, which comes to exactly the same thing in effect as the practice of Royal Commissions.

Senator DRAKE.—The standing order of the Queensland Legislative Assembly is very clear—

A member objecting to any portion of the report shall propose his amendment when the paragraph which he wishes to amend is under consideration.

Then it goes on to say—

A member disagreeing with a report may require a statement of the reasons for his disagreement to be appended to the report.

That undoubtedly is the rider. During the last session I was in the Queensland Legislative Council quite a number of select committees were appointed, and riders were, I think, appended to the reports in a great many cases. It is clear that the standing order of the Legislative Assembly provides for a protest being appended to the report, and, unless my memory is quite wrong, the practice of the Legislative Council agrees with that standing order.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland.)—The value of a minority report is shown in the case of the Royal Commission that inquired into the sugar works and black labour question in Queensland. The majority of the members of that commission were in favour of black labour. If there is any advantage in the case of a Royal Commission, the same must apply to a select committee, because select committees are often appointed to avoid the expense attached to Royal Commissions. There was a minority report in connexion with the commission to which I have alluded, and also in connexion with the Mining Commission. The great value of a minority report lies in the fact that very often when people look at the report of a commission and see a minority report they may be led by the observations contained in it to regard matters in a somewhat different light than would be the case if they only read the report of the majority. If we refuse to allow a minority to make a report, we convey the impression that the report of the committee was unanimously agreed to. To ascertain whether there was a minority of a different opinion, the reader would have to look through the volumes of Hansard or the Reports and Proceedings. As the publishing of a minority report would only cost a few pounds extra—or it may be a few shillings—there is no reason why it should not be permitted.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Senator PEARCE) agreed to—

That the word "shall," line 7, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "may."

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 304 to 309 agreed to.

Standing Order 310 verbally amended and agreed to.

Standing Orders 311 to 318 agreed to.

Standing Order 319—

If the above-mentioned conditions have been complied with, the Clerk shall so certify on the petition, and the President shall lay the petition on the table.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—It has always seemed to me, although these standing orders are practically a copy of what appears in the Electoral Acts of the States, that they are unfinished to a certain extent. When a petition is laid upon the table, what happens?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—There is a standing order, No. 91, under the head of "Petitions" that provides what is to happen.

Senator PEARCE.—The point is—who is to move that the petition be referred to the committee? Whose duty is it? If no one moves that the petition be referred, how long is it to lie on the table before it is out of court? Suppose the petitioner cannot get a senator to move that his petition be referred, there is no provision as to the length of time during which it shall lie on the table before it becomes null and void. It may be hanging over the head of the sitting senator for the whole of his term. The Clerk lays the petition on the table, but if neither a member of the Government, nor the President, nor a private senator takes action, there is nothing to provide what is to become of it. We should add some such words as the following:—"Unless some senator moves in connexion with the said petition to refer the same to the Committee of Disputed Returns and Qualifications before the expiration of fourteen sitting days, the petition shall be void, and the deposit shall be returned."

Senator DRAKE.—That is rather severe, is it not?

Senator PEARCE.—Something of the sort is necessary. It may be invidious to ask the Government to take action, and the petition may be a frivolous one with which no private senator would care to connect himself.

Senator DRAKE.—Would not the petition automatically go to the committee in the same way as the Senate automatically goes into Committee after the second reading of a Bill?

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—Why can we not provide that the petition shall go on to the committee? We might insert some such words as—"and the President shall lay it on the table and shall forthwith refer it to the Committee of Disputed Returns and Qualifications." If we say that the petition shall be referred, some one would have to move to that effect. I think the President should refer it as a matter of course.

Amendment (by Senator PEARCE) agreed to—

That the following words be added:—"and shall forthwith refer the same to the Committee of Disputed Returns and Qualifications."

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 320 to 324 agreed to.

Standing Order 325—

Every message from the Senate to the House of Representatives shall be in writing, or partly in writing, or partly in print, signed by the President and delivered by the Clerk or Clerk Assistant during the sitting of the Senate.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—This standing order will have to be altered. Since it was drafted an arrangement has been made between the two Houses by which messages may be passed from one to the other, although both may not be sitting. That practice has been found to be most convenient. Therefore it will be better to strike out the words "during the sitting of the Senate." The effect will be that messages will be received by the House of Representatives while the Senate is not sitting, and vice versa; a practice which has been conducive to the prompt discharge of public business. I move—be consistent we should omit the word "three" in this standing order. I move—

Standing Order 340—

There shall be only one conference on any Bill or other matter.

Senator DRAKE.—I should like to know the reason which influenced the Standing Orders Committee in coming to this conclusion.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I shall state the reason. There must be some stage of finality in reference to all matters. Whether that is reached after one, two, three, or half-a-dozen conferences does not appear to me to be a matter of very much importance, because both Houses will be looking forward to the final stage for the settlement of a difference. Conferences have been found in England to be so unsatisfactory that they have been altogether abandoned, and they have not had a conference between the two Houses there for a great number of years—I think for 100 years. We must have some stage of the proceedings at which we shall finally agree or disagree. I am loth to mention the South Australian practice, because it has been so often referred to, but I may be permitted to say that in South Australia we found that a number of conferences served no good purposes, because the representatives of both Houses always put off coming to a final conclusion until the last conference. The object appeared to be for one side to hang on as long as possible in the hope that the other side might give way, and that resulted merely in a waste of time. That is the reason why the Standing Orders Committee of the Senate arrived at this conclusion, and I believe that the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives arrived at a similar conclusion.

Senator WALKER.—How about Money Bills?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—This standing order has nothing to do with Money Bills. I doubt very much whether we shall ever have a conference upon Money Bills. Probably the points in dispute in connexion with Money Bills will be settled by messages between the two Houses. I am doubtful if we shall ever get to the conference stage in dealing with such matters, and, even if we do, there will be no good purpose served in providing for too many conferences.

Senator DOBSON.—Besides, a conference may adjourn from time to time.

(Document quoted may be ordered to be laid upon the table.)

Senator DRAKE.—This is a new standing order. A senator may be reading from a newspaper, or from some equally bulky document. Is it intended that he shall be required to lay that upon the table of the Senate immediately?

Senator CLEMONS.—If he quotes from it, why not?

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Orders 355 to 366 agreed to.

Standing Order 367—

The President only shall have the privilege of admitting strangers into that portion of the chamber below the Bar. The members of the House of Representatives shall have the privilege of admission there without orders. The President may admit distinguished strangers to a seat on the floor of the Senate.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—This standing order departs from the practice adopted in the Senate since this Parliament opened. It has never so far been necessary for an honorable senator to obtain the permission of the President to take his friends into the gallery. I fail to see why we should adopt this standing order, and I intend to move an amendment which will leave to honorable senators the right which they enjoy at the present time. There is always plenty of room, and I do not see why we should have to ask the permission of the President to invite strangers to the gallery. I draw the attention of the Committee to the last portion of the standing order—

The President may admit distinguished strangers to a seat on the floor of the Senate.

That is a privilege which should be exercised by the Senate itself. I think we should reserve to ourselves the right to determine who are distinguished strangers. I move—

That the words "The President only," line 1, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "Every senator."

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—This standing order is in accordance with our present standing order, and with the practice we have so far followed. It is quite true that I have not asked the officials to bother me by asking my leave, and strangers are always admitted on the order of any honorable senator to that portion of the chamber outside the Bar. But supposing that in connexion with some question there is a great desire on the part of strangers to attend the Senate, how is the difficulty to be arranged? If every honorable senator may give orders for admission, which honorable senator must give way? So far as I am concerned, I have taken no trouble about the matter, and honorable senators have had the right in practice under a similar standing order to secure the admission of any of their friends. They will continue to have that right, but I think that we should provide for some proper procedure in case of a crush.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I hope that Senator Clemons will withdraw his amendment. The honorable and learned senator must know that some one must have control of that portion of the Senate which is outside the Bar, and on certain special occasions, which may not arise once in five years, if the amendment proposed is accepted each honorable senator may desire the admission of three of his friends, and we may have 30 or 40 people trying to get into seats which will accommodate only half that number. In a case of that kind, surely the President of the Senate should be given the power of control which has been vested in him in the past, and which, in most Legislative Chambers, is vested in the Speaker or the President. The fact that the President has not interfered so far, shows that the standing order will not be made use of unless upon some special occasion when the traffic—if I may use the expression—requires regulating, and then its regulation should be left in the hands of our presiding officer.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—It is, of course, very easy for honorable senators to raise a boggy of this kind, and by the aid of imagination to picture a state of things which will never happen. It is easy to say that the standing order is framed to provide for something which none of us will live long enough to see. We shall never see the time when this chamber will be so crowded that it will be necessary for the President to interfere to keep order. If we do, I have no doubt that the President will be found equal to the occasion. It is argued that we should leave the standing order as proposed because it will be nugatory. Senator Baker has informed me that we have been working under a similar standing order, and I was not previously aware of that, but I do not believe in passing standing orders which are never to be enforced. Without any disrespect to the present occupant of the chair, I may be permitted to say that we might have a President of this Chamber who would exercise the power given to him under this standing order arbitrarily against some particular senator or a section of honorable senators. I shall persist in my amendment, as I am not alarmed by the boggy. Outside of that absurd fear, I see no reason why honorable senators should not exercise the privilege which has been so far conceded to them.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—I think the boggy in this matter is started by the other side. A standing order of this character is in the interests of the Senate itself. We have seating capacity here for perhaps 20 or 25 people. Members of the other House are supposed to come here sometimes, and there are 36 members of the Senate. If some very interesting subject were on for discussion, and each of the 36 senators desired to introduce two or three of his friends to listen to the debate, we could not accommodate that number of people. There must, therefore, be some authority to regulate the number to be admitted. If it is proposed that the rule shall be first come first served there will, of course, be an end of it. In the New South Wales Legislative Assembly a member goes to the Speaker and says, "I wish to introduce a friend to the gallery." The Speaker, as a matter of course, gives the member a card, and looks upon him as sponsor for the suitability of the person admitted. If the gallery is full he intimates that fact, and there is an end to the matter. It would be better to leave the power in the hands of the President. If it were left in the hands of honorable senators generally I might, for example, think that I could squeeze another stranger into an already overcrowded gallery, and endeavour to do so, to the great inconvenience of others present. At any time some very important matter might come before the Senate, the discussion on which very many people would desire to hear.

Senator STEWART.—Those who took the most interest in it would come early.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—There is no boggy about this standing order. It does not mean that any honorable senator will be under an obligation to the President. If there is room the President will invariably admit strangers; on the other hand, if there is no room, an honorable senator will be saved a great deal of trouble by being able to say to his friends, "The President will not issue any more cards." I think some objection might very well be taken to the latter part of the clause; but, as Senator Clemons has indicated that he intends to move an amendment in regard to it, I shall content myself by saying that I trust the Committee will not adopt the amendment now before the Chair.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I hope that Senator Clemons will not press this amendment, because we have been working under a precisely similar standing order up to the present time. I understand that the Speaker of the House of Representatives enjoys the privilege which it is proposed to confer upon the President. At the opening of Parliament, from time to time, the galleries will probably be crowded, and without this standing order some honorable senators might bring in so many friends that others would not be able to find room for any. Although, like Senator Playford, I hesitate to mention the South Australian precedent, I would point out that it is the practice in the South Australian Legislative Council to leave this matter in the hands of the President, and that the practice has never been abused. For example, it is difficult to estimate how many ladies will desire to be present when Senator Dobson's Divorce Bill is under discussion, and it is absolutely necessary in our own interests that the President should have some control over the number of persons who will then be pressing for admission.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I intend to support the amendment.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator is always in a minority.

Senator STEWART.—The honorable senator is surprised to find me supporting anything hailing from the quarter from which this amendment has come. No doubt we do not get much common sense from that point of the compass; but on this occasion the honorable and learned senator seems to have struck the right chord, and I am going to assist him. I was always under the impression that honorable senators were permitted to introduce their friends into the seats at the rear of the Bar, but this standing order says that the President alone shall have the privilege of introducing strangers to that portion of the chamber.

Senator HIGGS.—The President has always had that power, but never enforced it.

Senator STEWART.—We might have a martinet in the position of President, and if the power is not used and not intended to be used, why should it be given? The first to come should be the first served. If people are extremely anxious to witness the proceedings in this Chamber, they will come early, and those who do so deserve to obtain seats. The galleries may sometimes be nearly full, and if this power is retained in the hands of the President, influential honorable senators, or perhaps those who are not members of the Chamber, will obtain the use of the seating accommodation behind the Bar, with the result that there will be no room for any one else.

Senator PEARCE.—That is very unlikely.

Senator STEWART.—I think it is extremely likely, and that it is better to leave this matter in the hands of honorable senators themselves. I shall support the amendment.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I should like to ask the President whether he interprets this standing order as an interference with the arrangement that has previously existed, or whether we are to understand that, even if the standing order be passed, we shall still have a kind of preemptive right to introduce our friends to the gallery? If that right is to continue, I shall have no objection to the standing order.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I do not intend to alter the practice in the slightest degree.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—There are two reasons which actuate me in asking leave to withdraw the amendment. One is, that I have learnt for the first time during this discussion that we have been working under a precisely similar standing order. The other, which I need hardly indicate, is the all-powerful one—Senator Stewart.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania). — I move—

That the word "President," line 5, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "Senate."

The Committee will agree that this is a more serious question. I think we should place the President, whoever he might be, in a somewhat invidious position if we were to ask him to say what stranger is so distinguished as to justify the Senate in affording him a seat on the floor of the Chamber. Such a question should be decided by the Senate itself. From the point of view of the distinguished stranger himself, I think the amendment is also desirable. It would be a greater mark of respect to him if the whole Senate conferred upon him the right to a seat on the floor of the Chamber.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The universal practice in representative Houses is to follow this rule. I would call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives have adopted these identical words; but if the Committee chooses to amend the standing order by inserting the words "by leave of the Senate" after the word "may" line 6, I shall have not the slightest objection.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I have no objection to that suggestion, and I ask leave to amend my amendment accordingly.

Amendment, by leave, amended accordingly.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—The objection to the original proposal made by Senator Clemons lies in the fact that when it was desired that a distinguished visitor should be given a seat on the floor of the Senate, we should have to go through the procedure of carrying a motion before the courtesy could be extended to him. The stranger himself might not care to see the conduct of the debate disturbed in that way. It would be far better to allow the President to permit a distinguished stranger to take a seat on the floor of the Senate. If the President declined to allow such a stranger to take a seat on the floor of the Chamber, it would be optional for any honorable senator to move that that courtesy be extended.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I hope that the Committee will adopt Senator Baker's suggestion. I have seen a newspaper paragraph stating that an attempt was recently made in the Victorian Legislative Assembly to extend this courtesy to two members of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, who were by no means distinguished, and that the House objected to the proposal. It would have been simply monstrous if either of those men had been allowed a seat on the floor of the House on the ground that they were distinguished strangers.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I object to this statement.

Senator WALKER.—I have not mentioned any names.

Senator HIGGS.—No; but it is well known to whom the honorable senator is referring. Mr. John Norton, who is one of the gentlemen mentioned, is sufficiently well able to defend himself through the medium of his newspapers. Mr. Hollis, who is the other, has no such means of defence, and, as one who has known him for a long time, I may say that he is as respectable and distinguished as are some other gentlemen I could name.

The CHAIRMAN.—This matter is quite irrelevant.

Senator DAWSON.—Senator Walker's remarks were quite uncalled for.

Senator HIGGS.—They were certainly not in keeping with Senator Walker's good nature.

Senator WALKER.—Very well, I shall withdraw them.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I think we should adopt Senator Baker's suggestion, which conforms to the practice of the Legislature of the model State which he so ably represents. In the South Australian House of Assembly the Speaker simply says—"By the leave of the House, I wish to introduce Mr. So-and-so to a seat on the floor of the Chamber." Honorable members say "Hear, hear"; and, if there is no objection, the introduction takes place. It is simply a matter of form, and if the honorable member who is speaking at the time is interrupted at all, the interruption is only of momentary duration.

Standing Orders 368 to 387 agreed to.

Standing Order 388—

Whenever the President rises during a debate, any senator then speaking or offering to speak shall sit down, and the Senate shall be silent so that the President may be heard without interruption.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I think that a slight alteration of the standing order is necessary. It is quite obvious that the occasion is intended to be one when the President is occupying the chair. When he takes part in the debates in Committee we are prepared to give him most diligent attention, but he can hardly expect us to remain absolutely silent or to do everything which is mentioned in the standing order. I suggest that it should begin with the words "Whenever the President whilst presiding." That is obviously what is meant, and if it is meant it ought to be expressed. In the standing orders there has been a confusion in more than one instance in dealing with the President when he is in the chair and when he is not in the chair.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—The standing order can only be read to refer to an occasion when Senator Baker rises in his character as President. When he speaks from any place but the chair, he does not speak as the President, but as a senator.

Standing order agreed to.

Standing Order 389 agreed to.

Standing Order 390—

Every senator shall be uncovered when he enters or leaves the Chamber, or moves to any other part of the Chamber, during the debate, and shall make obeisance to the Chair in passing to or from his seat.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I do not think that any one in the Committee thinks it is necessary or desirable that any senator should make obeisance to the Chair when passing to or from his seat. Of course we make obeisance to the Chair when entering and leaving the Chamber, but surely it is carrying this formality a little too far to have a rigid standing order which says that every time a senator leaves his seat he shall make obeisance to the Chair. I submit that the words to which I have referred should be omitted.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I agree with Senator Clemons that it would be a very good thing to strike out the words. They appear in the standing order because we followed, as far as possible, the language of the standing orders of all the States. I think it will be sufficient if senators are required to bow to the Chair when they enter and leave the Chamber, and not on any other occasion.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—I think it will meet every purpose that is required if we use the language of the corresponding standing order of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales—

And shall make obeisance to the Chair on entering or leaving the Chamber.

Amendment (by Senator CLEMONS) agreed to—

That the words "in passing to or from his seat" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "on entering or leaving the Chamber."

Standing order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 391 and 392 agreed to.

Standing Order 393—

No senator shall turn his back to the Chair when speaking, or shall unnecessarily stand or sit with his back to the Chair.

Senator DRAKE.—I should be glad if the standing order could be modified. I am afraid that I have committed more breaches of order in this respect than ever I committed before. On account of the position which the representative of the Government or the leader of the Opposition occupies at the table, he can hardly address himself to a subject without sometimes turning his back to the Chair. It is a thing which I never do out of any disrespect to the Chair. I move—

That the word "unnecessarily" be inserted after the word "shall," line 1.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—In the marginal note we are told that the standing order is new, but that it is the practice of most States. I think it will be generally admitted that this matter in any other deliberative body has been decided purely by courtesy; no standing order has been passed to read to the members a lesson in courtesy. It has been invariably regarded as a courteous thing for a member to speak with his face to the Chair so far as he can. Originally, I intended to move that the standing order be omitted, but if that were done I should perhaps miss the opportunity of doing something which I think is very desirable. I believe that, unwittingly, Senator Baker has shown discourtesy to the Chairman in addressing the Committee time after time from a point behind the Chair at the table. From my point of view, it would be more courteous to the Chairman for Senator Baker to face the Chair when he is speaking in Committee. It is extremely difficult for the Chairman to know when Senator

Baker wishes to speak. I suppose it would not be tolerated if any other senator were to occupy any part of the dais or to speak from a position so far back on the bench as that in which Senator Saunders is sitting. I cannot concede that any honorable senator would consider it courteous to the Chairman to speak from a place so far behind the Chair. I hope to have Senator Baker's support presently for this amendment—

No senator shall unnecessarily turn his back to the Chair, nor shall he stand behind or at the back of the Chair when speaking.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—The universal practice is that a member shall address himself to the Chair. He cannot address himself to the President or the Chairman, and then turn his back to the Chair. If the standing order is amended as proposed, what is to prevent me, if I desire to address the gallery, from turning my back to the Chairman? Supposing that I were to turn round in my place in order to have an altercation with Senator Barrett, I might prevent other senators from hearing what I had to say. I think that allowance will be made for the representative of the Government and the leader of the Opposition on account of the position which they occupy at the table. Inasmuch as there are so many senators who cannot make up their minds to support either the Government or the Opposition, and sit on the cross benches, it is necessary for the leaders, who speak at the table, to turn their backs slightly to the Chair. I think that in that respect the standing order might be allowed to remain as it is. I am inclined to agree with Senator Clemons, but a senator should not address the Committee from behind the Chair. I would much prefer Senator Baker to take his seat as a democrat amongst us in the body of the Chamber. I believe that it would lead to better feeling, and that we should come to look upon him more as one of ourselves than as a person who is up in the clouds and quite beyond us.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—Senators are supposed to speak from their places in the Chamber—that is, from the benches. For instance, the place of Senator Saunders is where he is sitting now. Senator Ewing always spoke from that place last session, and always, therefore, had the Chairman's back towards him. A senator has the right to speak from his place in the Senate, and from nowhere else. If Senator Baker sat on the corresponding seat to the right of the Chair, he would be in identically the same position. His place in the Senate is in the Chair, and no place is allotted to him when he is out of the Chair. I think it is to be regretted that this matter was mentioned at all, particularly in view of the arrangement of the seats, making it, in some instances, impossible for any senator on either side to speak from his place without having the Chairman's back more or less towards him. I agree with the insertion of the word "unnecessarily," and I hope that the standing order will be carried with that word in it.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I hope that the Senate will reject the whole standing order. We might leave it to the discretion of the President or Chairman of Committees to call to order any senator who is behaving improperly. We have not had this provision during the last two years, and it seems to me to be rather beneath the dignity of the Senate to have it. I shall vote against it.

The CHAIRMAN.—I should regret the use of the word "unnecessarily" in this standing order. We worked under a standing order similar to this for a long time last session, and I do not think that any Minister of the Crown was subjected to indignity in any shape or form by reason of the position from which he addressed the Chamber.

Senator DRAKE.—I was called to order several times.

The CHAIRMAN.—When an honorable senator had his back to the Chair for a considerable time it was perhaps quietly hinted to him that he might change his position. Who is to say what is "unnecessarily?" It is only adding further complications. I venture to say that the Postmaster-General may at all events rely that so far as I am concerned the standing order will be reasonably exercised, as I am sure it was during last session. I think it would complicate the standing order to insert such a word as that suggested in it.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I wish to say, in answer to Senator Downer, that in the House of Lords the gentleman who corresponds in official position to the President of this Senate does not consider it to be beneath his dignity to come down and speak from the floor of the House, where every other member of the House expresses his views. We have in this Senate the sole instance in which, in any Legislative Chamber in the English-speaking world, this practice prevails. I do not wish to speak offensively, but I submit to Senator Baker that, as a matter of courtesy, it would obviously be better if he himself spoke in Committee from a place upon the floor of the Chamber. He must surely see that it is, to a certain extent, discourteous to the Chairman of Committees to speak from the place where he now sits. The argument that Senator Ewing, or any one else, sat at the far end of the front bench in a seat behind the Chairman, and addressed the Chair from that point, is no argument at all that could justify Senator Baker in being discourteous, even if the other honorable senators referred to had been so.

Senator DOBSON.—I say that there has been no discourtesy.

Senator CLEMONS.—For any honorable senator, even though he may be President of the Senate, to address the Chairman of Committees from some point entirely behind the Chair is discourteous. I do not say that Senator Baker has been wittingly discourteous; I should say so frankly if I thought so; but it is fairly arguable that to address the Chair from such a position is discourteous to the Chairman. Senator Baker may have hurt the Chairman's feelings without knowing it. I put it to him that in the House of Lords, which is at least equal in dignity to this Senate, the Lord Chancellor, when he addresses the Committee, does so from the floor of the Chamber, and that it would be more courteous if Senator Baker, when addressing the Committee, would do so from the bench upon which I sit or from the opposite bench. I should not have mentioned this subject at all had not a standing order been inserted in this document, which was directed principally towards Ministers; because it is only Ministers—and Senator Symon, when he has spoken from the table in his position of the leader of the Opposition—who hitherto have been hauled up under the standing order. Surely when a matter of courtesy is in question, there should be no one more willing to set an example than Senator Baker himself.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—The matter of courtesy is not in question. It is to be regretted that Senator Clemons should have taken up the time of the Senate with such a trivial matter. It has already been pointed out that there are two seats on the front benches of the Chamber which are absolutely behind the seat occupied by the Chairman of Committees; and my honorable and learned friend, Senator Clemons, who has got this question of courtesy on the brain, absolutely went on to assume that, because Senator Ewing invariably spoke from the extreme corner seat on the left of the Chairman, he was guilty of discourtesy. I am sure that no one else will be of that opinion.

Senator CLEMONS.—I deny that Senator Ewing habitually spoke from that place.

Senator DOBSON.—But I have seen him speak from that place. I should like to know if there is to be no such thing as respect for our President, and regard for the dignity of his position? Would Senator Clemons think it better that the two seats on either side of the President's chair should be taken away, and that Senator Baker, when not presiding over the Senate, should sit on a form without a back to it, or in a chair with no arms? What can be gained by trying to detract from the dignity of our presiding officer, and by taking up the time of the Committee in attempting to undo a practice that prevailed during last session? Why take up time over such a trivial matter? If Senator Baker sits in one of the corner seats at the extreme end of one of the front benches he will still be behind the Chairman of Committees. It is no use raising the question that he is discourteous to the Chairman. If he were, the Chairman and the President would soon be able to settle the matter between them.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I am quite sure that the Chairman of Committees will not imagine for a moment that I have been discourteous to him. He has never intimated any such idea to me and I do not think he entertains it. This is a matter which is personal to myself and therefore I do not intend to argue it. I shall not vote. But I wish to point out one error which has been made. It has been said that the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, in addressing that House, leaves the woolsack.

Senator CLEMONS.—I said that in Committee the Lord Chancellor addresses the House of Lords from the floor of the chamber itself.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—He has to, because the woolsack is not in the House proper, and naturally he has to go into the House before he can address it. If there is any analogy between the Senate and the House of Lords—and I entirely deny that there is any; we are not governed by the procedure of the House of Lords; but if there is any analogy—it certainly does not apply in reference to the woolsack, which is outside the House of Lords itself. I hope that the Senate will accord to me the same position as they have done in the past. I do not see any reason whatever why the standing order should be altered. At the present time, where I am now standing, I am just as much in view of the Chairman of Committees, and just as courteous to him, as any honorable senator who sits down there. And is it not rather peculiar that those same honorable senators who object to a standing order which says that honorable senators shall not stand with their backs to the Chair, at the same time want to bring in a standing order to the effect that a senator—because I am only a senator when I speak in Committee—shall not address the Chairman when he is looking straight towards him, although the Chairman only sees those other honorable senators side-face? I have no more to say.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—With regard to the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, I never said what Senator Baker has attributed to me; but I did say what he is unable to deny, that when the Lord Chancellor addresses the House of Lords in Committee, he does so from the same position on the floor as does any other member of the House. I point out again that there is no other Chamber of legislation where the practice we have adopted obtains. I have heard the Speaker in the House of Representatives address that Chamber in Committee, and I know what his practice is. It is not the practice which has been adopted by Senator Baker here. I venture to say that Mr. Speaker Holder would never for a moment think—though he has the same sort of sitting accommodation in that House as the President has here—of addressing the House of Representatives in Committee of the whole except from a seat on the one side or the other. It remains for Senator Baker to set an example of dignity—of his sense of dignity—that no other President or Speaker in any British Parliament has ever attempted to do. I say that he does not enhance that dignity by addressing the Chairman of Committees from a place behind the Chair instead of from a place upon the floor. Senator Baker has tried to show that it is not as discourteous to stand behind the Chair and address the Committee from that position as to stand sidewise. I submit that that sort of argument is ludicrous and absurd. There is no objection to his speaking from one side or the other upon the floor of the chamber, but it is a false sense of dignity—it is even spurious—as well as being discourteous, to speak from his present position.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I confess that I have very considerable sympathy with Senator Clemons in this matter. I think he is on the right track once again. I do not see any reason why the President, when addressing the Committee, should not come into the body of the chamber, just as other members of the Senate have to do. In Queensland, when the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly speaks in Committee, he comes into the body of the chamber, and speaks from one of the ordinary benches. He does not take up a position behind the Chairman of Committees. There is another point. We have a standing order which says that when two or more honorable senators rise to speak, the Chairman shall call upon the senator who first rose in his place. Suppose that Senator Baker and Senator Clemons wished to address the Committee at the same time, and Senator Baker rose first. The Chairman not having eyes in the back of his head could not possibly see Senator Baker, and would, therefore, naturally call upon Senator Clemons. I think it absolutely necessary that every member of the Senate who desires to address the Chair should be in full view of the Chair. I do not know what reason Senator Baker has for persisting in seating himself behind the Chair, or in speaking from a place behind it. But I think that, as a mere matter of convenience, it would be very much better for him to speak from a place on the floor of the chamber just as other honorable senators do.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—This is not the trivial matter that Senator Dobson would have us believe it to be.

Senator DOBSON.—I never heard a trivial matter if this is not one.

Senator HIGGS.—I disclaim at once, as emphatically as I can, any intention to wound the feelings of the President. In his absence, I also desire to say that I think he is a good President. I have had occasion to think so over and over again. I know that he has pulled me up sometimes, but I have had no reason to find fault with his decisions. I say again, in one of my calm moments—when I am not “stone-walling” or doing anything of that kind—that he is a good President. I affirm that in what I am saying, I am influenced by no personal objection to the conduct of the President, but as time passes the position of the President of the Senate will carry much greater influence than it does now, and I say that, when the Senate is in Committee, the President should come down and take his seat with us, if it be only to show that he is of the same common clay as ourselves. The honorable and learned senator appears before us in wig and gown, and I can well imagine that a few years hence some young politicians entering this Chamber may be disposed to pay more attention to the words spoken by the President on account of the traditions attaching to his office, than the importance of those words entitle them to.

Senator PEARCE.—They will not if they are Australians.

Senator HIGGS.—I am aware that there is a great want of reverence in Australians, but there is no knowing what is likely to happen, and when we become an older community the sturdy independence which characterizes the Australians of to-day may, in our newer civilization, be absolutely weeded out of them. I desire, so far as I can, to protect innocent young politicians coming into this Chamber. I should feel it to be a compliment if the President were to take his seat upon these benches as we do ourselves when the Senate is in committee. I am glad to learn from the encouraging cheers of Senator Playford that what is now proposed is the practice in South Australia, and I think it is one which we might very well follow.

The CHAIRMAN.—I personally take the opportunity of saying that I am perfectly satisfied that, in speaking from the position which he usually occupies, the President has never at any time intended any disrespect to the Chair or to honorable senators. I am sure that Senator Clemons will not attribute to him any such intention. I urge the honorable and learned senator to withdraw his amendment. While I admit that it has been the practice in the Victorian Parliament, and in several other Legislative Chambers, for the President or the Speaker to take his place in the body of the Chamber when the House is in committee, yet, by reason of the fact that the Senate has acquiesced, so to speak, in the practice of allowing Senator Baker to sit where he does sit, I think that the amendment will be assumed to have been directed against him personally.

Senator PEARCE.—Possibly, if the question had been raised at any other time.

Senator CLEMONS.—This is the first opportunity we have had of raising it.

The CHAIRMAN.—In all the circumstances, Senator Baker must himself necessarily take notice of what has been said during the debate, and I think it may be left to his judgment in the future to do as he thinks proper. I cannot but feel that it would be regarded as a personal reflection on the President if the amendment were agreed to.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In the circumstances, it would be better if this standing order, which is new, were struck out altogether.

The CHAIRMAN.—The amendment at present before the Chair is that the word “unnecessarily” shall be inserted after the word “shall,” line 1.

Amendment negatived.

Senator CLEMONS.—I propose to move that the standing order be amended so as to read—

No senator shall, when speaking, turn his back to the Chair, nor shall he stand behind the Chair, or unnecessarily stand or sit with his back to the Chair.

I therefore, in the first place, move—

That the words “when speaking” be inserted after the word “shall,” line 1.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—I think that the standing order had better be allowed to remain as it is. One cannot get away from the feeling that this amendment will be regarded as directed at the President in consequence of the practice that has grown up. He is the only honorable senator who does sit behind the Chair, he has been referred to pointedly in the remarks which have been made, and if such an amendment upon the standing order were agreed to, people could not help regarding it as being directly aimed at the President. Is it worth while to do anything of that kind? No honorable senator goes behind the Chairman when speaking, though some of us may turn our backs partially to him. I have known honorable senators to be called to order for turning their backs to the Chair, when it has appeared to me to be unnecessary, because, though theoretically while speaking we are supposed to be addressing the Chair, we are in reality addressing honorable senators. I think it would be very much better not to accept the amendment suggested, because it has the very unpleasant and invidious attribute to which I have referred. I should be quite willing to have the whole standing order eliminated, because it deals purely with a matter of courtesy, and no honorable senator would willingly be discourteous to the President or Chairman of Committees. I think we may very well leave it to the good sense of honorable senators to act courteously.

Senator DRAKE.—I am inclined now to think that it would be better to negative the standing order altogether. I should be very sorry indeed to see it carried in the amended form proposed by Senator Clemons, because I can quite imagine that it would be regarded as a slight upon the President. I am inclined to think that it would be a slight upon the honorable and learned senator, and I should so regard it myself. We have acquiesced in the practice up to the present time, and I cannot see that it has led to any bad results. I do not think that any necessity whatever has been shown for making such a rule as Senator Clemons now proposes.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON (Tasmania).—I should like to draw the attention of the Committee to a point which I think has been entirely overlooked in the discussion, not only of Standing Order 393, but of every standing order referring to the President. I am under the impression that when we elected our President, we did so in the belief that he would exercise his privileges in every way impartially. If that be clearly understood by honorable senators, we have put the President in a place in the chamber where he stands by himself, and simply because he leaves the Chair when the Senate goes into Committee, I see no reason why we should divest him of the attribute of impartiality with which we have surrounded him. If we forced the President away from his position behind the Chair, and compelled him to speak in Committee from one side or other of the chamber, we should do that. So far from there being any discourtesy in the President addressing honorable senators from the position which it has been his custom to occupy when speaking, I hold that that is the only place from which he can address honorable senators and maintain the impartiality of his office. Those are my views for what they are worth.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I desire to point out calmly to Senator Cameron that I think he misunderstands the position. When the Senate is in Committee there is no President, and the President becomes Senator Baker.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—Senator Clemons will pardon me. He becomes Senator Baker, and must take either one side or the other, according to the honorable and learned senator's views.

Senator CLEMONS. — Undoubtedly. The President is President in the Senate, and in the Senate only. As soon as the Senate resolves itself into Committee we have no President, and the President becomes Senator Baker. This is especially important in this Senate, because, as Senator Cameron will remember, the Constitution contains many provisions dealing with the votes and actions of honorable senators having regard to the fact that each State is equally represented in the Senate. When the Senate is in Committee Senator Baker is one of six senators from South Australia, enabled by the Constitution and by our standing orders to speak, and enabled by the Constitution, although President, to exercise a deliberative vote and not a casting vote. So that in every respect his function as President ceases as soon as the Senate goes into Committee. That is the essential point in the whole of our arguments, and I am afraid Senator Cameron has entirely overlooked it. I desire to say a word with regard to my personal attitude in moving this amendment. It has been said that it will be taken as a direct slight or a direct blow aimed at Senator Baker. I have heard it said by way of interjection that this question should have been raised long ago, but I remind honorable senators that there was no previous opportunity to raise it. I do not suppose that any honorable senator will say that I have been personally afraid to move in this matter. I can assure honorable senators that there has been no fear on my part, but I have had no other opportunity of raising the question. How could I, under the standing orders under which we are working at the present time, challenge Senator Baker's right to stand behind the Chair while speaking? The standing orders would not have supported me if I had done so, and I could only have appealed to the honorable and learned senator's sense of courtesy to the Chair. I preferred to wait until the proper opportunity arose, and if these standing orders had come before us for consideration last session I should have raised the point then, in order that the practice for the future might be decided. Because neither I nor any other honorable senator has had an opportunity of drawing attention to this practice, we are told that we allowed it to grow. That argument is erroneous and unfair, because no opportunity previously arose to check what has been called a practice, and no member of the Senate could have prevented Senator Baker speaking from behind the Chair under the standing orders at present in force. I have taken the first opportunity of trying to prevent a practice which is not in accordance with the practice of any other Parliament in the world where English is spoken. I am told that I should withdraw this amendment because it will hurt Senator Baker's feelings. I have no desire to hurt Senator Baker's feelings, but I do desire that we shall adopt the practice which obtains everywhere else, or that we shall be given some reason why that practice should be departed from. I feel that I am justified in taking advantage of the earliest opportunity to check a practice which should never have been allowed to grow up, and of trying to prevent the establishment of a practice which has no warranty anywhere else.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I hope that honorable senators will not agree to strike out this standing order, simply because some of them, and apparently the majority, think that the President will be annoyed about it, and that he will take offence at this proposal if it is carried. They should consider whether the amendment proposed is right or wrong. Senator Cameron has supplied us with proof of the correctness of our arguments. The honorable senator has said that if we make the President sit upon the benches on either side of the Chamber, we take away from him his impartiality or his appearance of impartiality. That is the very thing I desire to take away from him.

I desire that the President when out of the chair shall be recognised simply as a member of the Senate, and that honorable senators shall not pay any more attention to his arguments, owing to the weight and added influence of his position as President, than they would give to the arguments of any other honorable senator. That is the sole cause of our action in this matter. We desire that the President, when he leaves the chair, shall take his place with us without any of the added influence of wigs and gowns. There is no desire whatever to inflict a slight upon the President. We must remember that what we do now will probably constitute the practice for all time. When Senator Baker is dead and gone and others take his place this practice will be followed, and the President of the day will sit behind the Chair. If we strike out this standing order that practice will never be altered. We should not allow any consideration for the feelings of the President in regard to this particular matter to influence us in any way. The objection offered on that score is absolutely groundless.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I listened with pleasure to your remarks, Mr. Chairman; but it occurred to me when you were speaking that you considered that in Committee Senator Baker ought to speak from the floor of the chamber, and that hitherto he had not done so. I am sure that Senator Clemons' remarks were based upon the contention that Senator Baker should speak from the floor of the chamber.

Senator CLEMONS.—In Committee.

Senator DOBSON.—My contention is that the honorable and learned senator has always done so. He speaks from the floor on which Senator Downer and I sit, although there is a higher floor on both sides of him. Can the Chairman properly rule that when Senator Baker speaks from his accustomed place, he is not addressing himself to the Chair from the floor of the chamber.

Senator CLEMONS.—Would the honorable and learned senators speak from the same place?

Senator DOBSON.—I have a right to speak from the same point. I have a right to sit there, or stand there; and I defy any honorable senator to say that it is not the floor of the chamber. It is because of that opinion I think that this is a trumpety, stupid piece of business.

Standing Orders 394 to 396 agreed to.
Standing Order 397—

No senator shall read his speech.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I see no reason why an honorable senator should not be permitted to read his speech if he desires to do so. We wish to hear the views of an honorable senator, and if he can give utterance to those views more satisfactorily by having previously committed them to paper, surely it is to the advantage of the Senate, as well as to the advantage of the honorable senator himself, that he should be permitted to do so. I see no reason for this prejudice against written speeches. We hear a great deal for and against written sermons; but I believe that written sermons are very often very much better than those that are delivered extempore. I shall vote against this standing order.

The CHAIRMAN.—The true reason for the existence of this standing order is that the Senate should have some guarantee that the speech delivered by an honorable senator has been prepared by himself.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—For the information of Senator Stewart, I may perhaps be allowed to relate an anecdote. In America, at one time, Congress had no such standing order as this. The consequence was that there grew up in Washington a class of gentlemen who lived by writing speeches for members of both Houses. While this practice prevailed, a practical joker, who had been offended in some way, wrote the same speech for no less than three honorable senators, who delivered or attempted to deliver it. I think the incident supplies a sufficient reason for the retention of this standing order.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—The explanation given by the President is a very interesting one. If we could only carry this provision a step further, I think it would be eminently desirable. It struck me, when Senator Baker was giving his explanation, that the application of a somewhat similar rule to the courts of justice might perhaps be a very good thing if it did away with the lawyers. We have in the courts a class of men who monopolize the business, but no one seems to find any fault with them. Some persons are so fortunate as to be able to commit to memory a speech and deliver it. What guarantee, therefore, have we that any senator's speech is his own? None whatever. If a senator can express his thoughts better in writing than in speech he ought to be permitted to read his written thoughts to the Senate.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia). I hope that Senator Stewart's view will not be taken seriously, although I believe that he is in earnest. If we had no such standing order, what an advantage it would be to a senator with a fertile imagination if he wished to do a little "stone-walling." He could write or type a speech to last for a week, and all that he would have to do would be to stand in his place and deliver it. Although we may find it necessary sometimes to do a little "stone-walling" in the interests of the community, yet I hope that we shall never become professional "stone-wallers." For that reason I should like every senator to deliver his speech unwritten.

Standing order agreed to.

Standing Orders 398 to 404 agreed to.

Standing Order 405—

No senator shall read extracts from newspapers or other documents referring to debates in the Senate during the same session.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I think that Hansard should be excepted from the operation of the standing order. We have a Hansard which costs us a great deal of money, in order to obtain an accurate report of our debates, and if a senator wishes to quote from a speech delivered by another senator he ought to be able to quote from Hansard. That has been the practice, and it might as well be embodied in the standing order. I move—

That the words "except Hansard" be inserted after the word "documents," line 2.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I do not think that the standing order is wanted. In South Australia we had a practice by which we overcame the prohibition against the reading of extracts from newspapers. We quietly folded the extract within a paper and made out that we had memorized the matter. We read the extract and no one called attention to the breach of the rule. I expect that a similar practice will grow up in the Senate even if we adopt this standing order. It might as well be omitted for any good that it will do. I agree with Senator Baker that we should be allowed to quote from Hansard, and to carry his idea a little further, we might as well be allowed to quote from papers or reports of debates, even if we had not Hansard. A clever speaker can evade the rule with the greatest ease, but it takes a new member a little time to learn the art of reading extracts from papers referring to debates of the same session.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—If I am allowed to amend the standing order in the direction which has been indicated by Senator Baker, it will be necessary to review the previous one, which says—

No senator shall allude to any debate of the same session upon a question or Bill not being then under discussion, nor to any speech made in Committee except by indulgence of the Senate for personal explanation.

Senator DRAKE.---The standing order refers to a debate of the same session upon a question or Bill not being then under discussion. If the same question or Bill is under discussion Hansard can be quoted.

Senator MILLEN.—If that is the interpretation placed upon the standing order—a rather narrow one—my remark does not apply.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—There are debates and debates. The parliamentary rule, which is followed in these standing orders, is that a member must not refer to a debate of the same session on some subject not then under discussion. Technically speaking the discussions on a Bill are regarded as one debate, and if a senator wishes to refer to what another senator has said on the Bill, or on the matter then under discussion, surely Hansard is the best authority to which he can go? That is all I wish to do by my amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Standing Orders 406 and 407 agreed to.

Standing Order 408—

No senator shall use the name of His Majesty, or of his representative in this Commonwealth, irreverently in debate, nor for the purpose of influencing the Senate in its deliberations.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—It is wrong to use the word "irreverently," which is defined in every dictionary as referring to the Supreme Being. For instance, in Davidson's Dictionary, "irreverence" is defined as—

Want of due regard for the character and authority of the Supreme Being.

In the standing order we are speaking of a human being. I move—

That the word "irreverently," line 3, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "disrespectfully."

Amendment agreed to.

Standing order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 409 to 417 agreed to.

Standing Order 418—

Complaints against newspapers.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—

I rise, not to move an amendment, but to call the attention of the Committee to the standing order. I do so because of my experience in the Parliament of New South Wales, which it must be said did not emerge with any credit from its conflicts with the press. The standing order says that—

Any senator complaining to the Senate of a statement in a newspaper as a breach of privilege shall produce a copy of the paper containing the statement in question, and be prepared to give the name of the printer or publisher, and also submit a substantive motion declaring the person in question to have been guilty of contempt.

What happens when the person has been declared guilty of contempt? He may be summoned if you like, and he can come or stay away if he likes. It seems to me that the standing order lays down a procedure which will land the Senate in a ridiculous position. I hope that it will be negatived.

PETITION.

Mr. WILKS.—I desire to present a petition from over 30,000 Protestant residents of the Commonwealth, expressing their "emphatic disapproval of the action of the Prime Minister in making an official visit to the Pope of Rome, and in accepting a gold medal as a distinction from him." The petitioners repudiate certain remarks alleged to have been made by the right honorable gentleman and reported in the Catholic Press of Sydney of 26th July, 1902, and pray that the House will "strenuously oppose the conferment upon him of any position of honour or dignity in the Commonwealth until his actions have received the indorsement of an electorate of the Commonwealth." I move—

That the petition be received and read.

Mr. CROUCH.—I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether the petition can be received, inasmuch as the prayer which has been read by the honorable member is offensive?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Shall I be in order in moving to insert in the petition the name of His Majesty King Edward?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Certainly not.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—On the motion that the petition be read, I do not propose to descend so far as to justify my action in accepting an invitation to an audience with the Pope; but a statement is made in the petition as to remarks reported to have been uttered by me—

Mr. WILKS.—I rise to order.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Gag!

Mr. SPEAKER.—The standing orders under which we are working require that there shall be no debate upon the subject-matter of a petition. All that can be done at the present time is to discuss the motion which the honorable member for Dailey has moved. Debate can take place only upon the abstract questions whether the petition shall or shall not be received, and whether it shall or shall not be read. There can be no discussion of its subject-matter, because, until it has been read, the House is presumed not to know what its subject-matter is. On the point of order taken by the honorable and learned member for Corio, the petition is not out of order for any reason yet disclosed; but I cannot be taken to know what its subject-matter is.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—What opportunity has a member of the House who is misrepresented by a statement in a petition to put himself right before honorable members?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I know of no such opportunity, unless a motion is submitted which deals in some way with the subject-matter of the petition. I am quite sure, however, that, after the petition has been read, the House will readily accord to the Prime Minister, or to any other honorable member under similar circumstances, an opportunity to make a personal explanation.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Petition received and read.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—As a matter of personal explanation, I would say that I do not intend to discuss the propriety of having accepted permission to pay a visit to so distinguished a statesman and personage as the head of the Roman Church. If I wished to justify that action, I need only point to the numerous precedents for such visits which existed before I myself paid one, and to a notable case which has occurred since. I wish to call attention, however, for the purpose of explanation, to a statement in the petition which repeats a press report to the effect that I said that, so long as I remained at the head of the Australian Government, Catholics might rely upon receiving in Australia a greater share of liberality and benevolence than they receive in other parts of the Empire. The facts are these: In the interview which took place, and which is alluded to in the petition, the Pope said that he was exceedingly pleased to observe the feeling of tolerance which existed in Australia towards people professing any religious creed; that he observed with great gratification the numerous proofs of that spirit, and hoped that it might long continue. Perhaps, honorable members may think, in the light of recent events, that he was not fully informed of the conditions prevailing here when he gave vent to that statement. My answer to him, through the prelate who acted as interpreter, was, so far as I can recollect, that he might rely upon the tolerance to which he had alluded always continuing in Australia. That is the sum and substance of what took place on the question of the treatment of Catholics in Australia. I should like to add that repeatedly after my return to Australia, and notably on the occasion of my first speech in reference to my tour, at the Town Hall, Sydney, on the 17th October, 1902, I corrected the report which is alluded to in this petition, in the terms which I am now using. Seeing that that speech and many others gave the sum and substance of my interview in this particular, long before this petition was got up, honorable members may draw their own conclusions as to the spirit of tolerance and fair play which has dictated the repetition of the misstatement. I am quite sure that the Minister for Defence, who was present, will indorse the correctness of the version which I have given.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Hear, hear.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Of course, no newspaper reporter was present at the interview, and I have repeatedly made public the correct version of what actually occurred. Notwithstanding that fact, honorable members now find an incorrect version repeated in the petition, without doubt for sectarian purposes. In what I actually said, I believe that, instead of misrepresenting, I rightfully represented the feeling of the vast majority of the people of the Commonwealth. I must express my hope and belief that, notwithstanding the conclusion to be drawn from the presentation of the petition, the Commonwealth at large will maintain that spirit of tolerance to which the petition is so gross an exception.

Mr. WILKS.—I should not refer to this matter, but—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member rise to a point of order?

Mr. WILKS.—I desire to reply to the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member cannot do that. So that the House may be under no misapprehension in regard to this matter, I will read Standing Order 89, which says—

Every petition, which according to the rules of the House can be received, shall be brought to the table by the member presenting the same, and no discussion upon the subject-matter thereof shall be allowed.

I am sure, if the honorable member has been misrepresented in any way, the House will give him the same opportunity as would be given to any other honorable member, to explain his position. If he has not been misrepresented, I do not see what he can have to explain.

Mr. WILKS.—The petition has been misrepresented.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It will not be in order for the honorable member to make any explanation in regard to the petition.

Mr. WILKS.—I, too, have been misrepresented, as the member who presented the petition. I claim the tolerance which the Prime Minister asks for himself. While I was glad to hear his version of the interview with the Pope, I desire to say, on behalf of the petitioners, that the petition was in circulation months before his return to Australia.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—How many signatures were obtained before my return? I know that a great many have been obtained since.

Mr. WILKS.—I am not prepared to say how many signatures were obtained after the right honorable gentleman's return. The petitioners, however, signed the document without any knowledge of a repudiation by the Prime Minister of the newspaper report to which it refers. In reply to what he has said with reference to sectarian principle—

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I did not use the words "sectarian principle." I cannot conceive of any principle in sectarianism.

Mr. WILKS.—The right honorable gentleman said that the petitioners signed the document in a spirit of sectarianism. I wish to say on their behalf, however, that in signing the petition they were only exercising their rights as citizens, and I should have been allowed to present it to the House without the trouble which we have had to-day.

PAPER.

Sir EDMUND BARTON laid on the table the following paper :—

Correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Agent-General for Queensland with regard to the power given to the Agents-General in England to issue exemption certificates under the Immigration Restriction Act.

DEFENCE BILL.

Mr. FULLER.—I desire to ask the Minister for Defence when he will be prepared to introduce the Defence Bill?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Bill is almost ready, and as soon as the way is clear for it I shall have much pleasure in presenting it to the House.

VISITS TO THE POPE.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received any intimation that a petition is being largely signed in New South Wales with a view to securing the dethronement of His Majesty the King and the Emperor of Germany, because of their action in visiting His Holiness the Pope?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have no information on the subject.

TRANSFER OF STATES DEBTS.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister whether, in view of the probable early consideration of the question of the States debts being taken over by the Commonwealth, he will have a return prepared showing the dates upon which the various States liabilities fall due? I do not think that any such return has yet been furnished.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—An exhaustive return of the kind indicated is now in preparation, and will be presented by the Treasurer when he explains his Budget.

GOLDRING CASE.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—A few days ago I directed attention to the case of a Mr. Goldring, a merchant in Sydney, who had his books and invoices, together with the goods to which the invoices related, impounded by the Customs Department. Mr. Goldring offered to pay the whole of the duty demanded by the Customs authorities, or to enter into any bond that they might require, if they would deliver the goods and restore him his books and invoices. Notwithstanding all his applications, he has not received the goods or other property, which have been in possession of the Customs Department since 17th November last. I can only speak from the facts submitted to me, but I venture to say that it is only right that Mr. Goldring should have some explanation given to him as to the cause of the delay.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member knows Mr. Goldring is suing us for the restitution of his property.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But I desire information with regard to the whole of the facts of the case. I believe that Mr. Goldring is suing for the return of the amount over-paid to the Customs Department. If I am wrongly advised, the Attorney-General can correct me, but I think—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not debate the question. He must not do more than state the facts.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I understand that Mr. Goldring is suing for an overpayment of duty, and also for the restoration of his books and invoices, which have been detained since November last. I intend to move the adjournment of the House upon this question to-morrow, and I wish to know from the Attorney-General what action has been taken, or whether he will lay upon the table the whole of the papers in connexion with the case.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The first time I came into possession of some information regarding this case was during last week, when a petition was presented by Mr. Goldring. I gathered from this that he complained of the detention of his books and certain goods.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Mr. Goldring has since received a copy of his papers—an incorrect one.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I know only what is stated in the petition, which contained a request for the appointment of a nominal defendant to represent the Commonwealth. On the same day I signed the necessary minute.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Does the Attorney-General know that Mr. Goldring has been asking for information since 17th November?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not interrupt the Minister. If he desires to obtain any further information, he must ask questions in the ordinary way.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Mr. Goldring had not communicated with me before I received his petition. The minute, which I signed on the same day that the petition was received, went before the next Executive Council, held on Monday last. A defendant has been appointed, and an action by Mr. Goldring is now in progress. I submit to my honorable friend that it would be most improper to discuss a case which is now sub judice, and in regard to which we have taken all the steps we could to give Mr. Goldring his remedy. I have written to my honorable colleague, the Minister of Trade and Customs, advising him of the course adopted, but understand that he has not yet dealt with my communication.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But what explanation is offered regarding the delay that has taken place?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Mr. Goldring is now suing us on account of the delay, and if we are responsible we shall have to pay.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But that does not explain the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The standing orders do not permit of the discussion of matters which form the subject of questions. Questions may be asked and facts may be stated to make clear the questions, but there must not be anything in the shape of discussion in connexion with them.

At a later stage,

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I should like to ask the Minister for Trade and Customs whether there is any charge of fraud against Mr. Goldring, and, also, what was the cause of the delay in the return of his books and papers and the delivery of his goods?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Upon such a subject as fraud I should not care to give an answer off-hand. I therefore ask the honorable member to give notice of his question.

FEDERAL CAPITAL SITE.

Mr. BROWN.—I should like to know whether the Prime Minister can give us any idea when the report of the Federal Capital Sites Commission will be available?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have no exact official information beyond what I have communicated to the House, but when in Sydney a few days ago I met the Chairman of the Commission, who told me that the report was in preparation and would very soon be ready; that it would certainly be sent in this month. As soon as it is received, the Government intend to ask that it should be printed and distributed amongst honorable members.

DEPUTY AUDITORS-GENERAL.

Mr. MAHON asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Has his attention been drawn to paragraph 9 of the Auditor-General's report for 1901-2, laid on the table of this House on 26th May last, in which it is stated that five State auditors have been voted £100 each yearly for acting as deputies to the Auditor-General of the Commonwealth?

2. Has he ascertained whether this statement is correct or not?

3. If it be correct, will he inform the House whether minor and poorly paid State officers performing for the Customs Department duties not properly nor originally pertaining to their positions have been by him refused any remuneration for such services, even though the same have been rendered in the officers' own time, their State duties having fully absorbed the usual official hours; and, if so, why?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1 and 2. I believe the statement to be correct, but the Department is not concerned.

3. I am not aware of any case in which any amount properly payable to an officer of the department is withheld, but will consider any special case to which the honorable member may refer me, and in which the contrary is alleged.

NEWSPAPER MISREPRESENTATION.

Mr. HUME COOK asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

With reference to an article in the Age newspaper of the 15th inst. —

1. Is it true "that through Federal extravagance the State Governments do not receive the returns of the revenue to which they are entitled." If not true, what are the facts?

2. Is it true "that dozens of officers whose positions were sinecures under the States were transferred to the Federal service at largely increased salaries." What is the total of new appointments?

3. Is it a fact that some State officers have been appointed to Federal positions "at double salaries." If so, how many, and what are the salaries paid?

4. Is it true that the private secretaries of two Ministers are being paid out of Commonwealth funds?

5. Are any officers of the Commonwealth service, whilst travelling, having their living expenses paid out of public funds?

6. What was the Adelaide estimated cost of federation per head; and, including the proposed High Court expenditure, by how much has that estimate been exceeded?

7. What was the pre-federation cost of the military and naval forces, and what is the present cost?

8. What is the actual saving per head by the reduced military expenditure?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I am not in a position at the present moment, owing to the incompleteness of the returns I have so far obtained, to do more than to inform the House that these statements are in the highest degree unscrupulous. Full answers will be given if the honorable and learned member will repeat his question on Tuesday next.

TIDE SURVEYOR MARTIN.

Mr. E. SOLOMON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Have the Government taken into consideration the disabilities which Tide Surveyor Martin, in Western Australia, is labouring under in properly carrying out the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act as shown in his letter forwarded by the Collector of Customs, Fremantle, in his report, dated 19th April, 1903?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to supply the Customs steam launch which has been applied for, and the assistance required to carry out the provisions of the Act in a proper manner?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes, although I am not altogether satisfied with the way in which the work has been done.

2. I shall confer with the Minister for Trade and Customs on the subject.

SUGAR BONUS BILL.

Resolved (on motion by Sir GEORGE TURNER)—

That the Bill be recommitted for the reconsideration of clauses 2, 3, and 9.

In Committee (Recommittal).

Clause 2.—

There shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, which is hereby appropriated accordingly, to every grower of sugar-cane or beet within the Commonwealth, in the production of which sugar-cane or beet white labour only has been employed after the 28th day of February, 1902, a bonus, at the rates provided by this Act, on all such sugar-cane or beet delivered for manufacture after the commencement of this Act, and before the 1st day of January, 1907.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—I mentioned yesterday that the administration of the Excise Tariff Act was under the control of the Minister for Trade and Customs, who was then absent from the chamber preparing some Bills which, in due course, will be submitted to Parliament. I informed honorable members that I was under the impression that the date after which rebate was payable upon sugar in the production of which white labour only had been employed, viz., the 28th February, 1902, had been extended by some means, though I was not very clear about the matter. I thought it was advisable that power should be given to yearly prescribe a certain date, so that growers who employed white labour only after that date should be entitled to claim the bonus, and that the Minister should be empowered to fix such a date as would prevent any successful attempt to defraud or prohibit sugar-growers from taking advantage of the provisions of the Bonus Bill. A good deal of discussion of an interesting nature took place upon that point, and it covered a far wider range than I had anticipated. I then asked for an adjournment to enable me to ascertain from the Minister for Trade and Customs exactly what had been done, and what he thought ought to be done in connexion with this matter. I have since found that the Excise Act was passed on the 26th July, 1902. That measure fixes the date after which growers can claim rebate upon sugar produced by white labour only at 28th February, 1902—a period some six months previous. After the Act had been passed representations were made to my colleague that the date fixed was hardly a fair one, in that no notice had been given to the growers, and, consequently, the period was extended to the 1st March, 1903, to cover those cases.

Mr. THOMSON.—By what power?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not say that there was any power to extend the period. I was under the impression that, under the Act, power was given to fix these dates yearly, in order to meet the different cases as they arose. Some time during the current year it was represented to the Postmaster-General and the Minister for Trade and Customs that a large number of persons, who were desirous of taking advantage of the provisions of the Excise Tariff Act, had been debarred from doing so through want of knowledge, because that Act was not passed for several months after the date fixed therein. The matter was discussed with the planters and others interested, and the Minister for Trade and Customs then agreed that the time should be extended for one year, but for no longer. He was, and still is, under the impression that all the parties interested were satisfied as to the fairness of this arrangement. At any rate, it gave all of them an opportunity of knowing that, in order to claim the payment of the rebate, they had to cease employing black labour in the production of any crop upon a certain date in advance, and not upon a retrospective date. As this Bill is submitted simply with a view of altering the mode of distributing the payment, I do not think it would be wise to discuss at the present time the much larger question involved. Whether or not it may be necessary to debate it at a later stage I am not prepared to say just now. That regulation having been passed, apparently without legal power—at all events, there is considerable doubt as to whether the power existed to make the alteration—and a number of persons having taken advantage of it by registering to obtain the bonus under it, I think that the Committee will now be prepared to say that the date mentioned in the Bill may be fairly altered to the 28th February, 1903. Under these circumstances, I move—

That the figure “2,” line 7, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the figure “3.”

If that proposal is carried, those who have taken advantage of the regulation will be entitled to the payment of the rebate, whilst those who have not will occupy the same position that they did previously.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—Only a moment ago the Treasurer stated that as this Bill was intended to take the place of the measure providing for the payment of rebate upon sugar produced by white labour only, he thought we ought not to go beyond the provisions of the Excise Tariff Act. I thoroughly agreed with him, and am of opinion that no change ought to be made in this Bill. But the Treasurer, having made that declaration, now proposes to go outside the provisions of the Excise Tariff Act by fixing the date prescribed therein a year later. Such a step would constitute so serious a departure from the original compact that honorable members ought not to countenance it. Unless the Excise Tariff Act and the Customs Tariff Act can be again brought before Parliament, I do not think that we ought to be asked to make any change in the compact which was entered into. The motive for seeking the amendment is not one that ought to commend itself to the House, seeing that the Minister for Trade and Customs has arrogated to himself the powers of this Parliament. In effect he says—“I do not care that Parliament has declared that the date should be the 28th February, 1902. I will alter it to the 28th February, 1903.” That would be an excellent thing if the Minister were spending his own money in the payment of this bonus, but when it is the money of the Commonwealth, I ask honorable members whether they can have any sympathy with him, and whether he has not arrogated to himself power in a way that is almost unknown in the history of any parliamentary body? The Minister for Trade and Customs of his own sweet will has set aside the authority of Parliament by saying that irrespective of what date it may fix, he is above the law, and will not administer it. Is not that a very serious matter, especially when the right honorable gentleman tells the Committee that if a technical breach of the law is committed in other respects, he must institute proceedings and obtain convictions against merchants even though no attempt has been made to defraud the Customs?

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable member cannot discuss that subject.

Mr. CONROY.—I am speaking of cases in which the Minister prefers charges against merchants, though his own officers have declared that the charges are not true.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable and learned member must not discuss that matter.

Mr. CONROY.—I think that the Committee should vote against the proposed amendment, because it involves a complete alteration of the compact which was entered into when the Excise Tariff Act was under consideration. The compact involved three conditions, viz., the imposition of a customs duty of £6 per ton upon imported sugar, an excise duty of £3 per ton, and the payment of a rebate of £2 per ton upon sugar in the production of which white labour only had been employed. A date was fixed after which growers might claim that rebate, namely, the 28th February, 1902.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But this Bill is intended to apply only to the current year.

Mr. CONROY.—A compact was entered into upon the strength of which opposition to the Government proposal was considerably weakened. Practically an agreement was arrived at between the three parties represented in this Chamber. The payment of the rebate was intended to be in the nature of a bonus to those sugar-growers who employed white labour only. The present proposal is an entirely different one. We have already decided that a bonus shall take the place of a rebate. Now we are asked to consent to an alteration in the date previously fixed, the effect of which will be that a bonus will be paid where it was not paid before. That is the simple position, and no sophistry can conceal it. I urge the Treasurer to take a sound constitutional view of the matter, and I feel sure that he would have done so had it not been for the extremely arbitrary action of the Minister for Trade and Customs in altering the date. That Minister had no right to alter that date without the authority of Parliament, and having done so, he has no title to ask honorable members to support him in his action. I protest against the alteration which has been made, and hope that the Treasurer will withdraw his amendment, instead of allowing the time of the Committee to be wasted in discussing it.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I am quite sure that if the Treasurer, or any honorable member of this Committee, takes up the position assumed by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, they will be doing an absurd thing. Is there an honorable member with any intelligence who will suggest that when the date prescribed in the Excise Tariff Act was fixed, viz., the 28th February, 1902, that was to be the only time at which the sugar-growers could take advantage of its provisions? Does any one say that the cultivators were to dispense with black labour immediately and employ white labour only from that date? The very idea is sheer nonsense. The Committee knows very well that from year to year each planter who desired to work the whole or any portion of his plantation by white labour only would be entitled to earn the rebate. If this year's cane be cut with black labour, and next year's crop wholly cultivated with white labour, why should not the grower obtain the rebate in respect of next year?

Mr. THOMSON.—The Act does not prevent that.

Mr. FISHER.—Then why provide that, after 1903, no planter shall be able to come under the Act? Does the Minister hold to that position?

Mr. CONROY.—They can come in at any time.

Mr. FISHER.—How can they come in?

Mr. KINGSTON.—By growing the cane by white labour only.

Mr. FISHER.—But if the roots set by black labour have been left in the ground the cane cannot be said to be grown by white labour only, and that leads us to the position taken up by the honorable member for Herbert—that the roots must be ploughed out.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Act has not been carried out in that way.

Mr. FISHER.—We have been quibbling about the meaning of words and the strict interpretation of the Act; but is there any real difficulty in providing in the Bill what should be done? Why should it not be stated that when once one crop is cut and taken from the ground, the bonus shall be paid on the next if white labour only had thereafter been employed in its cultivation and harvesting?

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX.—That is not what we are getting.

Mr. FISHER.—The New South Wales planters have been singularly well situated in a climate in which black labour need not have been employed under any circumstances; but, in the case of the larger planters of Queensland, the position is very different. I have always strenuously opposed the employment of black labour, and it is for that reason I am endeavouring to give the planters an opportunity of substituting white labour. Why prevent planters from reaping the advantage of the bonus at any time they are able to do so? They have imported black labour under fairly strict conditions, and are compelled to employ it for a certain number of years, or suffer monetary loss by keeping the labourers idle. I suggest that some time should be fixed when the planters may increase the proportion of their plantings under white labour, so that they may definitely know what they are to do to earn the rebate. I should not at all object to allow the long term of twelve months—to provide that planters must work with white labour for that period before they earn the bonus. At any rate, they ought to know exactly the conditions; and I believe the Government and Parliament wish to do what is fair. It is with the object of carrying out the idea of a white Australia that I make these remarks, and I believe that when honorable members understand the question they will do what is right.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs).—The intention in the first instance was to give a bonus on the production of sugar grown by white labour only, and to take, as the period during which the bonus could be earned, the time from planting to the final delivery of the cane at the mill. This bonus was based on a certain amount per ton, and it was not intended that it should be paid simply for harvesting.

Mr. FISHER.—That is quite correct.

Mr. KINGSTON.—At the same time, it was intended to be a benefit of which growers could avail themselves at once. There was the special circumstance that we were introducing a new system when cane was growing which had been attended to by black labour. The primary object, as defined in the regulations laid before the House was to go right back to the planting, which is one of the most important and costly parts of the process as compared with the harvesting only. We intended to insist, in the first instance, that white labour should be employed right from the planting up to the time of delivery at the mill. The growers were not to blame in the slightest degree, in that they had used black labour when they knew of no inducement to employ white labour, and it was declared at the time that proposals were introduced, long before they found embodiment in the Bill, that those growers could go on using black labour up to the 28th February, 1902.

Mr. FISHER.—It was after that date before the Bill got through.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That is so, but at the same time the excise proposals had been laid on the table of the House.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The time was extended to the 1st March.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Notice was given to the growers, and on a variety of occasions the time was extended. A number of other planters were desirous of qualifying for the rebate, and the time for dispensing with black labour was finally extended to the 1st March, 1903.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That regulation was issued on the 24th December last.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The regulation was sanctioned for issue on the 24th December, but it was not passed through the Executive Council until the 8th January, 1903.

Mr. CONROY.—When Parliament was not sitting.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Of course Parliament was not sitting, but the thing had to be done.

Mr. THOMSON.—Under what power was it done?

Mr. KINGSTON.—It seems to be doubtful now whether we had the power to grant that extension, but I can say that no member of the Government believed for a moment that the power was not there. The regulation was prepared, and went through the usual course, and was gazetted, and nobody until this moment has suggested that there was no power to make it.

Mr. THOMSON.—In the previous Act, the date, 1902, was quite plain.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I had not the pleasure of drafting the Bill, which was prepared in ignorance of the fact of the order of the Executive Council. That order was gazetted, and is on the files, and at the disposal of honorable members. A number of matters were fixed by regulation, and the Executive Council came to the conclusion, having regard to the Act, that there was power to make the order; and if a mistake was made it was a mistake into which we all fell. But I believe the proceeding is one which will commend itself to honorable members generally. The first principle was that growers should not get the bonus if they employed black labour during any period from the tilling of the soil; and, in my opinion, to extend the time for a whole year is a sufficient concession. We should not be justified in going further, and in saying to the growers — "We do not care in the future whether or not you have time and again for years past refrained from coming in; you may have planted and have had your expenses reduced by the employment of black labour, but so long as you choose in regard to the particular item of harvesting in any one season to employ white labour, you shall have the bonus." I do not think we ought to do that, and I sympathize with a great deal of what was said by the honorable and learned member for Parkes, who pointed out that the bonus is altogether out of proportion to the simple cost of harvesting, and far in excess of what the planters deserve. The concession is, in this respect, open to the objections urged against it, but it was unavoidable under the circumstances. Let us not, however, go any further in this respect. I found a great volume of Queensland opinion against any further relaxation of the provision, under which concessions enough, if not too many, have been given to the planters in respect to the employment of white labour. I trust we shall hold our hand, and let the rebate be duly earned by, and paid to, those who, in future plantings — and planting is going on from time to time in various parts — use white labour. In those cases where planters have had time to make up their minds, and have not employed white labour, no bonus should be given.

Mr. WARSON.—In some cases it is stated that planters are getting the cane trashed, cut, and taken to the mill for the amount of the bonus, so that the cutting costs them nothing.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I have heard that said time and again, and it is bad enough to have to pay the bonus under those circumstances.

Mr. FISHER.—Does that occur in New South Wales?

Mr. WARSON.—In Queensland.

Mr. KINGSTON.—We ought to have a fair return for the bonus, and in my opinion we have already gone far enough in our concessions.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I should like to point out to the Minister for Trade and Customs that the roots of sugar-cane may lie in the ground for five or seven years. Is it demanded that these roots shall be ploughed out, and planting take place elsewhere in order to earn the bonus?

Mr. MCCAY.—Under the Bill the roots may have been put there by black labour, so long as that occurred before the 28th February, 1903; but it is apparently desired to allow the roots to be put in by black labour after that date.

Mr. FISHER.—What percentage of labour is there in the planting?

Mr. MCCAY.—I am told on good authority that it is 5 per cent.

Mr. FISHER.—Although I am not a planter, I venture to say that the percentage of labour is from 5 to 7 per cent. The sugar-growers in Queensland have of necessity been employing coloured labour, and the extent of that labour used in laying the roots is neither here nor there. I think the difficulty would be met if the Committee acted on my suggestion that the whole of the crop must be grown and taken to the mill by white labour only. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has suggested that, if the cane has been planted subsequent to the 8th February, 1902, by black labour, the bonus shall not be paid. Many cane-growers are economically bound to employ their hired kanaka labour for a term, and as the planting is such a small percentage of the whole process, I do not think there would be any loss in allowing the bonus on the growing and harvesting of the crops by white labour from old roots. I asked the honorable member for Werriwa why they should not?

Mr. CONROY.—Because the work of clearing off the cane does not cost 3s. 6d. an acre in twelve months.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable and learned member is arguing from quite a different point of view from that from which I look at the matter. I hope that the Minister for Trade and Customs will not insist upon the amendment, because, if he does, instead of promoting the "white Australia" movement he will be retarding it.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER.—He will be making it more difficult for big plantations to come in, and will arouse influences involving millions of pounds, and excite political discussions which will undoubtedly militate against the object which we have in view.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).—Although we are dealing with a measure intended to carry out the desire of the Committee to encourage the employment of white labour, the Bill is being transformed more and more into one which will have the opposite effect. It might very well be styled a Bill to make bonuses for the employment of white labour payable on sugar grown by black labour. The alteration of the date from the 28th February, 1902, to the 28th February, 1903, will have the result that sugar entirely grown by black labour up to the later date, and upon which white labour is employed for only a very limited time afterwards, will be entitled to a bonus, as though it had been cultivated entirely by white labour. That is not what the Committee desire.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—But it will apply only to the present year.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I am speaking of the present effect. Yesterday, the honorable member for North Sydney suggested that there should be a limit as to the time within which it should be obligatory to employ white labour only, and that that limit should be the period occupied by the growing of a crop, which was set down as one year. The bonus would then be payable only on crops produced entirely by white labour.

Mr. McCAY.—That is more liberal than the Government proposal; it means more money.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—But does it not give better effect to the desire of the Committee to encourage the employment of white labour only? In view of the heavy charges imposed upon the people to give effect to this intention, I hope that we shall agree to some arrangement which, while doing no injustice to the planters of Queensland, will be fair to the community at large.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I confess that I was surprised to hear from the Minister for Trade and Customs that the regulations ran the gamut of the Cabinet, from the Governor-General down, without it being discovered that they were ultra vires.

Mr. KINGSTON.—They were laid upon the table of the House when we met, and were also published in the Gazette.

Mr. McCAY.—If the Minister's answer is that we should have read the regulations in the Gazette, my reply is that this is the first opportunity we have had to discuss them. As soon as they were brought forward for discussion, the weakness which I have mentioned was noticed by several honorable members as well as by myself. If I have to make a choice between the Government amendment and the suggestion of the honorable member for North Sydney, I must accept the former, though I do not like it. The honorable member for Wide Bay does not seem to perceive that the position he takes up means that, in spite of all the warnings which the sugar planters have had, they are to be permitted to plant cane with black labour, and subsequently cultivate it with white labour, without prejudice to their right to a bonus for it as cane grown entirely by white labour.

Mr. FISHER.—Cane is not planted every year; it is sometimes left in the ground for seven years.

Mr. McCAY.—Well, as the Bill stands, if it were planted with black labour before the 28th February, 1902, but cultivated since that time with white labour, it would still be entitled to a bonus. But if growers have, since the 28th February, 1902, planted fresh cane with black labour, they have deliberately disregarded the terms of the Excise Tariff Act, under which the bonus is payable. The Government now propose to extend the time within which cane entitled to a bonus may have been planted by black labour until the 28th February, 1903. But, if we agree to the proposal that a bonus shall be payable upon all crops which have been worked with white labour for twelve months, it will mean that planters may go on employing black labour until 1905, and then claim bonuses upon the crops cut in 1906. No planter, however, should be entitled to a bonus on a crop deliberately planted with black labour after the date mentioned in the Excise Tariff Act.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But what about those who have black labourers under contract, whom they are bound to employ?

Mr. McCAY.—The planting of cane costs only from 5 to 7 per cent. of the cost of the crop. Let them employ white labour for the planting, and use the black labour upon the vast areas already planted. If a man is replanting, and wants to get a bonus on the cane grown, why should he not be compelled to employ white labour?

It is now argued that, because certain planters have black labour which they cannot get rid of for another twelve months, they should be at liberty to employ that labour and still obtain a bonus. But, if that is allowed, the very purpose of the bonus will be defeated, and the intention of Parliament in passing the Excise Tariff Act will be flouted. I protest strongly against the argument that, because planters cannot get rid of their black labour at once, they should still be entitled to bonuses. To grant bonuses under such circumstances would be another departure from the bargain originally made when Parliament passed the Excise Tariff Act.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—We have in this matter an illustration of extraordinary administration. The Minister for Trade and Customs acknowledges that he issued a regulation in direct contravention of the provisions of the Act.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I did not say that.

Mr. THOMSON.—The right honorable member must make that admission, because the Act is as clear as day-light, and the date is specified in it. The attention of the right honorable member must have been directed to the matter when the question of framing a regulation was brought before him. I could excuse him if there were any doubt about the meaning of the Act, but it states specifically that up to a certain date the employment of black labour shall not prevent a grower from obtaining a rebate. There was therefore no excuse for the regulation extending the time. Last night the Treasurer, who was then in charge of the Bill, pleaded for an amendment providing for the fixing of a date each year as being absolutely necessary; but this afternoon the Minister for Trade and Customs states just as emphatically that he does not approve of such a proposal, and regards it as unnecessary and wholly undesirable. Surely the Committee have a right to expect uniformity of opinion and action from Ministers. It cannot be a matter for wonder that considerable confusion exists in the Committee when there is such a difference of opinion among Ministers. I had no idea when the Excise Tariff Act was passed that it was intended that in dealing with the production of a cane crop we should go back to the original planting of the roots. If I were told that a bonus would apply to the crops coming from a certain tree—and sugar-cane is really a species of tree—I should expect it to apply to each crop, and I see no reason why the sugar bonus should not be so regarded. I agree with the honorable member for Wide Bay, and I think we should be committing an absolute absurdity if we did not deal with this matter in the manner suggested by him. The planters cannot jump about from one kind of labour to another, because, if they once embark in the cultivation of a large area by means of white labour, the black labour will go from them, and they will not be able to revert to it. We should be led into an absurd position if the proposal of the Minister were agreed to. Many of the planters have entered into kanaka labour contracts, which we have specifically recognised under the legislation we have passed. We know that these agreements extend over a term of years, and that the planters cannot at once get rid of the kanakas however much some of them may desire to do so. Many of them have, no doubt, already determined that, when the kanakas can be dispensed with, they will avail themselves of the opportunity to claim the bonus given for the production of white-grown sugar. In the meantime, many planters can do nothing but utilize the services of the black labourers whose term of engagement does not expire for some time to come. In some cases planters may have set out their crops one or two years before they are able to get rid of their black labour, and, according to the Minister, when such men desire to come under the provisions of this Act, and employ white labour, they are to be told that they must uproot all the cane that has been planted by means of black labour and start afresh. Are we to impose such an absurd condition upon the planters? If it is held that the planters have sinned by employing black labour—I do not agree with that view, myself—the sin has been already committed, and there is no reason why the planters should be practically compelled to go on sinning by being precluded from the benefits offered by our legislation.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The planters need not uproot their cane, but they cannot expect to get the bonus.

Mr. THOMSON.—But the planters will have to uproot their plantations if they desire to comply with the conditions laid down by the Minister.

Mr. McCAY.—Cannot the planters get rid of the black labourer as quickly as he puts in their crops?

Mr. THOMSON.—No, they cannot get rid of the kanakas who are under engagement to them.

Mr. McCAY.—But the labourers are going off every year because they have been engaged for terms which expire at different dates.

Mr. THOMSON.—That all depends upon the size of the plantations and the periods for which they have been under cultivation. If a planter has a large area, which has been gradually brought under cultivation, his labourers will probably have been engaged from time to time as the work has increased. Therefore he may be in a position to gradually substitute white labour for black. With smaller men, however, who would probably have engaged the whole of their labourers in one batch, the process of conversion would not be so easy. I see no reason why the bonus should not be given to the man who takes off his crop from start to finish by means of white labour.

Mr. KINGSTON.—From the planting.

Mr. THOMSON.—No; I mean for the whole period occupied in bringing the crop to maturity after the previous crop was gathered. The one planting may suffice for half-a-dozen crops. Would the Minister say that the production of a crop of fruit is to be regarded as commencing with the planting of the trees?

Mr. KINGSTON.—If you do not plant trees you do not get fruit.

Mr. THOMSON.—I admit that the crop is the result of the planting of the trees and of the soil in which the trees are planted. But it would be ridiculous to say that a man should be compelled to go back to the planting operation in connexion with the production of any one crop out of several crops which the one planting will yield. We should allow those who genuinely desire to employ white labour to obtain the benefits conferred by the Act without compelling them to uproot their crops. One planting of cane will last, perhaps, as long as seven years, and several crops may be gathered; and I think, therefore, that the full purpose of Parliament will be served if the crop of cane from one harvesting to the next is handled entirely by white labour. Sometimes from sixteen to 24 months are occupied in maturing a crop of cane. It was astonishing to me to hear the Treasurer pleading so strongly yesterday for something more than

I am now advocating. It was the something more that I objected to. I disliked the proposal to give the Minister power year by year to fix the date in such a way that the bonus might be given in respect to crops upon which white labour might have been employed for only three or four months.

Mr. SALMON.—Is the honorable member in favour of giving the bonus to those who planted their crops by means of black labour since 1902?

Mr. THOMSON.—I am in favour of any crop which from the previous cutting has been entirely handled by white labour receiving the benefit of the bonus.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That would cover a period of only six months.

Mr. THOMSON.—No; crops occupy more than six months in coming to maturity. A little less time may be taken in northern Queensland; but, in the larger sugar districts, sixteen or eighteen months, or sometimes two years is required.

Mr. FISHER.—That is by what is called "stand over" cane.

Mr. BAMFORD.—No; it is planting cane to which the honorable member is referring.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes. I am prepared to support the honorable member for Wide Bay in his contention that the bonus should be paid upon any crop that has been wholly cultivated by means of white labour. As to the other proposal of the Minister which is really intended to absolve him from the consequences of a breach of the Act, I need only say that if we come to the conclusion that the bonus is to apply to all cane from the original planting right onwards, that is what we decided long ago, and there is no reason to alter it.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—I do not regard the alteration of the date for registration as practically material, because nothing is material in politics when it is done, and cannot be undone. Whatever may be said with regard to the administration of the Minister for Trade and Customs, Parliament must condone his action. I do not speak on this occasion simply because the sugar-growers in my electorate are specially interested in this question. It is generally believed that sugar-growers are rather more selfish than other producers, but the planters in New South Wales, although they had as large a work to perform, in comparison with the area under cane, as those in Queensland, took advantage of the offer of the Federal Government almost at once. I do not claim any special credit for them, because they had the command of more white labour than could be secured immediately by the growers of Queensland.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That is an open question.

Mr. EWING.—Perhaps so. Further, the Queensland sugar-growers were more hampered by the legal and binding obligations into which they had entered in connexion with the employment of coloured labourers. These facts made it more difficult for them to secure immediately the benefits offered under our legislation, and therefore I hope they will be treated fairly and honestly. Some honorable members may have no interest in the sugar industry, but every one on this side of the Chamber is concerned in the intelligent administration of the Government which he supports. We are interested in seeing that the Minister acts in accordance with what we believe to be the spirit and intention of the legislation we have passed, and therefore every man who desires to bring into existence as speedily as possible a white Australia will vote against the Minister for Trade and Customs on this occasion. The honorable member for Herbert acted indiscreetly, although I am sure with perfect honesty, when he stated yesterday that some dishonest practices had been followed in connexion with the sugar rebates. We know that some people who should have known better acted in a way that, although perhaps within the law, was morally wrong. That might be a serious charge to make against the administration if it could not be made with equal truth in connexion with every law. There has never been a law passed that has not carried in its train the certainty that some one would evade it. We are continually amending our laws, because men succeed in evading their provisions, and the law regarding the sugar rebates has suffered only in the same way. Only a small amount was involved in the frauds, which may be regarded as the natural outcome of the enactment of such legislation. It might have been better if those honorable members who have a full knowledge of the industry had accepted the suggestion made last evening by the honorable member for North Sydney, to make the bonus applicable to the crop; the term crop being subsequently defined by regulation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—By definition in the Bill.

Mr. EWING.—The right honorable member says—"By definition in the Bill." To that there can be no objection. The whole matter has originated in a want of political rectitude on the part of the Opposition. I make that statement because vice discovers kindred vice, and if the Opposition had not been inclined to many acts of evil administration—

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable member must not discuss that matter.

Mr. EWING.—By his ruling, the Chairman says in effect that, to be in order, it is not sufficient for a statement to be true, so I will not discuss that aspect of the case. Under our Constitution, it is presumed that a man who obtains high office in a Government is worthy of public trust. If he be not fit to administer an Act of this description, he is not fit for his position. This debate had its origin in a declaration by the Opposition that they would not trust any Minister for Trade and Customs to administer the payment of this rebate. But if a Minister is not to be trusted in that respect, how can he be trusted with the control of the vast trade of Australia? Is a man who might within twelve months make a fortune which would place him beyond any financial danger for the period of his natural life—and that is the position of any Minister for Trade and Customs—not to be trusted? It is much to the honour of the Minister that his pockets are not bubbling over with coin. Similarly it is to the credit of our public men that very few of them have made anything out of politics.

Mr. PAGE.—Why all this "skite?"

Mr. EWING.—It is not "skite." The honorable member for Maranoa may think it is, because I have employed language which he may not appreciate. My vocabulary does not permit of the use of the word "skite," though I possibly may have a vague idea of what it means. The honorable member for North Sydney was absolutely wrong in his contention, and that is the root of the whole trouble. He knows very well that a man who is fit to control the administration of the Customs Department of Australia, who is honest enough to deal openly and fairly—as I believe every occupant of that office will—with the whole trading community, is surely competent—

Mr. THOMSON.—No one has said anything to the contrary.

Mr. EWING.—The honorable member declared that we should always be careful to incorporate in our laws exactly the procedure intended.

Mr. THOMSON.—I said that when we could express our meaning we should do so. I was not alluding to the Minister for Trade and Customs in that connexion, but to Ministers generally.

Mr. EWING.—The honorable member knows that we cannot put such a provision in our law. We must leave the honest administration of any Act to the Ministerial head of the particular Department concerned. The ramifications of the matter under discussion are so great, and the incidental difficulties so certain to recur year after year, that no one, save a trusted Minister, and one who is fully seized of the whole circumstances of the case, can possibly deal with it.

Mr. THOMSON.—I was replying to the proposal of the Treasurer to place certain options in the hands of the Minister. Now the Minister says that he objects to those options.

Mr. EWING.—I quite agree that the Minister for Trade and Customs is a little worse than is the honorable member at this particular juncture. We were able to convert the honorable member last night, but we have to start afresh to-day with the Minister for Trade and Customs. With regard to the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, I admit at once the difficulties of the situation. When once a cane crop has been placed in the ground, it will last for a considerable period. If that crop has been once touched by black labour, after the date specified in the Excise Tariff Act, it is tabooed for all time.

Mr. McCAY.—But the growers have had full warning given to them.

Mr. EWING.—That is so. But suppose that a man has 100 acres of cane planted, and is employing a certain number of coloured labourers under contract. It may not be possible for him to immediately dispense with their services. Even though he may be anxious to obtain the bonus which is offered, he cannot get rid of them. Therefore we must either be absolutely unjust to him, even though he desires to subsequently take advantage of the provisions of the Act, or the people of Australia must do a little more than they are legally entitled to do. I believe that, in the interests of a white Australia, it is better that they should go a little further than they are technically bound to rather than delay the opportunity for the employment of white labour. If we do not allow any sugar-grower to participate in the bonus granted under this Bill who has used black labour after the specified date, what will be the result? At the end of 1907 we probably shall have as many coloured alien-working in Queensland as there are to-day. Of course, a man could deal with an ordinary crop, such as wheat.

Mr. THOMSON.—Or with beet.

Mr. EWING.—Yes, there would be no trouble in that case. There are at least 8,000 kanakas in Queensland to-day. If a grower is employing 80 of these Pacific Islanders under contract he is absolutely powerless. I believe that this Parliament desires to be perfectly fair. It might suit me as a New South Welshman to selfishly hamper the Queenslanders, but as a representative of the Australian people it is my duty to see that justice is done to the Queensland grower. I believe that the honorable and learned member for Corinella takes up a similar position.

Mr. McCAY.—It does not affect my constituency.

Mr. EWING.—I am sure that it does not. When the honorable and learned member appears before his constituents and tells them that he believes it was necessary to grant the Minister certain powers in order to expedite the advent of a white Australia, even though it was certain that some growers might thereby obtain rebate upon some crops which had been previously cultivated by black labour, I am sure that they will justify his action. Let me suppose that the honorable and learned member was a sugar-grower in Northern Queensland, and had in his employ coloured labour under contract. If next year, or this year, he cut and trashed his cane with black labour, so long as that cane lasted he would, under this Bill, be prevented from participating in the bonus offered upon white-grown sugar. Does the honorable and learned member or the Committee desire that? I grant that, in many instances, the cane crops will be cut by black labour. But I hold that we can fashion this Bill in such a way that, by reasonably intelligent administration, we can overcome the difficulty thus presented. Let me suppose that some rascal in the north in an electorate other than my own made a claim for the payment of a bonus to which he was not entitled. What does it mean to the people of Australia? What would it amount to in any honorable member's electorate? The sum involved would be an infinitesimal one. I am convinced that the desire of the Committee is to insure the Bill being effective. I tell the Minister for Trade and Customs that if it passes in its present form he will be seeking an alteration of its provisions within twelve months, because we shall still have the coloured labour with us, and the reduction cannot be other than gradual. The end in view is not the payment of a small bonus. Our real object is to make it clear to the world that no black labour is to be employed in the production of sugar in Australia. The work in our industries is for our own workmen. If we have to pay a little more to secure that desirable end who will be heard to complain? I shall vote for the proposal of the honorable member for North Sydney.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It has been withdrawn.

Mr. EWING.—I am satisfied that if the honorable member is convinced that it will be supported he will submit it again. Failing the adoption of that proposal, I shall be prepared to accept any period rather than that the door shall be shut in the face of the Northern Queensland sugar-growers. I know their troubles, and that flesh and blood are involved in that industry. The abolition of the employment of black labour will be a burden for them; but keep the door open for their regeneration. Every individual possessed of a particle of manhood should make it possible for the sugar planters of Northern Queensland to aid in creating a "white Australia."

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I am convinced that the amendment submitted by the Treasurer does not place us in a more forward position than that which we formerly occupied.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It only validates what has been done by the Minister for Trade and Customs.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But I understand that the regulations which have been gazetted were intended to provide for the cases of fresh applicants for the bonus from year to year.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Only up to the specified time.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Does the Minister hold the view that no sugar-grower who is not already registered can take advantage of the provisions of the Bonus Bill?

Mr. KINGSTON.—No sugar-grower who employs black labour after the 28th February, 1903, can obtain the bonus by substituting white labour upon the same cane.

Mr. KENNEDY.—He is shut out for all time.

Mr. KINGSTON.—No; but he cannot participate in the payment of the bonus in respect of that cane.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not think that was the intention of honorable members when the Excise Tariff Act or the Pacific Islands Labourers Act was under consideration.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes. I will prove that point by quoting from a speech which was delivered on 11th of February, 1902.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There was a date fixed in 1902.

Mr. CONROY.—There was a date fixed subsequent to the 28th February of that year.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable and learned member refers to a date after which advantage could be taken of the bonus provided. It was never suggested that planters who desired to substitute white for black labour subsequent to 1902, and who employed coloured labour for two or three years, say, up to 1904, should be ineligible to claim the rebate.

Mr. CONROY.—The Minister for Trade and Customs put the matter very clearly, as will be seen by reference to Hansard.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That never entered my mind, and I listened attentively to the whole discussion. I never thought for one moment that a planter who employed black labour during 1902, and who, when the conditions under which he was compelled to use that labour ceased to operate, substituted white labour, would be debarred from taking advantage of the rebate. I always understood that the regulations were simply provided to enable planters to come under the provisions from year to year; but now we are told that they are debarred unless they are practically registered as growers of sugar with white labour prior to February, 1903.

Mr. McCAY.—They need not necessarily be registered, but they must be growers with white labour.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I understand the contention to be that, if they do not come under the provisions of the Bill by that date, they cannot take advantage of the rebate at any subsequent period.

Mr. THOMSON.—Not while the old roots last.

Mr. EWING.—The roots will last beyond the period of 1907.

Mr. KINGSTON.—All roots, however planted, are clear up to the 1st March, 1903.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not think it was ever contemplated that such conditions would be imposed.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes; that was specially mentioned.

Mr. MCCAY.—I understand the roots are safe to the 1st March, 1903, and that only the subsequent planting of fresh roots by black labour would debar growers from the advantage of the bonus.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The planting of roots subsequent to February, 1903, may perhaps be only a minor matter.

Mr. FISHER.—Supposing a kanaka be employed to-day on any cane, that cane cannot under any circumstances earn the bonus under the Bill.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Supposing black labour is employed during the seasons of 1903 and 1904 on cane planted prior to 1903, and that in 1904 the planter, by reason of the expiration of the contract with the kanakas, proposes to utilize white labour, is he to be debarred from taking advantage of the bonus?

Mr. THOMSON.—He is so debarred under this Bill.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not think that was ever contemplated. Planters have contracts with black labourers, and when the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill was before us, an extension for a considerable number of years was provided, in order to allow those contracts to expire. I can quite understand that for many reasons planters could not dispense satisfactorily with kanaka labour while those contracts existed; but it was never argued that planters so circumstanced should be denied privileges granted to other planters. I still adhere to the idea which I put forward yesterday, and which has been elaborated by the honorable member for North Sydney to-day, that, provided all the business of cultivation of one season's crop, and the cutting and carrying to the mill, be done by white labour, the bonus should be paid. It is simply making an absurdity of the Bill if we exclude from its advantages planters who are compelled to retain black labour for some time after 1903, but who, when circumstances permit, propose to have their work done by white labour.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—When I referred to the danger of making an alteration in the legislation already passed, I referred to two other Acts closely allied. I find, on reference to Hansard, that the Prime Minister, in speaking on the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill, said—

... that the question of the treatment of the sugar industry was so closely interwoven with the fiscal question that I could not ask honorable members to go on to debate a Bill which dealt, however comprehensively, with only one part of the question, and that I must ask them to suspend their judgment until they knew what the Tariff provisions were, as well as the proposals with regard to the employment of kanakas. . . . Therefore I ask honorable members to form their own judgment upon what I shall lay before them, and to form their own judgment upon this Bill with only one reservation—namely, that the Bill stands not alone, but the Bill and the support to the industry which must inevitably be given by the Tariff must be taken and must be read together.

I read this extract in order to show that the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill was incorporated with the Excise Tariff Act; and when we find three other measures were also involved, I do not think it right on the part of Parliament to attempt to make any alteration in the arrangement then entered into. The Bonus Bill ought to be simply what it was intended to be in the first place—merely an alteration in the method of paying the excise; and it would be far better, no matter what the views of honorable members may be, to keep to the original arrangement. Some honorable members have stated that it was not the intention of this House at the time that there should be any such difference as has now been made; and I need only refer to the honorable member for Herbert, who, in speaking on the Tariff in February, 1902, said—

The Minister for Trade and Customs has already affirmed the principle that after this month there will be no possibility of its being increased to any great extent. He has said that those desiring to grow cane by white labour only must register this month, and that if they do not they will not be entitled to claim a rebate.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That is not quite so—if they start fresh.

Mr. FISHER.—For this year.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Certainly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Do the last two interjections not alter the whole effect?

Mr. CONROY.—I think not. The honorable member, continuing, said—

That was the impression conveyed to me by the Minister, and I am pleased to hear that he does not adhere to that opinion.

My reading of those extracts is that the Minister for Trade and Customs stated then what he states now—that it was not his intention, except where the planting—which is the most important part of the work—was done by white labour, to allow the rebate. We are not proposing to interfere with people who choose to employ black labour; we only say that if the cane has not been planted by white labour the bonus cannot be claimed. The honorable member for Herbert will bear me out that the chief work lies in the planting, and that some time has to elapse before there is any return, so that there are many reasons why a rebate of £2 per ton should be asked for. If it had been proposed that a bonus should be given merely on the growing crop, I am sure it would not have been fixed at £2 per ton, or at 4s. per ton of cane, the latter of which actually amounts to more than the cost of cultivating, cutting, and crushing.

Mr. EWING.—Does the honorable and learned member really believe that?

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member for Richmond knows that it does not cost £2 per acre, taking the average yield at ten tons of cane, to pay the cost of the work I have indicated.

Mr. EWING.—What does it cost to cut the cane only?

Mr. CONROY.—I have known it to cost as much as 5s. and as little as 2s.

Mr. EWING.—What is the average?

Mr. CONROY.—That depends upon the crop. I have known 70 tons of cane to the acre, and in other cases only 15 tons, and surely the latter would not be cut at the same rate as the former. My statements in these respects are borne out by the statistics of Mr. Coghlan. During the Tariff debate, in February, 1902, the Minister for Trade and Customs said—

It is difficult to differentiate in regard to conditions, and ascertain whether black labour has been employed. We solve the question as liberally as we can, and say—“(to on; there is the rebate after this time, and so long as you get rid of the black labour before the 1st March, you will be equally entitled to it; we shall not cast against you what you have done in the transition stage.”

The right honorable gentleman had previously said—

What we say to a grower is—“If you do not employ black labour after the 28th February, we will not count the employment of black labour before that date against you in considering the question of rebate.”

Mr. THOMSON.—I thought that referred to the crops.

Mr. CONROY.—No; taken in conjunction with what he said to the honorable member for Herbert, it is clear that the Minister for Trade and Customs meant that if the planters started afresh they were entitled to the rebate, and he says so now.

Mr. FISHER.—When?

Mr. CONROY.—On the production of the cane.

Mr. CAMERON.—That must include the planting.

Mr. CONROY.—Quite so, or otherwise the bonus would not have been as high as £2 per ton. The period is extended to the 28th of February of this year, and if white labour then is substituted for black labour, it is contended that the planter in the case of crops, the cutting of which may even now have started, shall be paid the bonus although white labour will be utilized for only some four months? If the proposed alteration is made, such a state of things would be possible; and this shows the undesirability of departing from the original compact. The Pacific Islands Labourers Act, the Excise Tariff Act, and this Bonus Bill are all interwoven, and no one of them should be altered unless honorable members are given an opportunity of dealing with the remainder. It is impossible to say exactly what influenced honorable members in supporting those measures, but, as they were passed as a whole, no one of them should be amended without an opportunity being given to reconsider the others.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the honorable member believe in ploughing out?

Mr. CONROY.—No; but I do not believe in a man who has not grown his cane wholly with white labour getting a bonus of £2 per ton for it. The statement of the Minister for Trade and Customs in regard to the provision in the Excise Tariff Act was clear and emphatic. He said that no grower would be entitled to a bonus unless he employed white labour only after the date therein specified.

Mr. A. PATERSON.—What are the planters who have lost all their kanakas to do in regard to the next crop?

Mr. CONROY.—It may be that no provision was made to meet their case. It seems to be forgotten, however, that there is a difference of £3 per ton between the excise and import duties on sugar. In one year the production of sugar in Queensland reached 194,000 tons, but, taking the average production at 120,000 tons, that difference means a loss of £360,000 a year to the Commonwealth. If the payment of such a sum annually does not offer sufficient inducement for the employment of white labour only in the cane-fields, it is almost a pity that we have any rich sugar lands at all. We should be better off if the land was barren, because then we should not have to pay the planters the amount I have named. Even if I were a supporter of the Ministry, I should oppose any amendment of the measure in the manner suggested. All we were asked to do when the Bill was introduced was to agree to the substitution of one manner of payment for another. Had I known, when the second reading was moved, that the alteration now suggested would be proposed, I would have raised the question then, and no doubt there would have been a long discussion upon it. The position would be different if the Ministry came forward and said—"The Minister for Trade and Customs, who does not allow any one else to make a mistake without fining him for it, has made a mistake himself, and as certain men have been misled by that mistake, and have altered their methods of cultivation, we ask honorable members to agree to an alteration of the original arrangement." But, even in that case, I should have opposed the alteration. I ask if it is fair that growers who from the first have employed white labour only, in order to obtain the concession granted by the Excise Tariff Act, should now be put on the same footing as those who have hitherto utilized black labour? I cannot conceive of anything more unfair. The Ministry are fast becoming advocates for the employment of black labour. They virtually tell the House that they intend to take advantage of their majority to place growers who employ black labour upon a level with those who employ white labour only. If we agree to the proposed alteration of the compact contained in the measures to which I have alluded, our action may in some future Parliament be taken as a precedent. I know that the protectionist party do not want to see any alteration of the Tariff; and, no doubt, if it were proposed to alter the sugar duties, the members of that party would say that we should not break a compact which was solemnly entered into by members on both sides of the House. But the force of that argument would disappear if it could be shown that an alteration was made in the compact by the very Parliament whose members passed the Acts originally creating it. I hope that no change will be made.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—The Government are undoubtedly to blame for this lengthy discussion, because of the manner in which they have brought the subject before us. The Minister for Trade and Customs seems to have been very much in the dark about the whole question from the very first. Last night the Treasurer pleaded hard with the Committee to empower the Minister to fix a date each year after which only white labour could be employed in the production of sugar-cane entitled to a bonus. His proposed amendment practically empowered the Government, as was pointed out by the honorable member for North Sydney and others, to grant bonuses to growers who employed white labour for only a few months in the production of a crop. But that was not the original intention of Parliament, nor was it the desire of the people. Now, however, the Minister for Trade and Customs takes a different attitude, and tells us that he will not depart from the original arrangement, beyond altering the date specified in the Excise Tariff Act to the 28th February, 1903. The Act fixed the date as the 28th February, 1902, and the Minister issued a regulation which was ultra vires, altering it to the 28th February, 1903. Now he tells us, in a perfectly nonchalant manner, that the mistake was a mere nothing, and that he was not aware that he was acting ultra vires. What should we say to him for such a confession, after his attitude towards the public in connexion with the mistakes which have occurred under the administration of another Act? Shall we tell him, as he has told others, that he had a right to know what was in the Act, and should not make mistakes? That if the officers of his department are not competent to advise him better, he should employ men who are competent? That he should not sweat his officers or use boys in knickerbockers who might be expected to make mistakes, but should avail himself of the services of men who are sufficiently well paid to be able to perform the work required of them? If no excuse could be made for the mistakes which have been committed by others in connexion with the administration of the Customs Act, what excuse can be made for the Minister in this instance? It only shows how fallible human nature is. The question with which we have to deal is, how far shall we go in offering inducements to planters to abandon black labour and to use white labour? I am willing, as I have been from the first, to make considerable concessions to effect that object. I still think that we should give all the inducement and assistance we can to planters to secure the substitution of white for black labour. But having thought the matter over very carefully, I cannot offer anything better than the suggestion which I made last night for an amendment of the clause, providing that a planter who intends to apply for a bonus shall register his intention twelve months before. That would give the Department an opportunity to instruct its officers to watch his plantation to see that no black labour is employed on it. If a man does not register, the Department is not asked to exercise any supervision, but whenever a planter registers he will intimate to the Department that for twelve months before the delivery of his crop he intends to use white labour only, and its officers will then have to see that he carries out his promise. From what I have learned about the cultivation of sugar cane, the season during which the cane is cut lasts for five or six months—from July to December. If we adopt the crop to crop principle, we shall extend the period, which might range from six to perhaps eighteen months. By accepting the twelve months' period, however, we shall call upon the planters who have decided to employ white labour to register, and then the organization of the Department will be brought into operation, and safeguards may be taken against any evasion of the Act. I hope that honorable members will show that they are ready to afford every opportunity to the planters to effect the change from black to white labour, and that they will frame the necessary provisions in a liberal spirit. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa said that some planters had given up black labour and had employed nothing but white labour from the very outset, and that, therefore, it would be unjust to such men to offer special facilities to those who had delayed making the change. But those who gave up black labour immediately our legislation came into force were, in 99 cases out of 100, in such a position that they could get along with white labour as well as with black. That applies very largely to the New South Wales planters, who had not entered into any contracts for the supply of black labour, and did not require to keep the kanakas for any specified time. As we go further north the black labour trouble is intensified, as was well known to honorable members when the Bills relating to the employment of kanaka labour upon the sugar plantations were under discussion. We knew then that many of the planters had entered into contracts for the employment of kanaka labourers in numbers varying from perhaps ten to 200 or 300, and that they could not get rid of them for some considerable time, the unexpired period of engagement ranging from perhaps six months to three years. As our object is to replace black labour with white as soon as possible, I think we should allow planters, whenever their contracts for black labour expire, to take advantage of the inducements offered for the employment of white labour. If we make it necessary for planters to register when they desire to start the employment of white labour, and we at the same time prevent them from obtaining a bonus until twelve months after the date of registration, we shall provide all the necessary safeguards. I can see no reason why, if a man has planted his fields with black labour and has filled them with black labour, we should say to him "No; you must plough out all you have done, and plant over again." That would involve a needless and wasteful destruction of national wealth. In dealing with this very difficult matter of policy, I think we can afford to treat with justice, if not with liberality, those planters who are willing under the policy we have adopted to get rid of the kanakas at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—In discussing this question last night, I said I would adhere closely to clause 2 as it was then printed. I meant to include the regulation under which the time had been extended until the 1st March, 1903. I had no desire to nullify anything done in that regard. As I was instrumental in bringing about that extension under the regulations, I should have stultified myself if I had taken up any other attitude. The honorable member for Richmond has taken some credit to himself for being able to speak from a disinterested point of view. I stand in an even stronger position than does the honorable member in that regard, because I represent the whole of the North Queensland sugar districts. I think that the electors in my district are more interested than are the sugar planters in the northern districts of New South Wales; therefore the attitude I take up is simply and solely in support of the white Australia policy. I think that, perhaps, the honorable and learned member for Werriwa was right when he stated that the regulations adopted in the first instance should have been adhered to. At that time, however, I thought some extension should have been granted, and one that was conceded from the 28th February to 31st March, 1902, was subsequently extended to the following September, and again until March of this year. Therefore every opportunity has been given to those who wished to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That extension was more as regards the registration of claims. It was not an extension of the period for employing black labour, but an extension of the time for registrations.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Exactly. When Federal legislation was contemplated in regard to the employment of kanakas in Queensland, a number of planters immediately sent away to the islands, and obtained all the recruits they could absorb, their object being to render nugatory, as far as possible, the legislation passed by us. Many of the planters considered they were very smart, but now they are sorry, because they say it is difficult to get rid of their black labour. It has been stated that this position was never contemplated when the Act was passed, but the contrary may be proved by a reference to Hansard, because provision was made that kanakas might be retained upon one part of a plantation, whilst another portion was being worked by white labour. The argument to which I have referred was raised in opposition to what was considered a drastic regulation, and it was then stated that the division of the plantations would be allowed. As a matter of fact, a number of plantations are being worked partly by white labour and partly by black labour, the operations of each class of labour being restricted to different portions of the same plantation. A number of the kanakas now working on the plantations of Queensland were got rid of by their original employers, but they have remained there for many years and have been re-engaged. The Polynesian Labourers Act provides that when the kanakas have served for three years they may be re-engaged for a period of not less than six months, but many of the islanders who now find employment on the plantations are not under any engagement. This is in violation of the State Acts, because, with the exception of 600 or 700 to whom exemption tickets were granted, all of them should be under engagement to some one occupied in tropical agriculture. As a matter of fact, some of the planters have done everything they could to defeat the object of the Pacific Islands Labourers Act. If we adopt the proposal to grant the bonus for cane produced by white labour employed for the whole of any season—I am not speaking about the proposal to fix a period of twelve months—it will be possible for planters to carry on their work with kanakas right up to the cutting of the cane and then register, employing white labour for the cane-cutting. It would be possible for the same planter to again revert to black labour, and once more register his plantation under the Act. The weakness of that proposal lies in the fact that it contains no provision that a man who once registers as an employer of white labour, and afterwards reverts to black labour, shall not be allowed to again register so that he may become entitled to the bonus.

Mr. THOMSON.—That would not apply if a twelve months' period were fixed.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Yes it would. If the twelve months' period is adopted a stipulation should be made that in all cases where black labour has been reverted to the planter shall not be allowed to again register as an employer of white labour. If the Minister is willing to accept a suggestion of that kind I shall not oppose the adoption of the twelve months' period, although, if the Committee divides, I shall certainly support the clause as it stands. I do not know whether the honorable member for Wide Bay has been approached by the farmers in his district, but the question of affording further facilities for claiming the rebate has never been raised in my electorate. The farmers there were perfectly satisfied. In the first place they did not expect any bonus, and in the second place they did not expect an extension of the time for nearly thirteen months. That came to them as something in the shape of a boon that was never contemplated. I gave them to understand, when I interceded on their behalf with the Minister, that I would not do so upon any future occasion, and I think it will be a mistake for the Government to go any further. The position taken up by the opponents of the clause appear to me somewhat illogical. They say that some of the planters cannot get rid of their kanakas, but if all the planters registered, what would become of the kanakas? As a matter of fact, many of the kanakas have expressed a desire to be sent back to the islands, and I believe the Queensland Government is willing to allow their agreements to be cancelled if the kanakas and employers are alike agreeable, but the planters have stood in the way. They have obstructed the operation of the Pacific Islands Labourers Act all the time. One notable instance of this is to be found in the case of the Mulgrave Central Mill, the capital outlay in connexion with which was met by the Government. At the time the Pacific Islands Labourers Act was passing through this House, the proprietors of the mill indentured 250 boys, and are now, in contravention of the State Act, hiring them out to the farmers in the district. This was done with the intention of obstructing the white Australian movement as far as possible. I do not think that I need say any more upon this question. If the Government accept the amendment which the honorable member for North Sydney has outlined, I shall not oppose it. At the same time I certainly think that a good deal of consideration is required before it is accepted. To my mind, its adoption will be tantamount to taking a step in the dark, and, upon the whole, I think it would be better if the clause were accepted with the extension to 1903 proposed by the Treasurer.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—I should not have spoken upon this matter but for the remarks of the honorable member for Herbert. It seems to me that he is inclined to punish those who are endeavouring to carry out the desire of the people to secure a white Australia. It would be very hard indeed if persons who are loyally assisting in the accomplishment of that great object are to be punished because those interested in the Mulgrave Central Mill, and others, who for 20 or 30 years past have been strenuously opposed to that policy, are to be allowed to defeat it. A good deal has been said by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa in favour of the payment of the bonus being limited to cane which has not been handled by other than white labour since 28th February, 1902. I think that his arguments in that connexion have been well refuted by the honorable member for North Sydney, the honorable member for Richmond, and the honorable member for Wide Bay, and their contentions have not been confounded by the quotations made from the speech delivered by the Minister for Trade and Customs last session, in which he informed the House that, after the date mentioned, the rebate should be payable only upon sugar which had been grown by white labour from the commencement. The point in dispute is as to what constitutes that commencement. Are we to regard it as the period when—after the harvesting of one crop—the next crop shows above the ground, or are we to calculate it from the planting of the cane? I hold that the contention of the honorable member for North Sydney and the honorable member for Richmond is correct, and that the beginning of the production of a crop, so far as the provisions of this Act are concerned—

Mr. CONROX.—Can the honorable member plant a crop of cane in cleared ground for less than £5 per acre?

Mr. WILKINSON.—The contention of those who are opposed to the employment of white labour on the Queensland sugar plantations has always been that the work, which the honorable and learned member for Werriwa declares constitutes the great bulk of the labour there can be done by white men. The opponents of the adoption of a white Australia policy have ever argued that white men could plough the land and plant the cane, but that when it grew up into a jungle and the breezes were shut out from it white labour was unsuitable. But the little experience which we have had of the operation of the Excise Tariff Act demonstrates that white men have gone into the cane, cut it, and earned the rebate for the planters. We shall be doing an injustice to growers who are employing kanakas under contract for a term of years if we prevent them from participating in the payment of the bonus proposed under this Bill. In the position occupied by some of them, they are unable to get rid of the kanakas, although they may be very willing to take advantage of the provisions of the Act at a later stage.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member desires to give them a bonus for the employment of black labour when there is no occasion for it.

Mr. WILKINSON.—The honorable and learned member for Werriwa is distorting the facts. The honorable member for Richmond put the position very fairly. Let us take the case of a man who employed black labour for two years prior to the passing of the Excise Tariff Act. In the firm belief that the industry cannot be carried on without the aid of black labour, he may have sold his plantation to an individual who entertains quite an opposite belief. The latter may evidence his belief by employing white labour only from the moment that he assumes control of the plantation. Is it fair to shut him out from the bonus provisions of this Bill? The feeling of the House at the time the anti-alien legislation was under consideration was that there should be a gradual change in the conditions offered to the sugar-planters. It was known that under the Polynesian Labourers Act of Queensland, the engagements of the kanakas would not terminate for a number of years. Consequently we allowed a certain proportion of those who were deported from the Commonwealth to be re-introduced up till 1904. From that period onward, no more are to be permitted to enter the Commonwealth, and after 1906, those who can be deported without cruelty or injustice are to be so deported. These facts show clearly that the Legislature contemplated bringing about the new conditions without inflicting hardship upon the kanakas and without doing injury to the industry itself. I do not think that any honorable member has a higher opinion of the desire of the Minister for Trade and Customs to do justice to every industry in Australia than I have, but at the same time he seems to me to be not acting generously in this matter. Having regard to the great object to be achieved, namely, the cultivation of sugar by white labour only, I shall be obliged to support an amendment on the lines of that suggested by the honorable member for North Sydney.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—May I ask the Treasurer as an act of courtesy to withdraw his amendment, in order that I may move a prior one?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Certainly.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—I move—

That, after the word "employed," line 4, sub-clause (2), the following words be inserted:—"For a period of twelve months immediately preceding the delivery thereof for manufacture."

I think that this proposal will overcome the difficulties which have been pointed out by honorable members upon both sides of the Chamber. It will get rid of the absurdity of requiring cane to be rooted up for no earthly reason whatever. It will also offer an inducement to the planters to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill so soon as their present engagements with the kanakas permit. Further, it will definitely settle the intentions of Parliament so that there will be no necessity for the framing of regulations antagonistic to the measure, in order to effect what the Minister thinks is desirable. For these reasons and for others which have been given during the course of the debate, I hold that it would be only fair and just to allow planters who are anxious to fulfil the conditions which we impose an opportunity of doing so. Surely we are not going to make the mere touching of sugar-cane by black labour at some previous period a bar to a bonus upon every crop from that root. Such a proceeding would be ridiculous. It would constitute an injustice to the growers, besides tending to discourage them. In some instances the roots of the cane have necessarily been planted by black labour, and under the Government proposal, to enable the grower to claim the bonus, he would have to deliberately destroy those roots—destroy the value attached to previous planting, simply to replant.

Mr. CAMERON.—For the sake of getting the bonus.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes.

Mr. CAMERON.—But the Excise Tariff Act was passed subsequent to the planting.

Mr. THOMSON.—I agree with the honorable member that there should be no alteration in the Act. If there is to be no alteration, it is undesirable to re-open a question which has previously been settled. But when an alteration is proposed—as it has been—we should see that a reasonable and fair provision is substituted and that an amendment is not made which is less satisfactory than the amendment that is now submitted. The honorable member for Herbert has said that he is quite willing to accept that amendment as a compromise. That honorable member represents a northern sugar district, and he, together with the honorable member for Wide Bay and other representatives of Queensland, have spoken in favour of the amendment. The same remark may be made of the honorable member for Richmond, who also represents a sugar district, and I think there are other honorable members who, like myself, are not, as members, interested in this industry, but who see reason, when we are making an alteration, of doing what is fair and reasonable, so as not to prejudice the intention of the Act we are seeking to amend.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs).—I trust the amendment will not be carried. I have listened with a good deal of interest to what has been said, especially to what has fallen from the honorable member for Herbert. I speak in some degree from my own experience recently when I say that an alteration of the basis of the payment of the rebate is not to any extent expected or desired by the people of Queensland. I venture to think that the House of Representatives has already dealt very generously with Queensland in the matter of the sugar rebate; and I am not speaking without my book, because, time and again, I have been thanked for the action of the Government in this respect. As to the fixing of the amounts to be allowed per ton of cane, and as to the latest concession to which I referred, I say that the Government have fully anticipated the wishes of Queensland. Let us keep to the basis of the purchase of a white Australia. There is a good deal to be said in favour of that position. We dealt with this matter comprehensively in the earlier stages of our Federal history, when we had before us the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill, and we dealt with each measure separately, but with each from the point of view of the other. Is it fair, when a Bill is introduced simply for the purpose of taking the money from another source, and removing a slight disability to which the States were previously subject—but which was fixed plainly enough—to ask that the basis should be further altered to the detriment of other States which were parties to the bargain?

Mr. THOMSON.—That is what the Minister himself is asking for.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Surely not. The Government are asking that the Bill as amended in the way we have indicated may be passed; and to seize this opportunity for altering the basis is not, in my opinion, fair. We provided as clearly as possible that the way in which to earn the bonus was to employ white labour from the very first. We had the regulation before us long ago, and it provides in the clearest possible language that white-grown cane means cane in respect of which white labour has been employed from and including the preparation of the ground for planting, up to and including the delivery at the mill for manufacture. Honorable members know perfectly well that the understanding was that black labour must have nothing to do with the cane wherever it was possible to dispense with it. We simply made an express provision which we believed to be fair and right under existing conditions. We were legislating in 1901 for something to happen in 1902, and we told the planters that so long as they did not employ black labour after February or March, 1902, they could earn the rebate. We have now extended the period to 1903.

Mr. CAMERON.—The Government were wrong in doing that.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I think the action then taken was justified, there being a number of hard cases in which it was represented there had been no time to make arrangements. When the honorable member for North Sydney talks about it being necessary to up-root cane planted by black labour, he knows well that if the Bill be carried in the form proposed by the Government, not one root planted prior to March last will be affected. All such cane is protected, and in respect of it a rebate can be earned. What more is wanted? It is only in regard to cane which has been planted within the last three months, or since March last, that the Bill does not make provision for a bonus. If a planter has not employed black labour during the last three months he is qualified to earn the bonus, so that there is not the slightest necessity to talk about uprooting the cane. It is admitted that the great cost is in connexion with the preparation of the ground for tilling and planting—that the cost of cutting and carting at the annual harvesting is comparatively small. I do not care to remind honorable members of utterances on the other side, but it was pointed out by the honorable and learned member for Parkes—and I know his words are sufficiently well founded—that the cost of the harvesting is little compared with the initial cost.

Mr. THOMSON.—What does the Minister call the "initial cost?"

Mr. KINGSTON.—The cost of preparing the ground for the tilling and planting of the cane. The result of the proposed amendment, if carried, will be that instead of having white labour, employed, as we desire, on the most important part of the work—that of the planting, with which it is not disputed white labour is perfectly competent to deal—we shall have black labour, and the planter at his own sweet will and pleasure, when little or nothing remains to be done, will substitute white men and collect the bonus. There is no question of liberality involved now; the people of Queensland admit that the Government have been liberal, and they desire no more. Let us now be just and pay some attention to the requirements of the other States. The Government are proposing what is fairly justified by the circumstances. By the provisions of the Excise Bill it was found that the cost was falling on the consuming States; and we are now taking the burden on ourselves willingly and freely enough, and Queensland does not demand any further concessions. Of course it is difficult for some honorable members to resist voting for the amendment, but, as I say, the generosity to Queensland has surely gone far enough. Let us be just to other States, and not depart from the principle of the Bill. If we do make the departure proposed, it will be possible for a planter to have black labour to-day and white labour to-morrow; and where is the consistency of such a position? The amendment proposes a change from a system which can be defended, and under which white labour is necessary from the first to the last—with merely the exceptions rendered necessary by existing circumstances, and inseparable from the initiatory stages—to a system of a hybrid character, which I hope will not be accepted.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—There is no doubt that the Government, and especially the Minister for Trade and Customs, have been thanked for the action taken by them in reference to the sugar industry in Queensland and New South Wales. The honorable member for Herbert this afternoon said that the large planters in Queensland expected nothing and got something; but that is no reason, or at any rate not a good reason, for our doing something which would militate against the purpose we have in view. I am sure the wish of every one here is to promote the settlement of white men where black men are now employed, and I submit respectfully to the Minister that his proposal does not facilitate that change in the way that the amendment of the honorable member for North Sydney would do. I rather regret the last sentence or two of the Minister for Trade and Customs, who in them conveyed the idea that the rest of Australia is doing a great thing for Queensland. We ought to remember that Queensland, knowing that it would lose a good deal, generously came into the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON.—All I can say is that we are losing a good deal by this sugar business.

Mr. FISHER.—As to the preparation of the ground, it ought to be known that it is against the State law of Queensland for kanakas to plough land.

Mr. KINGSTON.—A good many things are done against the law.

Mr. FISHER.—That may be; but, at any rate, the argument about the ploughing of the land falls to the ground. I am not in the least influenced by the strenuous and bitter opposition of the big planters; my object is to carry out what I believe to be a sound policy. If the wishes of Parliament are carried out the planters must substitute white labour for black, and the contention is that to this end planters ought to be allowed to qualify for the bonus from year to year. I am not in favour of any labour or capital in the land being destroyed for a mere sentimental reason; and I am sorry that the honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. Cameron, should suggest that roots planted by black labour should be uprooted and planted afresh by white labour.

Mr. CAMERON.—I never made that suggestion; I merely said that the planters must stand by what they had done.

Mr. FISHER.—It is quite evident that all honorable members had not the same idea in their minds when the original Act was passed. It never occurred to me that we were providing permanently that all registration should be made by the 28th February, 1902. I regard it as absurd to provide that all those who intend to earn the bonus should be required to register by that time.

Mr. WATSON.—Excepting those who had cultivated cane from the jump by white labour—that is, had started fresh planting in the old plantations.

Mr. FISHER.—That brings us back to the old point, that the roots must be pulled out and planting commenced de novo.

Mr. CAMERON.—All cane planted prior to the date mentioned is exempt.

Mr. FISHER.—But the planting does not cover the whole difficulty. If a single kanaka has been employed on or about the cane, the planter can receive no bonus; and there are large plantations in Northern Queensland where there is no cane grown by white labour.

Mr. BAMFORD.—And there never will be; the planters will get Chinamen as soon as the kanakas go.

Mr. FISHER.—There should be no coloured labour at all if the Commonwealth law be carried out. It is for that reason that the larger plantations should have the opportunity to begin to earn the bonus by employing white labour at the earliest moment they think convenient. What injury will be done to the Commonwealth by allowing them a bonus for cultivating and delivering for manufacture a crop grown absolutely by white labour?

Mr. KINGSTON.—They do not earn a bonus offered as an inducement for employing white labour if they employ black labour.

Mr. FISHER.—The point the Minister relies upon is that black labour may have been employed to plant the crop—that, so to speak, there is a small proportion of black labour in the roots. It would be a pity if this legislation, which I believe to be sound and generous, were partially destroyed by a blunder now. I hope, therefore, that the Committee will vote for the amendment of the honorable member for North Sydney.

Mr. WATSON.—And vary a compromise which was arrived at only a few months ago!

Mr. FISHER.—As I said before, honorable members have different facts in their minds. It never occurred to those who know something about sugar-growing that all cane-growers could register before 28th February, 1902.

Mr. CONROY.—Then the honorable member would not object to the amendment at some future time of the other two Acts which were passed in conformity with it.

Mr. FISHER.—I know that the honorable and learned member will follow whatever course he thinks is high policy, irrespective of the possibility of interfering with a compact. I do not lean heavily upon any understanding or compromise which may be said to have been arrived at. I advocate the adoption of a course which I believe to be a just one, and which will do no injury to the Commonwealth. If honorable members who represent other States fear that too much will have to be spent in bonuses, they should say so; but I do not believe that the great body of electors object to pay the price required to carry out the white Australia idea. What they are anxious for is that the carrying out of that idea shall not be endangered by the employment of a large body of kanakas in any State. I am not one of those who say that the employment of white labour will make sugar cheaper. Sugar growing is not an industry in which any man can make a fortune. A great many of those who have embarked in it have lost fortunes, and those now in it have to face difficulties as formidable as those which confront persons in any other industry. While I have a great regard for the opinions of the Minister, I firmly believe that in this instance my views are better than his, and I hope that the amendment will be carried.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—The difficulty I see is this: If the Ministry stand by their Bill, and merely provide for the substitution of a bonus for a rebate, I shall support them, and vote against the amendment. But if they are willing to depart from the sound position that no alteration at all should be made, I am placed between two fires. One honorable member has estimated that at least 30,000 acres may be affected by an alteration such as that which has been proposed by the Government, and the Treasurer estimates that the area will not be less than 10,000 acres. But, taking it at 20,000 acres, the Government alteration will cost the country at least £40,000. The financial side of this question has not been put before us. The Ministry are charged with the task of seeing that the expenditure of the Commonwealth is kept as low as possible; but now they are proposing an alteration in the law which they admit will increase their expenditure by £10,000, and may increase it by £40,000, and even by as much as £60,000. That is a very serious matter. The reasons given by the Minister for Trade and Customs why the amendment of the honorable member for North Sydney should not be accepted were extremely sound, though they tell quite as strongly against his own proposal, and we cannot consider him so stupid as not to know that. But while I am opposed to any alteration, I think that if an alteration is made, the whole matter must be fully reconsidered. Therefore, although, if the Government are prepared to stand by the Bill as it was introduced, I shall vote against the amendment of the honorable member for North Sydney, I shall feel compelled, if an alteration is to be made in any case, to vote for that amendment. Because it must be remembered that after 1904 the importation of kanakas must cease; and many of the planters will then be compelled to employ white labour because they will be unable to obtain black labour. It would be rather hard, therefore, if no provision were made for them. If an alteration is to be made, extending the period within which a bonus can be obtained, at a cost to the Commonwealth of at least £10,000, and possibly of £40,000 or even £60,000, we might as well agree to an alteration which would deal with the whole case, and adopt the amendment of the honorable member for North Sydney. But despite the fact that that amendment would meet the case if the matter had to be opened up again, I would rather see things left as they are. Still if the Government are determined to extend the period fixed in the Excise Tariff Act, I shall feel bound to vote for the amendment of the honorable member for North Sydney.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Amendment negatived.

Amendment (by Sir GEORGE TURNER) agreed to—

That the figure “2,” line 7, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the figure “3.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 9, agreed to.

Bill reported with an amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—I move—

That the standing orders be suspended so as to allow the Bill to be passed through its remaining stages this day.

I am very anxious that this Bill should be passed on to the Senate as soon as possible, and unless this course I now propose is followed, I am afraid that we shall not be able to pass the third reading until Tuesday next. If we dispose of the Bill to-day, we shall be able to forward it to the Senate almost at once, and get the second reading fixed for next Wednesday.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Report adopted.

Motion (by Sir GEORGE TURNER) proposed—

That the Bill be now read a third time.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—I desire to know whether clause 4 provides for estimating the sugar contents of the cane under a new method?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No; they are to be calculated on exactly the same principle as hitherto.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a third time.

SUGAR REBATE ABOLITION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Motion (by Sir GEORGE TURNER) proposed—

That the Bill be now read a third time.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I do not approve of the amount or form of bonus that is being provided for, but as the majority of honorable members certainly do not agree with me, I do not propose to raise any further objection, but simply place my protest on record.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a third time.

JUDICIARY BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 16th June, vide page 967):

Clause 31—

In addition to the matters in respect whereof original jurisdiction is conferred on the High Court by the Constitution, the Court shall have original jurisdiction in respect of all matters—

- (a) arising under the Constitution, or involving its interpretation;
- (b) arising under any laws made by the Parliament;
- (c) of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;
- (d) relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different States.

Provided that, with respect to matters which are by the laws of the Commonwealth required to be instituted in courts of summary jurisdiction or other courts of inferior jurisdiction, the original jurisdiction of the High Court shall not be exercised except by way of removal of the matter from the Court in which it is pending into the High Court and thereafter hearing and determining it in the High Court.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I was one of the minority who voted against the second reading of this Bill, and I very much regret the apparent determination of the Government to persevere with it in the face of the very strong volume of protest in this House as well as the opposition in the country. Having done my best to secure the defeat of the Bill, I shall now co-operate with those honorable members who desire to reduce the dimensions of the High Court scheme, and to keep it within reasonable and constitutional limits as regards expense and jurisdiction. One of the strong arguments used in favour of the Bill was that a constitutional mandate was imposed upon Parliament to vest the judicial power in a High Court, and we were reminded of the necessity of having an Australian Federal Court to harmonize the various possibly conflicting decisions of the States Courts invested with Federal jurisdiction. Now it appears that that was not the sole object sought to be achieved, because the measure on the face of it goes further than the creation of a High Court of Appeal as delineated in the Constitution. The arguments against a court of appeal pure and simple could not be so strong as against a court having original and primary jurisdiction. This Bill goes much further than could be justified by any arguments based upon urgency or upon the constitutional mandate. It is not necessary in order to create a court of appeal that we should erect a tribunal clothed with original jurisdiction. I need not remind the Attorney-General of the two great model courts of appeal which are not vested with primary or original jurisdiction such as contemplated in this Bill. The Supreme Court of the United States is not vested with primary jurisdiction except in two cases, namely, cases practically of sovereignty, in which States are parties, and actions in which the Ambassadors or representatives of foreign powers are parties. The rest of its powers and functions are exclusively those of an Appellate Court. As such, that great Court holds aloof from the preliminary contests which take place in courts of first instance. It is therefore far more competent to fulfil the functions of a Court of Appeal than is a tribunal composed of Judges who are from time to time required to engage in preliminary investigations, such as take place in courts of first instance. A Court of Appeal, pure and simple, should hold itself aloof from these preliminary contests. Then cases would come before it with the freshness and originality of a suit in which its members had taken no part. But in addition to the court in the United States we have the Canadian Court of Appeal, to which reference has been made. That is a Court of Appeal only, and does not even possess the power to deal with suits to which the provinces are parties, unless the provincial Legislatures first pass certain Acts assigning it jurisdiction. Therefore, the Supreme Court of Canada—like that of the United States—is a court of appeal pure and simple. These courts are held up to us as models, and as such they are entitled to our admiration. I hold that we ought to be quite content in erecting the High Court—if we are to have that tribunal at all—to limit its functions as far as possible to those of a Court of Appeal, and not to invest it with original jurisdiction such as is proposed. I admit that under the Constitution the High Court is ipso facto invested with a certain amount of original jurisdiction with which we are powerless to interfere.

Mr. GLYNN.—Unfortunately, those provisions were never discussed in the Convention.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Looking back at the proceedings of the Convention, I can see that a mistake was made in that respect. Of course many of us were new to the work of Constitution making, and these points were not so thoroughly considered as they might have been in the after light of experience. I say now it is to be regretted that under section 75 of the Constitution, powers were conferred upon the High Court of which we cannot divest it. But although we cannot take away from that tribunal its powers of original jurisdiction in respect of matters relating to treaties, foreign consuls, States, and the issue of writs; we can insert in this Bill a clause declaring that the High Court may remit such of these cases as it thinks fit to the States Courts. This measure contains a clause for remitter in connexion with the removal of causes, and I suggest that that provision might be utilized to indicate to the High Court that except in very extraordinary cases coming within its grant of power, it should not exercise original jurisdiction. I submit that if we desire to erect a court of appeal there is no constitutional necessity to give it additional jurisdiction, such as is proposed under this clause. I believe that the additional jurisdiction proposed can be properly exercised by the States Courts. Undoubtedly the exercise of this original jurisdiction will involve a large amount of machinery as well as a large outlay, which will make the whole tribunal loom in the eyes of the people of Australia as a tremendous expense consequent upon federation. I am anxious that at the next election the enemies of federation shall not be able to attack our institutions by pointing to an unnecessary expansion of departments or their expenditure. That is my sole desire. I am afraid that if this Bill be passed in its present form it will go forth to Australia that regardless of expense we are enacting legislation the full meaning and burden of which they will one day realize. It may be that in some States the people do not appreciate the possibilities of increased expenditure as much as they do in Victoria, which is the present seat of Government, and where naturally public criticism is more acute than it is in some of the distant States. That fact may account for greater sensitiveness to expenditure in Victoria than is to be found in some of the other States. If the Government are determined to proceed with the creation of this Court, why cannot they be satisfied with a Court limited to appellate functions?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—And the original jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Yes; a jurisdiction of which I regret we cannot divest it. I hope that litigation in respect of matters upon which the Court has original jurisdiction will be of a limited character, though if the view taken by the honorable and learned member for Indi last night be correct, namely, that every case to which the Commonwealth is a party, whether civil or criminal, may be brought before this tribunal, its functions will be vastly extended. I was not aware that it was intended to confer criminal jurisdiction upon the High Court in actions to which the Commonwealth may be a party. The words "suing or being sued," I should have thought had reference to civil cases only. But according to the honorable and learned member for Indi they extend also to criminal cases.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Other honorable members have taken the same view.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But is not that view wrong? Look at sub-section (3) of section 75 of the Constitution.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Certainly this Bill is drawn upon lines inconsistent with the view which is entertained by the honorable and learned member for Indi. I was under the impression that the words used in subsection (3) of section 75 had reference to cases in which a person was suing the Commonwealth or being sued by it in a civil suit. If the view expressed by the honorable and learned member for Indi be correct, the High Court could entertain any criminal case against the Commonwealth.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Against the Commonwealth law.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not think it is desirable to invest a court of appeal with criminal jurisdiction. Such a thing is unparalleled in the history of similar tribunals.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member does not object to the appeal in criminal cases?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Certainly not. I support that appeal.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—A State Supreme Court sits as a court of first instance.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—We are dealing now with the Federal system. The Federal Appellate Court should not be bothered or embarrassed by the exercise of criminal jurisdiction. Last night the Attorney-General suggested that the mere addition of these optional powers to the original jurisdiction of the High Court which is contemplated under section 76 of the Constitution would not increase the expense of its organization. It seems to me that it would do so; because if we confer upon the court general jurisdiction to deal with all classes of Federal cases in the first instance, it necessarily follows that we must have a certain amount of organization to carry out that jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have that already.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No. We shall not require to have in each State district registrars, sheriff's officers, marshalls, and deputies, if we do not confer this original jurisdiction. But if we invest the court with this primary jurisdiction, we must make provision in every State for the issue of writs, we must establish offices and appoint officers to issue writs and conduct all the processes of the courts. That cannot be done without expense. We must also provide officers to carry out the various decrees of the court, whereas if we constitute merely a court of appeal there will be no occasion to provide all these outlying branches. Take the case of the Privy Council as an example. That is the highest court of appeal in the Empire. It has none of the numerous officers who are necessarily associated with courts exercising primary jurisdiction. It has no marshal, no sheriff, and no district registrars. Its expense is comparatively light, because its functions are confined to those of a court of appeal. If we extend the functions of the High Court to cases arising under Federal laws, what will be the result? We may have one class of litigant demanding that it has a right to issue writs in any part of Australia, in matters relating to every Federal law that has been passed, and if we grant the jurisdiction, we must provide facilities for its exercise. It is also true that if we concede this primary jurisdiction, we must provide for the Federal Judge or Judges travelling about to exercise that jurisdiction. This primary jurisdiction cannot be exercised at the seat of Government. As already mentioned, the court must be brought to the doors of the people, and to that end there must be a Judge travelling to the various centres of population throughout the Commonwealth. We should require to have one or two Judges always on circuit to get even a very limited service in the way of judicial administration in the first instance. I would remind the Attorney-General that to grant this primary or original jurisdiction as contemplated, we should not only have to provide a Judge who would not be required for the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, but also to provide for his expenses in travelling, and for the expenses of the officers associated with him; and thus the cost would be enormous. I feel quite confident that the estimate which is submitted, and which might be sufficient to cover the expenses connected with a Court of Appeal will be absolutely insufficient if we have to provide for the exercise of primary courts throughout Australia. As an illustration of what the circuit system means, I have obtained from the accountant of the Law Department of Victoria a return showing the approximate cost of circuit courts in that State for the financial year 1901-2.

Mr. HIGGINS.—A Judge goes on circuit only once a year in Victoria.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But one Judge is always on circuit, each Judge in turn undertaking the duty.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Then the honorable and learned member is not referring to one particular Judge?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No; every month one of the Judges goes on circuit. As a matter of practice one Judge is told off month by month to do the circuit work.

Mr. SALMON.—That is not every month in the year.

Sir JOHN QU CK.—Every month in the year, except January, there is a Judge on circuit. The return furnished to me by the accountant, whom I asked to pick out the circuit expenses, shows that the salary of one Judge is £3,000, and his travelling expenses £800; that the salary of one associate is £350; the salaries of three Crown prosecutors always on circuit, £1,960; salary of a circuit clerk, £350; cost of railway passes for sheriff, circuit clerk, Judge's associate and three Crown prosecutors, at £54, is £324; travelling expenses of Crown prosecutors, £250; travelling expenses of circuit clerk, £70; travelling expenses of sheriff and deputy sheriff, £96; expenses of witness and jurors, £4,250; and incidental expenses, £100—a total of £11,550. I understand that the railway passes purchased for the officers cost £54 per annum, but now cost £80, though, for the purposes of this calculation, I have taken the former sum.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The expenses of witnesses and jurors ought not to be included, because they would have to be paid wherever the trial took place.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That is quite so, and I observe that the accountant has not discriminated between the expenses of witnesses and jurors. But if a Federal Judge went to Western Australia to try a civil case, and he decided to take the trial of a letter-sorter who might be charged with letter-stealing, there would have to be a special panel of 45 jurors subpoenaed. If such a case were tried by the ordinary States tribunals, that item would form an infinitesimal part of the total expenses, whereas, with a Federal Judge on circuit, all the expense of this special panel of jurors would have to be incurred in connexion with one Court.

Mr. BAMFORD.—If such a case were tried in a State Court, would the cost be charged to the Commonwealth?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No; if the States Courts exercised Federal jurisdiction, they would do it at their own expense, so that such a trial would not tend to swell the expense under the Constitution. In the States there are already Crown prosecutors, with all the requisite machinery for taking trials on circuit, and the duplication of Courts seems to me unwise and impolitic—unwise, because it interferes with the arrangements for the administration of justice, arrangements which are satisfactory with the machinery already in existence, and impolitic and injudicious because it tends to incur unnecessary expense. I trust that the Government will do their best to keep down expenses. If they are going to push this Bill through, let the expense be reduced to reasonable limits, so that it may not be thrown in our teeth that we are squandering the public money by the duplication of courts in which justice may be administered in the first instance. The Supreme Courts of the States are quite capable of doing the judicial work of hearing trial by juries, and disposing of the preliminary stages of cases. Let the High Court deal with questions of law, pure and simple, as a Court of Appeal.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But honorable and learned members oppose the creation of even a Court of Appeal.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do, because at the present stage I think such a court unnecessary; but I am endeavouring to assist in making the proposed High Court the least objectionable, so that, when we go to the country, we shall be able to explain that so far as this House was concerned, we did not incur unnecessary expense—that some honorable members, whilst they thought there was a constitutional obligation to establish a Court of Appeal, felt that there was no obligation to increase the jurisdiction of that Court by the addition of jurisdiction in the first instance, which can be exercised by the existing Courts and officers. How can we justify the duplication of all the existing legal machinery?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is not proposed.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It is undoubtedly proposed that there shall be duplication both in the criminal and civil jurisdiction. In the criminal jurisdiction contemplated provision will have to be made for such officers as I have mentioned.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As I have already explained, it is proposed to use the State officers everywhere.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But if additional functions be imposed on State officers, those officers must be paid.

Mr. DEAKIN.—A relatively small sum.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I am afraid it will not be a relatively small sum. At any rate, the extension of the jurisdiction will largely swell the expenses of the Federation, which will have to bear all the obloquy attending an immense expenditure of the kind. Those of us who go to the country will have to help to bear the burden of responsibility, and that is the reason I am anxious to keep down the expenses. Even now, at this late hour, I urge on the Attorney-General to agree to the elimination of all surplus provisions, and not to over-burden this new organ with work and functions which can be dispensed with at the present time.

Mr. A. McLEAN (Gippsland).—Like the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, I did all I could to prevent the second reading of this Bill, and having failed in that, the next best thing is to make the measure as little oppressive as we possibly can on the taxpayers of the Commonwealth. If we are to look for any consistency in public life, I think we are entitled to claim the votes of the Attorney-General and the honorable and learned member for Indi in confining the jurisdiction of this Court to appellate work. During the second reading of the Bill those honorable and learned gentlemen spoke in very forcible and eloquent terms, and almost persuaded us—in fact I think they did persuade some honorable members—that they were bound in conscience to obey the Constitution. Their interpretation of the Constitution was that they should create this Court, not when it was absolutely required, but on the earliest possible occasion on which we were afforded an opportunity of voting on the question. I am sorry to observe from the subsequent speeches of those honorable and learned gentlemen that their conscience must have been considerably seared and cauterized, because last night it certainly appeared to me that they wanted to depart from the letter of the Constitution, and from the manifest intention of those who framed it. The Attorney-General knows that the Constitution states specifically that the number of Judges shall not be less than three, and he has told us that the High Court is the very keystone of the Constitution. Surely it is reasonable to assume that the gentlemen who were intrusted with the framing of the Constitution would give some attention to what we are told is the keystone of the arch. Are we to assume for a moment that the framers of the Constitution mentioned three Judges, knowing perfectly well that such a number could not do the work? They either mentioned three Judges in good faith, believing that they could do the work which was to be intrusted to the High Court, or they deliberately intended to mislead the people of the Commonwealth, by naming a number which they knew to be inadequate. I am sure the Attorney-General will not contend for a moment that, if the Constitution intended to vest this Court with general original jurisdiction, the framers of the Constitution would have been guilty of the farce of naming three Judges to do the whole of the work. We know that to do similar work in any one State would take at least three Judges, and certainly more than three in some of the States; and, surely, to do the work of the whole Commonwealth would require a great many more. The Attorney-General, when he was speaking of the expenses of the proposed Federation, and advising people to adopt the Constitution, always spoke of three Judges for the High Court. If any further proof were needed of the intention of the Convention in this direction, I think it is furnished by the estimate of expenses set down for the High Court. Is it to be imagined for a moment that the members of the Convention could seriously assume that a court invested with original, as well as with appellate jurisdiction for the whole of the Commonwealth, could be conducted at an annual expenditure of £23,000? I am sure that no one would seriously contend that that could be done. The Attorney-General tells us now that he believes the High Court could be conducted at something like that expense, by transferring a large portion of the work to the States. But that is only a recent thought on the part of the Attorney-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. A. McLEAN. — The Attorney-General had no such thought in his mind when he introduced the Bill last session.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; it all appears in Hansard, and I can show the honorable member the passage.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Not only did the members of the Convention contemplate the appointment of only three Judges in the first instance, but the estimate of the cost of the High Court was based upon the assumption that only three Judges would be appointed. Surely the members of the Convention would not have contemplated the appointment of only three Judges, in the first instance, if they had intended that the Court should be vested with jurisdiction which three men could not satisfactorily exercise. It is clear to me, therefore, that the intention of the Constitution is that we shall commence with a Court of three Judges; and as the second reading was carried largely because of the argument that the Constitution requires the establishment of a High Court at the earliest moment possible, it is not desirable or necessary that we should go beyond our immediate needs. If we commence with an elaborate court and a large number of Judges, and give an extensive original jurisdiction, we cannot, if we afterwards find that we have gone too far, retrace our steps; but if we commence on a moderate scale, with a court of only appellate jurisdiction and the original jurisdiction given by the Constitution, and appoint only three Judges, we can at any time that we think necessary extend the jurisdiction of the court, and increase the number of the Judges. I know that the Attorney-General is not indifferent to the condition of the people, and therefore I ask him to take the present circumstances of the Commonwealth into his consideration. We have just passed through a drought which is unparalleled in the history of Australia, and because of extravagance in administration the credit of the Australian States has been reduced to a level of which we should be ashamed. When I speak of extravagance in this connexion, I do not refer to Commonwealth extravagance. I do not, however, assert that the Commonwealth administration has not been extravagant, because I regard this proposal as an extravagant one. It must be remembered that we have not yet done anything to improve the condition of any one person in the Commonwealth, with the exception of those for whom we have provided remunerative positions. We have done nothing to develop the resources of the country, or to increase the expansion of our industries.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Have we not imposed duties to protect Australian industries?

Mr. A. McLean.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—We had higher duties, and a much larger degree of protection under the Tariffs of the States.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I am speaking of Australia as a whole.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—There is only one State which did not enjoy the benefits of protection before the Commonwealth was established, and we cannot take much credit for extending those benefits to it. The condition of the people is such that we should not impose upon them unnecessary taxation to the extent of even a shilling, and it would be a piece of wanton extravagance to establish a High Court upon a larger scale than is required at the present time. It is surely more prudent, and more in accordance with the rules of common-sense, to commence on a moderate scale, and to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Court, and increase the number of Judges, as occasion may require. The Attorney-General cannot be indifferent to the wishes of the people, and I do not think any one could doubt but that if a vote of the electors were taken on the question a High Court would not be established for many years to come. Of course, I recognise that by a majority honorable members have decided to establish a High Court, but we have not decided to create an unnecessarily large court, and I hope that honorable members will set their faces against that. I was so strongly opposed to the establishment of a High Court at the present time that, if I had voted for the second reading of the Bill, I should have been ashamed of my vote as long as I lived. But I know that many other honorable members, who are of my own way of thinking, but do not feel so strongly on the matter, voted for the Bill because they did not wish to embarrass the Government. I think it is the general wish of the Committee, however, and the almost universal desire of the people, that we should commence on as moderate a scale as possible. If we merely vest the Court with appellate jurisdiction and the original jurisdiction given to it by the Constitution, we shall meet all the requirements of the case. I hope that the Government will not press this matter to a division. Why should they place themselves in opposition to what they must recognise as the desire of the great majority of the people? I ask the Attorney-General, who, I am sure, is keenly alive to the present condition of the people, to save them from unnecessary burdens.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—We are all with the honorable member for Gippsland in the wish not to create an extravagant High Court. But he has really argued against the establishment of a High Court at all.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Not this evening, though I do not want to see a High Court established.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is the position which the honorable member took up on the second reading, and to which his speech to-night logically leads. He will not acknowledge recognised facts. The division in favour of the second reading, no matter how brought about, though I consider it the honest expression of the opinions of honorable members, showed that there is a majority in favour of the establishment of a High Court. The honorable member for Gippsland admits that the High Court must have an appellate jurisdiction, but he argued against giving it the original jurisdiction which is provided for in this clause. Now, if the High Court is created, it must have the original jurisdiction which is given to it by the five sub-sections of section 75 of the Constitution.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—If there are only three Judges they will not be troubled much with the original jurisdiction vested in the court by the Constitution.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member ought to show that paragraphs (a), (b), and (d) of clause 31 are not embraced by, or at least are more than an extension of, the original jurisdiction provided for in the Constitution. I think that if he compares this clause with section 75, and especially with the third sub-section of that section of the Constitution, he will see that there is hardly even an extension of the original jurisdiction contemplated, and that where there is an extension it is only a proper one.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Why should there be any extension at all?

Mr. CROUCH.—It is open to doubt whether there is any extension, and whether the clause is not merely a necessary explanation or interpretation of the Constitution. The honorable member presumed to judge of, not only the feeling of his own constituency, but that of all the constituencies of the Commonwealth. But he has evidently been misled by the attitude of the two Melbourne morning journals in regard to this proposal.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I expressed my present opinion before the newspapers in question published anything at all on the subject.

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not say that the honorable member is in the slightest degree influenced by the opinions expressed in those newspapers, but he has been misled as to the tendency of public opinion by the fact that the views expressed in them coincide with his own.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—It is much more likely that the honorable and learned member is misled by his surroundings, whereas I am able to take an impartial view.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member considered himself justified in stating that if a vote of the electors were taken the High Court would not be established, but I, on the other hand, venture to say that if the matter were referred to the intelligent electors, and the amount of discussion and explanation preceded the referendum that should take place whenever a question of this kind is referred to the people, the vote would be in favour of the establishment of a High Court. There is a large amount of feeling against the High Court, purely because it will not be a final appellate court, and I ask the Attorney General whether he will make an attempt to restore the Court to the form proposed in the draft Constitution before amendment by the Imperial Government. Our delegation to London desired to carry out our wishes, but were misled by the representatives of financial institutions and others who forwarded telegrams to Mr. Chamberlain asking him to retain the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If we attempt to do away with the right of appeal to the Privy Council we shall have to reserve the whole Bill for His Majesty's assent. It would be better to introduce a separate measure with that object.

Mr. CROUCH.—Section 74 of the Constitution does not carry the King's power of veto any further than other provisions of the Constitution relating to the King's right of veto, and I should like to have the promise of the Attorney-General that he will endeavour to carry out the original intention of the people of Australia before the Constitution was mutilated by the Imperial authorities.

Mr. CONROY.—Was it a mutilation?

Mr. CROUCH.—I think so, according to the opinions I have heard expressed by even members of this House who oppose this Bill.

Mr. CONROY.—All the legal authorities I know are against the abolition of the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. CROUCH.—One of the principal opponents of this measure, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, laid the very greatest stress upon his objection to the continuance of the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and I voted for the measure because I thought that the High Court would be largely an appellate court, and because I think it could be made, in committee, the final appellate court, and because I believe that Australia should be self-contained in every respect. I desire to see the right of appeal to the Privy Council abolished, and I am sure that this would be in accord with the wishes of the great majority of the intelligent people of the Commonwealth. I admit that there is still the possibility of an Imperial court of appeal being established, and I shall not so much object to that, because we should then be treated upon the same footing as the people of England. At present the people of England are able to obtain a final decision far more readily than we can, as their appeals are limited to two stages, whilst ours necessitate four, and upon this fact is based one of my principal objections to the present arrangement. If the High Court were made a final court of appeal, a great many of the objections now urged against it would disappear, and if the Attorney-General will not take the responsibility of moving an amendment with that object, I shall take action myself. I have the greatest faith in the ability and patriotism of the members of every Federal Convention from 1891 onwards, all of which were against the appeal to the Privy Council, and I hope that the Attorney-General will be persuaded to do all he possibly can to give expression to the full desire of the Australian people.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—The speech of the honorable member for Gippsland must appeal to every lay member of this House, and to the common sense of every business man who has regard for economy in our administration. Honorable members who spoke in support of the clause last evening apparently desire to make the High Court as comprehensive as possible, for no other reason than to increase the expenditure of the Commonwealth. It is proposed to give to the High Court the same jurisdiction as is now exercised by the States Supreme Courts, and to that extent to duplicate the present courts. We have been told that the Judges of the States Supreme Courts are selected with the utmost care, and, therefore, it cannot be suggested that tribunals of such high character are not fully competent to perform all their present functions. If the High Court is restricted to a purely appellate jurisdiction, the desires of the Australian people will be fully satisfied. The Attorney General has represented that the proposed extension of the powers of the Court will be in the interests of suitors, but I do not see how any benefit will be conferred upon litigants, whose aim is to obtain justice by the most ready means. Under present circumstances, a litigant can bring an action in one of the lower State Courts, and if he is dissatisfied, can appeal to the Supreme Court of the State, and then to the Privy Council. When the High Court is appointed he can appeal to the High Court, and, if he be still dissatisfied, can make a further appeal to the Privy Council. On the other hand, he might ignore the High Court altogether, and appeal direct from the State Supreme Court to the Privy Council. I do not see any object in interposing the High Court as a tribunal having original jurisdiction. The Attorney-General evidently desires to impose as much work as possible upon the Court, so that it may be necessary to appoint a full Bench of five Judges. If we confer upon the Court only an appellate jurisdiction, there will not be the same necessity for appointing five Judges, and I think that in this connexion the efforts of the honorable and learned members who have fought so staunchly against the Government proposals are to be highly commended. The Attorney-General has expressed the hope that the Court will attract work, not only from the States Supreme Courts, but also from New Zealand, and he frankly admits that if the work increases to such an extent that the Judges appointed cannot cope with it, he will be prepared to bring down a Bill to strengthen the Bench. I shall oppose the clause, because I do not believe in giving such an extended jurisdiction to the Court. When the late Sir Henry Parkes submitted his proposal for a High Court, he contemplated the necessity for appointing a Bench of ten Judges. Sir Samuel Griffith contended that whilst possibly at the inception of the court sufficient work would not be found for three Judges, he was prepared to admit that, if the jurisdiction of that tribunal were extended, in all probability ten Justices would be necessary. The appeal of the honorable member for Gippsland to keep the expenditure of the Commonwealth within reasonable bounds is deserving of consideration at the hands of this Committee. It is gratifying to know that the leading men at the bar in practically all the States of the Union are unanimous that it is not necessary to embody in this Bill a provision conferring upon the High Court additional original jurisdiction.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—During the discussion which has taken place in committee, various attitudes have been assumed by honorable members, some of which it is difficult to reconcile. In the first place we find that there is practically a desire on the part of some honorable members to block the establishment of the High Court.

Mr. CAMERON.—Only for a time.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Certainly the idea is to block the passage of this Bill. For example, the honorable and learned member for Corinella desires to cut down the number of Judges so as to limit the functions of the court practically to Appellate Jurisdiction. In other words, so long as the seat of government is in Victoria, he wishes the High Court to sit here armed only with Appellate Jurisdiction in addition to the original jurisdiction which must be vested in it under the Constitution. The other States, therefore, are to be denied an opportunity of having its original jurisdiction exercised in their midst. The idea of many honorable members who object to investing the High Court with additional original jurisdiction is to reduce the number of Judges. By the appointment of three Judges and by the Court exercising only Appellate Jurisdiction they urge that we shall dispense with the necessity for the adoption of the circuit system. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, has declared that the principle underlying the Bill is one of centralization, but it seems to me that the desire of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is to prevent the Court from being invested with additional original jurisdiction, so as to reduce the number of Judges to three. Surely that must result in centralization, whereas the scheme forecasted by the Attorney-General will result in decentralization. The right honorable gentleman seeks to carry out the true federal idea. In some of the more distant States the feeling is abroad that Federation is something entirely outside of them. The Parliament meets in Melbourne, Federal Ministers have their offices here, and federation to them seems something which is entirely foreign. If we constitute a High Court which will sit only at the seat of Government, we shall accentuate that feeling. Our desire ought to be to extend the sphere of Federal influence as far as possible, instead of endeavouring to crowd everything into Melbourne. If honorable members are successful in limiting the jurisdiction of the Court they will establish centralization.

Mr. GLYNN.—We will not secure efficiency with the decentralization provided under the Bill.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I will deal with that matter presently. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo asked this evening why we should do more than create a Court of Appellate Jurisdiction. He declared that in the United States the Supreme Court is only an Appellate Court. But he forgets that when the Judiciary Act was passed there, Congress did something more than to establish a tribunal having an Appellate Jurisdiction. It not only clothed its Supreme Court with Appellate Jurisdiction, powers of interpretation, and also a certain amount of original jurisdiction, but it provided circuit courts throughout the whole of the United States. One of the first acts of the Justices of that court was to go upon circuit. Congress went even further, and created district courts.

Mr. GLYNN.—They had to do so.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The position taken up by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo was that Congress had merely constituted a court with Appellate Jurisdiction. But in Willoughby's The Supreme Court of the United States, I read—

The number of circuits has differed at different times. By the Act of 1789 three were provided for; since 1869 there have been nine. Until 1869 (excepting a short period in 1801) there were no circuit Judges, circuit work being done by the Supreme Court Justices. By the Act of 1869 a circuit Judge was to be appointed by the President for each circuit. One of the Justices of the Supreme Court is, however, still allotted to each of the circuits, who after the expiration of the term of the Supreme Court, visits his circuit, and tries the more important cases which may have arisen there. The circuit court may be held by the circuit Judge, by the Supreme Court Justice, or by the district Judge of that district in which the court is sitting; or by any two of them, or by all three of them sitting together.

Therefore, in the United States itself, a Supreme Court was set up, the Justices of which visited the various States under the powers and jurisdiction conferred upon them as Circuit Judges. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo also pointed to the case of Canada. He said that in the Dominion they had nothing but an Appellate Court. He quite overlooked the fact that in 1875, and again in 1886, in addition to the Supreme Court which possessed appellate jurisdiction, Parliament created an Exchequer Court endowed with a very large exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But that is not a Federal Court.

Mr. L. E. GROOM. — Legislative authority was used to create a court to try issues connected with the Dominion, a court having also a concurrent jurisdiction in matters relating to the revenue—to cases in which it was sought to impeach any patent, or invention, or any lease, or other instrument respecting land, or in which relief was sought against various public officers. It is a court created by Parliament for the purposes of the whole Dominion and of its provinces.

Mr. ISAACS.—The provinces have their own courts.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But the honorable and learned member for Bendigo led the Committee to believe that Canada had not bothered about constituting a court which was possessed of other than appellate jurisdiction. I am showing that the Parliament of that country went a great deal further. Some of the opponents of this Bill have urged that its operation will result in the centralization of justice. But I contend that if the High Court is going to be worthy of the name litigants in the distant States should not be denied an opportunity of bringing their cases before it. It was contended, prior to the taking of the Federal referendum, that the Constitution was framed in such a way that the smallest State need not fear that it would be deprived of its rights by the more populous States. It was urged that the Constitution was so elastic that it was possible for the Federal Judges to travel all over the Commonwealth. That was the case in the United States. The framers of our Constitution, however, did not desire to follow merely the American model. They had in their mind's eye what was being done in the States Supreme Courts. Take, for instance, the Supreme Court of Queensland. In that State we have a court in Townsville, another in Rockhampton, and still another in Brisbane, each exercising Supreme Court jurisdiction, in addition to which there is a Full Court sitting as a court of appeal. That is all that is proposed under this Bill. Under its provisions, district registries will be established, and in each of those districts it will be possible to commence a suit upon Federal matters. Section 75 of the Constitution provides that the High Court shall be vested with original jurisdiction in all matters arising under any treaty, affecting Consuls, or in which the Commonwealth sues or is sued, or in all matters between States, or in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth. Under the Constitution, therefore, we cannot have a court with purely an appellate jurisdiction. When we have constituted this tribunal, and have vested in its Justices that original jurisdiction, it is only right that the residents of South Australia, Tasmania, Western Australia, Queensland, and New South Wales, should be able to have actions to which they are parties tried before the Court in their own States. If we establish the Court, and appoint such a small number of Judges to it that they can sit only at the seat of government, all the matters which it is desired to bring before it must of necessity be brought here.

Mr. GLYNN.—Will the honorable and learned member not say that 90 per cent. of the cases are such as would arise under a unitary constitution?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Of necessity, under the Constitution, original jurisdiction is given to the Court, and if a plaintiff is to have the right of bringing his action there, the Court should be framed in such a way that each of the States can have a district registrar to start the cases, and a Judge to hear the matter on the spot, instead of dragging all the witnesses to a central place. The latter condition would cause grievous wrong to the more remote parts of the Commonwealth, and shows the absolute necessity for decentralization. We are told that the proposal of the Government will involve tremendous cost; but would the honorable and learned member for Bendigo favour the abolition of the State Circuit Court which sits in that city? I am afraid that if such a proposal were made, the honorable and learned member for Bendigo would seriously object to all the witnesses and parties concerned being dragged down to Melbourne simply to gratify some little excitement in the community about economic reform.

Mr. GLYNN.—There is no Supreme Court at Bendigo to deal with State matters.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But a Supreme Court sits at Bendigo, and, so far as I understand, the arguments of the honorable and learned member for that city were addressed against circuit courts altogether.

Mr. GLYNN.—No.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—In the figures which the honorable and learned member for Bendigo gave of the cost of circuit courts, he mentioned £4,500 as the expenses of witnesses and jurors. But would that sum not be largely increased if all the witnesses had to be brought from Bendigo to Melbourne? Would the cost of the circuit Judge be escaped? It is very plausible to stand on a public platform and refer to £11,000 as the total cost of the circuit courts, but I doubt whether country people would appreciate the argument when they had taken away from them the right to have justice administered at their doors, and the community generally were relieved of expense at the cost of the parties interested in the trial. It must not be forgotten that it is on the parties to the suit on which the cost of bringing the witnesses to a central place must ultimately fall.

Mr. GLYNN.—Does the honorable and learned member anticipate that the Federal Circuit Judges will sit outside the State capitals?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No; but it would be a greater saving to bring South Australian witnesses to Adelaide than to bring them to Melbourne or to a seat of government in New South Wales. The same argument applies in the case of Western Australia and Queensland; and even if we cannot get an adequate number of Judges it is our duty to get as reasonable a number as we can. We are told that the cost of administration would be great. On this point I would call attention to the Customs cases which were heard in Brisbane, and which extended over four or five weeks. The costs of those cases would have to be incurred whether they were tried before a State Judge or a Federal Judge. Witnesses and jurors would have to be summoned, and the only difference in cost would be the travelling expenses of the Judge.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is not so much the cost of the Judge as the cost of conveying the officials of the court.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—With all respect to the honorable and learned member it is far more important to us in Queensland that we should have the cause of action tried in that State, than that there should be a small public saving in the cost by bringing the parties to the seat of government.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is not the question.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But it is a serious question to us in Queensland, and I again point out that the Judges' salaries have to be paid in any event. There is no necessity in constituting a High Court to appoint a large number of officers to travel with the Judge all over the country. We need not convey Crown prosecutors or clerks of courts, or any other officials beyond, perhaps, the Judge's associate and his tipstaff. Indeed, we might dispense with a tipstaff, leaving only the Judge and his associate to travel to the scene of the action. For all other purposes the State officials could be utilized.

Mr. CAMERON.—But they would have to be paid.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Not at all. At the present time State officers are doing Federal work without pay. In the Railway Department of Queensland officials are doing work for the Postal Department without having a penny added to their salaries; and I believe that the idea of the Attorney-General is to utilize the services of the State officials, and thus save expenditure to that extent.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Except the Judges.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Does the honorable and learned member wish to make out that the Judges will involve enormous cost?

Mr. PAGE.—Did the Federal Government pay the cost of the Reid cases in Brisbane?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Federal Government recovered the costs.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The intention of the Procedure Bill, and of this Bill, is to utilize the local machinery as far as possible, and all that is wanted is a Judge who can exercise the jurisdiction to be conferred by the Bill.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—But the Attorney-General proposes to give £6,500 a year as an honorarium for the “funktors.”

MR. L. E. GROOM.—There is no necessity for honorarium in the High Court, and I am afraid that the honorable member for Robertson has not had much experience in connexion with the necessary officials of a court. The Attorney-General does not propose any extravagant paraphernalia, and I think his assurance on that score might be accepted. We are told, further, that the State jurisdiction is sufficient—that the State Judges can do all that is required. But the Attorney-General's position was unanswerable when he said we must remember that we are creating a Court vested with peculiar Federal jurisdiction. That Court will be continually dealing, as the Attorney-General says, with Federal matters, and will thus acquire a distinct knowledge and attain an efficiency which, in the end, must command the confidence of the people.

MR. THOMSON.—Are Federal matters different to any large extent from other matters dealt with by the States Courts?

MR. L. E. GROOM.—There is a great distinction. In Queensland and other States there is a general common law, equity and criminal jurisdiction, but arising from Federal matters there will of necessity be constant arguments before the Court, and the Judges will thus acquire a profound knowledge of constitutional law. By virtue of constantly exercising Federal jurisdiction the Judges will become thoroughly acquainted with the Federal Constitution and precedents, and the result will be more confidence in and fewer appeals from the decisions given. We should have Judges of that description moving throughout the Commonwealth. We have to give the High Court jurisdiction in the matters set forth in section 75 of the Constitution, and, as pointed out by the honorable and learned member for Indi last night, a great many of the questions which will arise under subsection 3 of that clause would of necessity be tried in the Federal Court whether we give the extended jurisdiction or not. All that the Attorney-General says is that under the Constitution we must confer a certain amount of Federal jurisdiction on the High Court, and seeing that that Court has to be constituted, why not give it the additional jurisdiction, so that the Judges may be able to deal with matters arising under the laws of Parliament? In this way, if the people desire to have their rights decided by the Federal tribunal, they will be able to have their wish gratified. It is not asked that the Court should be given a general equity and common law jurisdiction; all the Attorney-General desires is that the High Court Judges should be able to exercise the jurisdiction of interpreting matters that arise under the Constitution. What other matters are likely to arise? In Quick and Garran's work on the Constitution, several illustrations are given of cases likely to come before the Court; for instance, where a subject of the King resident in one State is subject in another State to a disability or discrimination under section 117 of the Constitution, or as to religious tests required as a qualification for officers or for actions brought against members for holding, contrary to the Constitution, places of profit; or questions as to the rights of transferred officers, and so on. In addition, there are other powers specially mentioned under the Constitution, which may be the subject matter of litigation; and when these constitutional questions arise, the Commonwealth, if a party, has the right to take people before the Federal tribunal. There may be a hundred and one questions of this kind which arise in actions between the Commonwealth and private parties, or between State and State. I am sure that the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, who has studied the constitutional history of England and the United States, will find that many of the constitutional questions yet decided have arisen between party and party.

MR. GLYNN.—Nearly all the American authorities condemned the extension of the original jurisdiction.

MR. L. E. GROOM.—The leading case of Gibbons v. Ogden, in America, the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, in England, and the case of Barton v. Taylor, in New South Wales, were all practically between subject and subject. If an action arose with respect to the Speaker ejecting a member, and it became necessary to determine under the Constitution what were the powers and prerogative of this Parliament, and the rights and privileges of members, would the honorable and learned member like that question to be tried in a State Court, instead of in a Federal Court?

Mr. GLYNN.—Would the case not be sure to go to the court of appeal?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It might or it might not; but let us have a Federal Court which will command the confidence of the people, and so reduce as much as possible the necessity for appeals.

Mr. THOMSON.—There would be the right of appeal in any case.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But it is desired to prevent a man bringing his action in the Federal Court, so that the only way to have these matters settled authoritatively would be to have a trial in a State Court, and then go to the appeal court. Honorable members have argued for an Australian court with Australian appellate jurisdiction, and have afterwards inconsistently contended that action should be first brought in a State Court, from which an appeal may go to the Privy Council, thus avoiding the Australian appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. WATSON.—That could not be done in respect to constitutional cases.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—We have yet to determine whether, for instance, in the case of a question arising as to an Act passed by a State being contrary to the Constitution, we can compel the State to come to the High Court, or whether it may be allowed to go to the Privy Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We provide for that in the Bill.

Mr. WATSON.—This clause will not get over the matter, because it is still optional for the parties to go to the States Courts.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Yes, but I want to give them the opportunity to go to the High Court in the first instance. The jurisdiction which it is proposed to give to the High Court under this clause is jurisdiction on matters arising under the Constitution, or under the laws made by this Parliament. Now, under the laws made by this Parliament, a lot of very important cases will arise, in regard to which litigants should have an opportunity of saying whether they will go before a State Court or the Federal Court. For instance, we have power to pass laws relating to trade and commerce, and if honorable members will turn up the American authorities, they will see that a very large interpretation has been placed upon those words. It might happen, for instance, that a harbor board, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it, might frame regulations which were regarded as interfering with freedom of trade and commerce between the States, and an action would lie in the State Court. Such an action would not be an action between a State and the Commonwealth, or between one State and another, but between a private individual and a corporate body. Therefore the matter would not be one coming under section 75 of the Constitution, and if the parties concerned were not expressly given the right to go to the High Court, they would be precluded from doing so.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is a matter which would be dealt with by the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The dispute might arise quite apart from any decision given by the Inter-State Commission. I am instancing the case as one which might occur under a law made by this Parliament, and in regard to which litigants should have the right to go before the High Court. In the same way similar questions might arise under laws passed by us relating to insurance, banking, promissory notes, patent rights, copyrights, inventions, and any of the various commercial matters upon which we may be called upon to legislate. Are we going to prevent litigants from taking causes arising from the laws passed by us in regard to those matters before the High Court? I submit that we should not. The ground upon which we should give the High Court this jurisdiction is that the Constitution contemplates the exercise of a Federal jurisdiction by the High Court, and we should allow every litigant who thinks that he is being deprived of a right which he should enjoy under the Constitution to go to the best tribunal we can create for a remedy. We do not deprive him of his right to go before a State Court if he chooses, but we give him the right to go before the highest tribunal in the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Will the High Court be higher than the Supreme Court of a State?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I believe that in the long run it will be a better tribunal for the decision of these cases, because it will have appeals from all the States, and will be continuously dealing with Federal matters.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—If the High Court can hear an appeal from the Supreme Court, will it not be the higher court?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I do not undervalue the work done by the States Courts, but I think that in the long run the High Court will be more efficient for the purposes for which it is to be created than any of the Supreme Courts. All the Attorney-General asks is that, in respect to actions arising under the Constitution and under the laws made by this Parliament, litigants may have the opportunity of using the Federal Court contemplated by the Constitution. I intend to support the clause.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).—As a layman I hesitate about interposing in a matter which has been so ably discussed by the legal members of the Committee, and especially by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and the honorable and learned members for Corinella, Bendigo, and Northern Melbourne. But I am bound to raise my voice in protest against an unnecessary and very heavy expenditure, to which the people are decidedly opposed; I can, at any rate, speak confidently of the feeling of those whom I immediately represent. The very elaborate defence of the clause made by the Attorney-General last night was characterized more by its rhetoric than by its logic, and showed signs of a weakening in his belief in the measure. Apparently he would be glad to see a considerable portion of it amended. He has already expressed a willingness to jettison paragraph (c) of this clause, and also the three clauses which provide for the transfer of cases to the High Court by right, a monstrous provision, which I think the Committee would not allow to remain. The Attorney-General also made an admission which, I think, was entirely in favour of those who oppose the Bill, when he said that it is impossible at the present time, with due regard to economy, to establish such a High Court as we desire. He does not pretend that the High Court which he proposes to establish will be more than sufficient to meet the demands of the Commonwealth for a limited time to come. By his own showing this is only a makeshift measure, to create a High Court which will be the nucleus of a much more elaborate establishment in the future. I hold, with a great many other honorable members, that at the present time any High Court is unnecessary. The Attorney-General admits that the vesting of additional jurisdiction in a High Court will not deprive the States Courts of jurisdiction. Therefore, if we add to the original jurisdiction of the High Court provided for by the Constitution, we shall only be duplicating our legal machinery; we shall be creating a second Bench to do that which the first Bench is now doing to the satisfaction of the people, with all the attendant expense, but without any saving by the absorption of the local courts, or their reduction in number.

Mr. PAGE.—The arguments which the honorable and learned member is now using were all used against federation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Furthermore, a High Court is not necessary, because the Commonwealth already has a judicature which is able to dispose of the business now being brought before it, or likely to be brought before it in the immediate future. I hope that in committee we who would gladly have seen the Bill thrown out will so amend it that the great cost with which we are threatened will be considerably reduced, so that we shall be able to tell the electors that, so far as it was in our power to enforce economy, we have done so. I urge, for the sake of the taxpayers, who have to meet the charges which will be imposed by the creation of this court, that every step possible be taken to reduce its cost.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I understand that the proposal which the Committee is now considering is virtually the omission of clause 31.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That will be the ultimate question.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We are practically being asked by those who oppose the Bill not to give to the High Court the jurisdiction provided for in this clause. I must confess that I feel great difficulty in making up my mind as to how to deal with the matter. As honorable members know, I opposed the second reading because I regard a High Court as unnecessary at the present time, and the proposal to establish it as little short of a scandal and a crime. But I must bow to the wisdom of the House. A majority of honorable members have determined that there shall be a High Court, and it is my duty to try to make that court as efficient as possible. If we are to have a batch of highly-paid officers, we must see that we give them plenty to do. But I feel that I am much in the position of a man who has to find employment for two gangers who have been appointed to supervise the same piece of work, or for two dentists who are engaged to operate upon the same mouth. The wording of the clauses of the Bill is evidence of a frantic effort on the part of the Attorney-General to provide something for the Judges to do. He must feel as we all do that if the High Court has only an appellate jurisdiction and the original jurisdiction provided for in the Constitution, the Judges will have hardly enough to do. What is the result? It is proposed to take such work as can be transferred from the States Supreme Courts, and foist it upon the High Court. If we do not give the High Court the extra original jurisdiction now proposed, it will have very little to do in that particular line, and as matters stand it will have a very small appellate jurisdiction. I am confident that if a litigant has the option of going to the Privy Council or the High Court, he will prefer to carry his appeal to the former, and our Federal Judges will be left to sit in high dignity, in ermined robes or furred gowns, and twiddle their thumbs whilst waiting for work.

Mr. POYNTON.—If we provide work for the new Judges, we shall render the States Judges idle.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Wherever the idleness might be, I should object to it. I have always supported the proper treatment of public servants, but I object to having one more than is required, and I strongly resent the idea of forcing a new High Court, like an incubus, upon the shoulders of the taxpayers of Australia. If we confine ourselves to the original jurisdiction which is compulsory, there will be very little work for the Judges to do. At the same time the appeals will be few in number, and if we have only three Judges, very few indeed. In Victoria there are usually six Supreme Court Judges—we now have five—and it very often happens that the whole of the Judges are to be found sitting upon the Bench. What a farce it would be if an appeal were allowed from the unanimous decision of five or six Judges of the Victorian Supreme Court to a High Court consisting of three Judges of no higher calibre? Would it not be especially absurd in view of the fact that without any expense to the taxpayer, we can at present appeal to a court of higher standing and calibre across the seas? With me it is not merely a question of expense, but I ask honorable members not to create a court that will not have enough work to do. I should like to give the court plenty of work, and make it as useful as possible. What original jurisdiction will the High Court have, unless the clause under discussion is carried? Section 75 of the Constitution provides that the High Court shall have original jurisdiction in all matters arising under treaties, or affecting consuls, or other representatives of other countries. There will not be a case of either class once in a blue moon. Then there are cases in which the Commonwealth or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth is a party. They may have a few cases under this head, but probably not more than half a dozen in the whole of Australia in any one year. Then there is the class of cases between States or between residents of different States, or between a State and a resident of another State. The High Court will be called upon to deal with a few cases of this description, but we know that actions of this kind are tried every day in the States Supreme Courts. Then the High Court will have original jurisdiction in cases in which a writ of mandamus, or prohibition, or an injunction is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth. I have already shown that the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court will be very small, and that the business will be further reduced if only three Judges are appointed. Now it is proposed to give extra original jurisdiction in order to increase the work of the court. It may be assumed that of the three classes of cases regarding which the Federal Court is to have extended original jurisdiction, the greater number will arise under the laws made by this Parliament.

Mr. SAWERS.—Is it not absolutely necessary to have a High Court to deal with cases arising under the Constitution or involving its interpretation?

Mr. HIGGINS.—No. I should be perfectly prepared to leave those cases to the States Supreme Courts, in which I have quite as much confidence as I could repose in any High Court appointed under present conditions.

Mr. SAWERS.—But there are so many of them.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes; but the Privy Council will make their decisions uniform if they differ. The great bulk of the cases that will come before the High Court will be those arising under the laws passed by this Parliament. Under this clause, taken in conjunction with clause 41, if a man is made bankrupt in Sydney by a Judge at first instance, he is to have no appeal, except to the High Court, although under present practice he may appeal to the State Court sitting in the next room. Or, supposing a man were compelled to pay a call under the Companies Act, by a Judge in Melbourne, and wished to appeal against the decision; he would be deprived of the right he now has to appeal to the Full Court of Victoria, and would be obliged to wait for the sittings of the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He would have to wait for the Full Court in Victoria.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes; but the Full Court of Victoria has more Judges and a smaller area over which to operate. If the Government proposals are carried into effect the result will be to deprive litigants of the right which Magna Charta was intended to secure, namely, speedy as well as upright justice. One of the main objects of the law is to secure speedy trial, and yet it is now proposed to put aside the 27 Judges whom we now have in Australia, and insist that all appeals shall be made to the five Judges of the High Court. The proposed change will not secure speedy justice, or any other advantage to the people of Australia. When a man is made insolvent, and his assets are vested in some trustee and he cannot touch them, it is difficult enough for him now to secure the hearing of his appeal; but it will be trebly hard upon him if he has to wait for the High Court. The Federal Parliament has power to make laws in regard to a greater number of matters than those over which the Federal Parliament of the United States has control. For instance, we can legislate in regard to patents, and the Government proposes that a man who is defeated in a patent case in one of the State Courts shall come to the High Court instead of being allowed to go to the Full Court of the State in which the matter was first tried. The same thing applies to trades marks, to insurance cases, and to the most trivial matters relating to the custody of infants. Perhaps the High Court might be sitting in Bombala, or Orange, or somewhere in the heart of the continent, and an appeal might have to be sent all the way from Western Australia. May I suggest to the Attorney-General some alterations which would mitigate my objections to the clause? I would ask him to make justice speedy for every man by giving the States Courts all the jurisdiction which he intends to confer upon the High Court. I would also ask him to allow the States Courts to deal with matters by way of appeal from the Judge at first instance, in place of compelling appeals to be taken before the High Court. Nine cases out of ten never go beyond the Judge at first instance, and of the tenth cases very few go beyond the Full Court. A good deal has been said with regard to the expense of witnesses upon appeal, but that is all beside the question, because no witnesses will be required to be dragged to the Full Court.

Mr. THOMSON.—Affidavits are often more expensive than witnesses.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There will be no affidavit on appeals. I do not see why we should not endeavour to bring justice to the door of every man as far as we can by utilizing the States Supreme Courts as at present, for the hearing of appeals from the Judge at first instance in matters relating to insolvency, company laws, patents, insurance matters, trade marks, and divorce. If the Attorney-General could grant to the States Supreme Courts the jurisdiction that he now wishes to give to the Federal Court and treat them with the confidence they deserve, many of my objections would be removed. We have had no serious objection taken to our Supreme Courts.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear. But what is the proposal of the honorable and learned member with regard to the relations between the States Courts endowed with full Federal jurisdiction and the High Court?

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is better that we should give the States Courts the same original jurisdiction that is given to the High Court; and we should allow, as now, an appeal from a single Judge to the Full Bench. At the same time, if we proceed with the Bill, we must make the High Court an optional substitute for the Privy Council in regard to appeals from the Full Courts. As a rule litigants will not go beyond the Full Courts—they will be quite content with the tribunal which is at their doors. Thus a man will be able to get justice more speedily, because the Full Court Judges will be confined to the States capitals.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There would be an optional appeal, I take it, either to the Full Court or the High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I would not allow an option of appeal to the High Court from a Judge of the States Courts. But an appeal would lie from the Full Court to the High Court if the appellant preferred the High Court to the Privy Council. Clause 41 should be excised, and we should insert a provision which will give to the States Courts the full original jurisdiction which the Government desire to vest in the High Court. My only object in offering this suggestion is to make the best of a bad job. I do not intend to weary the Committee with perpetual protests against a decision which has been carried against me. I have my own opinion upon the matter, but I accept the judgment of the Committee upon it. If by any means I can assist in improving the Bill, and it defeats the fulfilment of my own prophecies, I shall be only too glad.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—If anything were needed to convince me of the propriety of opposing this clause, it would be the speeches which have been delivered by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. The former has exhibited a vast vista of expense which we are called upon to face in establishing this court. He has indicated the enormous number of matters which it will be possible to bring before this tribunal in its original jurisdiction, and has emphasized the necessity for extending it throughout the whole of Australia. Honorable members must recognise the heavy expenditure which such a proposal would eventually involve. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has shown how very inefficient the court would be under the proposal of the Attorney-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. THOMSON.—It would be inefficient, he said, because it would drag litigants who desire to appear before the Supreme Full Court to the Central High Court. If that is to be avoided the Supreme Courts of the States must practically be able to deal with everything with which the High Court is called upon to deal, except the few matters in which exclusive jurisdiction is vested in the latter under the Constitution. I ask honorable members to pause before entering upon federation in the spirit which this Bill displays. Surely by adopting federation we did not create two peoples.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We created one.

Mr. THOMSON.—We are supposed to have done so, but many of the proposals of the Ministry insist upon regarding the taxpayers of Australia as two different peoples. We are asked to establish two systems of adjudication throughout the Commonwealth. We did not create new requirements amongst the people upon the inauguration of the Commonwealth. It is a false policy to neglect the existing institutions of the States in dealing with Federal matters. When we come to legislate on matters which have been placed under our jurisdiction, and many of these are mere transfers, is it not our duty to ask whether we can utilize the existing institutions and officials of the States? If the people could obtain satisfaction from their Judiciaries prior to federation, it is extraordinary that those institutions are to be cast aside by the Commonwealth in minor as well as in major matters, and that we are now to be told that they cannot give litigants satisfaction. If we adopt that attitude federation will not prove a blessing to the people of Australia. I desire that we shall not duplicate existing institutions where there is no absolute necessity for so doing. The honorable member for Darling Downs has asked why we should place the States at a disadvantage by requiring litigants and their witnesses to come to Melbourne or the Federal capital when it is created, in order to have the cases in which they are interested, determined. But as I understand this matter, if we make the Federal High Court a Court of Appeal only except as to those original matters which are provided for in the Constitution, we shall not require to bring witnesses from the different States. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has declared that if we limit the business of the court to appeals, and to those matters in which it is vested with original jurisdiction under the Constitution, the work which the court will be called upon to discharge will be very light indeed. That being so, what is to prevent the objection of the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs being met by the court of Appeal visiting the various States?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It would be more expensive to take the whole court than to take only one Judge.

Mr. THOMSON.—If we allow that these Judges will not otherwise find sufficient work to do, they will have ample opportunity for visiting the different States. Do not the Supreme Court Judges of the States go upon circuit? Why do they adopt that system? Because it was contended that justice should be taken nearer to the homes of the people. If that argument is to carry weight, and if we insist that we should reserve all disputes in matters under the control of the Federal Government to the High Court, are we not bound to provide those that use that tribunal with facilities equal to those which have been provided by the Supreme Courts of the States? That means that we must adopt the circuit system. It means that Newcastle, Goulburn, Wagga, Cobar, and other places will have as good a claim to have the High Court made accessible to them as have the States capitals and as the State Supreme Court is now. As a matter of geography, the court when sitting in some of the States capitals will be nearer to the litigants in another State than will be the court in the capital of that State itself.

Mr. HIGGINS.—At Broken Hill, for instance?

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes, and I might further instance Albury and places in the northern portion of New South Wales in that connexion. It appears to me that by establishing the High Court in the form proposed, we shall not increase the opportunities for people getting justice speedily and rapidly. We should increase those opportunities infinitely more if we conferred the jurisdiction on the States Courts, and allowed them to deal with the questions in the first place. There is a clause in the Bill providing that certain cases go from the States Courts to the High Court; and, by that, the latter should be a court of appeal to regulate and make decisions uniform and of original jurisdiction in the matters provided by the Constitution. But we should not attempt to establish in every State a duplication of our present courts to deal with the same questions of trade and commerce, with matrimonial causes, Customs questions, and bankruptcies and other matters, which at the present time are efficiently dealt with by the States Courts.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member would allow the States Supreme Courts to have all the original jurisdiction which is vested compulsorily in the Federal Court.

Mr. THOMSON.—I would give the States Courts the fullest jurisdiction, and cases could go from the States Courts to the High Court, as they may now under the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member has been told that there is no appeal from a single Judge in one case out of ten.

Mr. THOMSON.—Then there would not be an appeal from the Supreme Court in one case out of ten. Are we to imagine that each of the High Court Judges on circuit would be men so much superior to the States Courts Judges that there would be no appeal from their decisions? I cannot follow the argument that, because it is deemed well to establish a High Court, we should give the Judges plenty of work when that work is being well done by the State Judges. If suitors have the opportunity of going to either court it means that both must be prepared to deal with a larger amount of business than would otherwise be necessary, as each must be ready to handle almost the whole of the business if it chance to come to it; whereas with one court there would be no need to provide for more than the average amount of work in the particular State. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs has said that the proposal of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, is in favour of centralization and not of decentralization. The proposal is nothing of the sort. The object of the Bill is to centralize justice in each of the capitals at most, while the proposal of the honorable and learned member is not to centralize at all, but to give the jurisdiction the full reach—not only of the Supreme Courts, but to all the minor courts of each State.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Who will travel most to the inland towns—the Supreme Court Judges or the High Court Judges?

Mr. THOMSON.—I do not think it is intended that the High Court Judges shall travel to the inland towns.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—If there be only three High Court Judges they will not be able to travel at all.

Mr. THOMSON.—We have it on the authority of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne that the time of three Judges will not be fully occupied if the court is an appellate court only.

Mr. ISAACS.—A good many honorable members agree with the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, that the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court will keep it very busily occupied.

Mr. THOMSON.—In the face of such a difference of opinion between gentlemen high in the legal profession, the best course for laymen is to "go easy" and start on a small scale, because we can always enlarge, while we cannot always reduce. The United States and Canada have been quoted as authorities on both sides; but to me those quotations have not the slightest weight. In the first place, the conditions of the Constitution of the United States are different, and in the second place, we know what our Judiciary is at present, while we do not know what the Judiciary of the United States or of Canada was at the particular time. We know our own circumstances and needs, and the amount of money we already spend in this direction. I admit that our present judicial system is an admirable one, and that it costs a large sum of money, but I would rather it should cost too much and be effective, than cost little and be the reverse. It is a great system which has met our needs thoroughly, and it would be utterly unwise to abandon it and set up rival courts, which, it appears, would have almost to tout for business. The Attorney-General glories in the fact that the Federal Court will offer such superior facilities that it will attract business, but we can still keep in our hands the power of the High Court to control the decisions of the States Judges, and by giving the latter Federal jurisdiction, have, as at present, the advantage of their experience. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs also alluded to the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, whose speeches I heard with great interest and obtained much light from, as I did from those of other legal members, although I may differ from some of them in opinion. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs asked whether the honorable and learned member for Bendigo would approve of the removal of the Supreme Court circuit from that city on the score of expense. The answer to that is that there is no Supreme Court at Bendigo, and as certain cases have to be tried in that court, it is naturally desired that facilities should be provided on the spot. That argument, however, does not apply to the States, in each of which there is a Supreme Court which can be invested with Federal jurisdiction, and which has been doing the very work it is proposed to ask the High Court to do. Outside of the range which would be reached by the High Court, there are circuits of the States Supreme Courts which bring the jurisdiction nearer to the people than would the High Court. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs also alluded to the large number of subjects that would come before the High Court, subjects entering into almost all the affairs of the people of the Commonwealth. Do honorable members conceive that when we have passed laws dealing with all these subjects under the Constitution, five Judges will ever be able to handle the business, and also go on circuit throughout the States? It is absolutely ridiculous to ask the meanest lay intelligence to entertain such an idea. In each of the larger State capitals there is a Judge occupied solely with bankruptcy matters, and such a Judge could not be removed when cases have been partially heard. Then, in each of the States of New South Wales and Victoria there is a Judge almost entirely occupied with matrimonial cases, and allowing one Judge for the remaining States, three Judges must devote themselves to that work alone.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did not allude to that business.

Mr. THOMSON.—But it is proposed that the High Court shall deal with such business when we pass the necessary Acts under the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, when we pass the laws; but not if we make no provision for the exercise of such jurisdiction.

Mr. THOMSON.—Then we are to go away from the High Court principle after all. Under the powers conferred upon us by the Constitution we pass certain laws, and the High Court is to have jurisdiction in cases arising under those laws, because they are cases arising under the Constitution, or under the laws passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. But the Attorney-General tells us by interjection "When you pass other laws, you need not put them under the jurisdiction of the High Court."

Mr. DEAKIN.—I pointed out in the course of my remarks that when the Commonwealth takes control of legislation affecting bankruptcy and insolvency, we shall need to make special provision to give the High Court jurisdiction in matters arising under the laws we may pass relating to those subjects.

Mr. THOMSON.—That statement supports my argument that five Judges will be altogether insufficient for the work of the court.

Mr. DEAKIN. — For the work then conferred.

Mr. THOMSON. — There is in that statement evidence that the step which we are now taking will not be by any means the last step. We are now embarking upon an expense of which we cannot see the end, and in my opinion the only justification for it would be that it is unavoidable. But an excellent means for avoiding it already exists, a means which has met the needs of the people of Australia in the past, and of which it is ridiculous not to avail ourselves. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said that, not only would three Judges, if appointed as a Court of Appeal with the original jurisdiction provided for under the Constitution, have too little work to do, but their decisions would not carry weight, because in the State of Victoria it is not an uncommon thing — he does not say that it always happens — for six Judges to sit as a Court of Appeal. He regards it as a strange thing to accept the decision of three Judges as superior to that given by six. But if the superiority of a judgment depends upon the number of the Judges who decide the matter, we cannot stop at a court of five Judges; we must appoint at least eight, because in one of the States there is now a Bench of seven Judges.

Mr. CONROY. — And inasmuch as eight is an even number, we ought to appoint nine, in order to provide for a majority where there is a division of opinion.

Mr. THOMSON. — In my opinion it is not the number of the Judges upon the Bench that gives weight to the decision of a court. It is not even the fact that the members of the Court of Appeal are abler than the members of the court from which the appeals are made. It is that the Judges of the Court of Appeal have the advantage of the decisions and opinions of the inferior Judges upon the matters which come before them, have a longer opportunity to study the cases which are to be brought before them, and have more experience in connexion with the particular questions upon which they adjudicate. When honorable and learned members refer to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, what they do is to pick out the judgments of particular Justices. Any one of the men whose opinions they quote would probably — although in these matters it is well to have a discussion by different minds — have constituted a satisfactory Court of Appeal. I have no faith in numbers giving weight to the decision of a court. I think that a court of three would give as great satisfaction to the people as a court of twenty.

Mr. HIGGINS. — The honorable member would not provide for an appeal from a Bench of ten Judges to a single Judge!

Mr. THOMSON. — It is not unusual to appeal from more than ten persons to one umpire.

Mr. HIGGINS. — An umpire is not appointed until there is a difference of opinion. The honorable member would not provide for an appeal from ten unanimous Judges to a single Judge!

Mr. THOMSON. — I am not advocating the propriety of appointing only one Judge to the High Court, but if an appeal is not to be made from a large Bench to a small Bench, we cannot constitute a High Court with fewer than eight Judges. But in appointing three Judges we gain these advantages. First of all, we do not incur so heavy an expense in creating what is not, in any case, a complete tribunal, if we appoint three, as if we appoint five Judges. Again, if the Judges appointed have a large amount of time to themselves, after they have performed their duties as conveniently to the public as they can, that perhaps will not be a disadvantage, because it will enable them to give more study to their cases, and will provide for speedy decisions, which the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne regards as one of the rights of the subject conferred by Magna Charta. If the arguments of those who support the Bill are right, we shall not lose the opportunity of ultimately carrying out their views. If for the present we start on more modest lines than they propose, we can enlarge the original jurisdiction of the court whenever the necessity arises, if it ever does, to establish a Federal Judiciary which will take the place of our present system. But once we step out on the lines laid down in the Bill, we are committed to the fullest extent. We establish the court, and try to attract to it the cases which arise under the measures passed by us. In doing so we make more work for it, and the fact that the court is in existence, and is attracting work, will mean that we shall have demands from the people to bring its jurisdiction nearer to them. In this way we shall subsequently be required to enlarge its circuit, and an expenditure will be required the amount of which it is impossible now to name, but which will be infinitely beyond the estimate which has been given. For these reasons I support a limitation of the original jurisdiction of the court, and with such a limitation I cannot see any reason for the appointment of more than three Judges. In making this arrangement, we rob the people of nothing. They will still have that system of jurisdiction in which they have gained confidence, and which now deals with nearly all the matters for which it is proposed to establish High Courts in each State. Beyond the present judiciaries they will have, if they choose to avail themselves of it, the High Court as a Court of Appeal to equalize decisions, and to give a final Australian voice. The Privy Council will exist as a further Court of Appeal under either system. Under these circumstances we shall be neglecting the best interests of the Commonwealth, and giving ground for some of the attacks which have been made upon the Federation, if we abandon the means of obtaining justice already established amongst us; which extend not merely to the capitals of the different States, but from end to end of this vast continent.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The Attorney-General must be able to see that the Bill is still out of favour with honorable members, and I trust that he will make up his mind to withdraw it. The whole principle of the Bill is being fought over and over again in connexion with this clause. The word "jurisdiction" has been ringing in our ears, and, as if in order to more thoroughly confuse the public mind, we have had the terms "original jurisdiction" and "compulsory original jurisdiction" hurled at us from all directions. The Government succeeded in passing the Bill at the second reading stage by bringing an extraordinary amount of pressure to bear. The party for "the whole Bill and nothing but the Bill" was made up of Ministers themselves, whilst the majority of their loyal supporters belonged to what may be called the party of modification. The latter section of honorable members did not agree with the proposal to appoint five Judges, and expressed their intention to modify the Bill by reducing the strength of the proposed Bench. Surely in view of the way in which the debate has proceeded thus far, the Government must see that the Bill will probably emerge from Committee in such a mutilated form that it will be of little practical use, and that they will save the public time and money if they withdraw it at the present stage. We find, in this case, that the lawyers are differing among themselves, and, to paraphrase an old proverb, it is to be hoped that "Where lawyers differ the public may hold their own." It is true that the great majority of the lawyers in this Chamber are fighting against the establishment of the High Court or the proposed extension of its jurisdiction. The only honorable and learned members outside of the ranks of the Ministry who have supported the measure are the honorable and learned member for Indi and the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. The latter honorable and learned member may be considered the political god-father of the Government, whose duty might very well have been considered at an end when he moved the adoption of the Address in Reply.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member for Illawarra is also a supporter of the Bill.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member's support was only half-hearted.

Mr. MAUGER.—Then there is the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member for East Sydney is such a warm supporter of the Bill that he has felt constrained to absent himself from the Chamber for a fortnight. Perhaps his conscience is pricking him, and he cannot see his way to venture here. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports has asked most pathetically—"When lawyers differ, what is a poor layman to do?" My answer is—"Remain poor—if you pass this Bill." I desire to direct the attention of the Committee to some opinions which were expressed by the Minister for Trade and Customs in opposition to a Bill of the character now before us. The right honorable gentleman, when speaking at the Convention at Melbourne, in 1898, said—

We should, above all in the early stages of the Constitution of this Federation, be careful lest we involve the Commonwealth in an unnecessary expense—in expense which is altogether out of proportion to the necessities of the case. It seems to me that, although this Bill is in a preferable shape to that in which it originally saw the light, in that it contains no appropriation, within the four corners of the Constitution, of any huge sums for Judicial salaries, yet, if we do not carry an amendment, such as is now suggested (by Mr. Glynn), we shall take away from the Commonwealth a facile means of providing all that is required at least in the earliest period of the history of the Constitution, at the least possible expense.

The honorable and learned member for Indi has drawn a very pretty picture of what might take place in the High Court, but he has not shown the necessity for the tribunal. I will again quote from the speech of the Minister for Trade and Customs, who was then a lawyer in full practice, an eminent constitutional authority, and the President of the Convention.

MR. ISAACS.—Cannot the honorable member see the difference between framing a Constitution and acting upon the Constitution?

MR. WILKS.—I fully understand that I am now quoting the opinions held by Mr. Kingston, which should stand good even to-day. Mr. Kingston is reported to have said—

The fitting solution, I think, is found in the proposition of my friend, Mr. Glynn, which is that there shall be a representation of both the Chief Justice of Australia, the highest officer in the Commonwealth responsible to the Federation, and the other Judges, more numerous, and selected on account of the positions which they occupy in respect to the provinces. I would like, further, to say that I think there is nothing in the contention that the Chief Justices of the different provinces would be unwilling to accept positions of the description suggested. I know of no higher position in the gift of the Federal authority than the position of Judge of the High Court in Australia.

MR. ISAACS.—What did the Convention decide?

MR. WILKS.—I have not had time to go through the whole of the report, but I am simply giving honorable members the benefit of the remarks made by the Minister for Trade and Customs. Most of the people of Australia hope never to have to go beyond the police court, or even to reach that place, and they must be appalled at the idea that still another court is to be added to the already formidable array of tribunals at present in existence in Australia. I find that the salaries paid to the Supreme Court Judges in New South Wales amount to £21,700 per annum, whilst the annual appropriations for a similar purpose in the other States are as follow:—Victoria £18,500, Queensland £11,500, South Australia £5,400, Western Australia £5,900, and Tasmania £3,900, making a total of £66,900 for salaries alone. The list of States Judges includes 6 Chief Justices, and 22 Puisne Judges; and over and above these it is now proposed to erect a marvellous Federal combination of 5, 10, or 20 Judges. The Attorney-General apparently desires that the High Court should have extended jurisdiction, and that the Judges should tout for business against the various courts now established. They are to expose their wares like shopkeepers in order to entice litigants to leave the States Courts and intrust their business to the Federal tribunal. In view of the feeling which has been evinced towards the Bill both inside this Chamber and out of it, I shall consider it my duty to endeavour to so whittle its provisions as to make it useless. The cry for economy has been described by the Prime Minister as a miserable one, but it is miserable only to those who would like to secure a seat on the High Court Bench. All the predictions of the anti-Billites are being absolutely fulfilled.

MR. L. E. GROOM.—As a federalist the honorable member knew that a High Court would be established.

MR. WILKS.—Yes, at the proper time. Does the honorable and learned member imagine that people voted in favour of federation simply because the Constitution provided for the establishment of a High Court? I find that the total amount represented by associates' salaries, travelling expenses, &c., throughout the Commonwealth is £35,989. These figures are compiled from the States Governments Estimates for the year ended 30th June, 1902.

MR. ISAACS.—By whom?

MR. WILKS.—By a most zealous man in the interests of the public. If the honorable and learned member for Indi were possessed of half as much zeal as is that gentleman, he would be on the side of the opponents of this measure.

MR. ISAACS.—The honorable member must have his joke.

MR. WILKS.—It is no joke for the people who have to pay this money. The District and County Court Judges throughout Australia absorb £22,000, and the law officers £118,431, of which Victoria pays £20,440. The sheriffs receive £51,062. Of course, we are told that the High Court can utilize the services of the sheriffs of the various States, together with buildings which are owned by the States Governments. But I cannot accept that statement. If the High Court is to be such an exalted tribunal, how can it use second-hand officers. Are we to have a High Court, the officers of which are to be dressed up in second-hand clothes? The Masters-in-Equity throughout Australia receive £16,342, of which New South Wales contributes £7,650, and Victoria £8,692. The stipendiary magistrates draw £63,920; the expenses of petty sessions aggregate £128,024, and "miscellaneous" covers an outlay of £68,638, making a total of £571,306. That is the amount which about 700,000 adults pay for the administration of justice, exclusive of police protection. I predict that upon the establishment of this tribunal the courts will be found to overlap in their jurisdiction. Moreover, the full number of Judges constituting the High Court will not be able to go upon circuit, and will the Justices who can do so be any better qualified to give decisions upon cases which come before them than are the Supreme Court Judges of the States? I intend upon every possible occasion to oppose this Bill, with the object of destroying its efficacy. I trust that the arguments which have been advanced in favour of economy will not be again characterized as "miserable." Those ardent federalists who desire the Commonwealth to be respected, and who wish it to acquire further powers from the States, ought to remember that every extravagant act in which we indulge will be an obstacle to our progress in that direction. One reason why the High Court should not be invested with additional jurisdiction is that before a man can appeal to it his claim must exceed £300. Consequently, admission to that tribunal is not open to the masses. It is all very well to say that the Federation should be properly plumed. It sounds very exalted to say so, but the public who have to bear the expense ought to be considered. I would further point out that the Minister for Trade and Customs, when a member of the Federal Convention, advocated practically everything which the opponents of this Bill have urged to-night. If ever there was a vote recorded in this House which was uninfluenced by party considerations, it was that cast upon the second reading of this Bill, and I trust that the same feeling will prevail throughout its discussion in Committee. Now that honorable members have been released from the power of the whip—

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Nonsense.

Mr. WILKS.—It is not nonsense. They were squirming like scorpions, and Ministers themselves were openly whipping for the measure. It is well that the public should be informed of this fact. The honorable and learned member for Corinella, with a tremor in his voice, declared that for the first time in his life he was compelled to vote against his party.

Mr. MCCAY.—I stated that I voted against the Bill without any reluctance, as will be seen by a reference to Hansard.

Mr. WILKS.—I must accept the honorable and learned member's denial, as it is the parliamentary practice to do so. I am sorry that it is the parliamentary practice.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Is this a stone-wall?

Mr. WILKS.—If I thought that the Bill would be passed as it stands, I would "stone-wall" it for a fortnight. I notice that the Government whip is anxious to get the measure through. Will he be as anxious to tell his constituents that it will involve the appointment of ten, twenty, or 25 Judges? It is of no use saying that so many Judges will not be appointed. The legal members themselves, who are impartial on the subject, have exposed the whole business. They say that the cry is for more and more legal machinery, and more and more courts and Judges. So it will be in the case of the High Court. The Attorney-General himself admitted at the second reading stage that it was intended to appoint five Judges "for a start." When we give them more jurisdiction more will be wanted. The honorable member for North Sydney has stated that eight or ten will be required, and the Attorney-General did not deny it. There are so many out of the 25 I have mentioned. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, has quoted a number of eminent authorities on this question. He quoted, amongst others, that eminent American writer, Cooley. There is no better authority. The honorable and learned member for Indi, who is so well acquainted with the constitutional writers, must have had many of his opinions shattered when Cooley was quoted. Some one interjected that Mr. Dooley ought to be quoted. Mr. Dooley, who is an excellent judge of human nature, would be a good authority to quote on the present occasion. It is a pity in the interests of the Commonwealth that we have not got a Dooley here. Under cover of his humour Mr. Dooley exposes many abuses and absurdities, and he would be a powerful and useful member of this Chamber in exposing such abuses as will arise in connexion with the High Court. It was said by those who opposed federation that it was merely a game for the benefit of a gang of lawyers. I would not use such a phrase in this Chamber, but it almost deserves to be used, particularly as we have reason for believing that the appointees to the High Court will be chosen from what are called men of Parliamentary experience, acquainted with the Federal idea. What right have we to give jurisdiction to men of that character? Am I to understand that the Chief Justices of Australia—men like Sir Samuel Griffith, Sir Samuel Way, and Chief Justice Darling, who are of the very highest repute in their States—are not competent to carry out judicial duties for the Commonwealth? Am I to understand that those men are not head and shoulders above the persons alluded to as possessing parliamentary experience and acquaintance with the Federal idea? The most disinterested Judge, and one of the greatest federalists in Australia, Sir Samuel Griffith, has told us that no High Court is required yet. That is a very excellent reason for opposing the extension of this jurisdiction. The legal members of the House who have opposed this Bill are entitled to the thanks of the community. I especially allude to the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn. Some of them have voted against their party because they knew there was no necessity for the measure. I deeply regret that I have not the legal training which will enable me to oppose it as effectively as I should like to do. Why have the labour party been so significantly silent? All I have heard from them was an interjection from their leader, who said that for constitutional reasons, constitutional questions ought to be settled by the High Court. Surely we have a right to expect a more definite expression of opinion on the subject from them. Probably the honorable member for Bland is possessed of information to the effect that this High Court would confer benefits upon the section of the community which he represents.

Mr. Wilks.

Mr. WATSON.—Will the honorable member ask the leader of the Opposition what is his opinion on the matter?

Mr. WILKS.—I believe that the leader of the Opposition, being a busy man, did not look into the question sufficiently carefully. Now that he sees the enormous expense that will be imposed upon the public by the constitution of the High Court, he may take a different view. But why do not the labour party express themselves more clearly?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Individual members of the party are in favour of the Bill, but not the whole party.

Mr. WILKS.—How many of the members of the party favour the measure?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Six are against it and ten are for it.

Mr. WILKS.—When they are so equally divided, before extending the jurisdiction of the High Court, the benefit of the doubt ought to be given to so strong a minority.

Mr. SPENCE.—I expect that they will all vote for the Bill after the honorable member has finished!

Mr. WILKS.—Out of deference to the honorable member for Darling, who expresses his opinion of my speech in such a nice manner, I think I shall conclude the argument. I believe that the honorable member voted for the Bill. Now, perhaps, he is prepared to vote against it. If I have changed his opinion I have done good work.

Amendment (by Mr. DEAKIN) agreed to—

That the words, "(c) Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," be omitted.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I should like to point out that in effect we are now considering whether we shall have not only three or five Judges, but even a greater number. At the Melbourne Federal Convention in 1898 two members of the present Ministry actually voted to reduce the number of Judges from five to three.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As a minimum.

Mr. CONROY.—These two members of the Ministry were the Minister for Trade and Customs and the Treasurer, and the reasons they gave for their votes were excellent. The words of the Minister for Trades and Customs on that occasion were—Another reason . . . is the necessity for economy. We should be . . . careful lest we involve the Commonwealth in unnecessary expense.

The Treasurer said—

I am of opinion that this court will for many a long day have little or nothing to do. I cannot see where the work is going to come from . . . I believe the Federal Parliament will be of the opinion that a Chief Justice and two Judges will be all that are required for many a long day, and when the necessity arises, they will have full power to increase the number.

The reasons given by those two honorable gentlemen are as good to-day as they were then, and it is an important fact that the number of Judges was reduced from five to three.

Mr. ISAACS.—By one vote; and Queensland was not represented at the Convention, while Western Australia was doubtful.

Mr. CONROY.—We cannot get away from the fact that two members of the Ministry, both legal men, and anxious for economy, expressed the opinion that three Judges would be sufficient. There is no necessity to labour the point, but honorable members ought to be reminded that when they vote for the retention of this clause, they, in effect, are voting not only for five Judges, but for a great many more, even to the number of ten. As far back as 1891, the number of Judges actually proposed by Sir Henry Parkes was ten, and if that number was required for the jurisdiction then proposed it is required to day.

Mr. POYNTON (South Australia).—I regret very much that the Attorney-General will not concede the request made by a great many honorable members, because he must have seen, from the tone of the debate, that the opposition to this particular portion of the Bill has not come from this side alone. If we create this additional work for the High Court we shall to that extent relieve the States Courts, and we should be very careful not to duplicate jurisdiction which is already satisfactorily exercised by the latter. The Constitution is mandatory up to a certain point; but I believe that the creation of powers for the High Court at the expense of the States Courts would be resented throughout Australia, because, so far from being a decrease, it means an increase in expenditure. In Australia, with a handful of people, the Judicial system to-day costs close upon £600,000 per annum, or nearly as much as the cost of the whole of our defence forces. Under the circumstances it is no wonder that outside there is agitation for economy. The honorable member for North Sydney has shown in as good a speech as has been delivered on the Bill, that the proposal of the Government is wrong "lock, stock, and barrel." While I believe a court of some kind is essential, I am of opinion that we have Judges in Australia quite capable of exercising the jurisdiction, and that their services ought to be utilized. But the decision come to last week has made that course impossible, and honorable members are reasonable when they consent to give the court the powers provided in the Constitution, but no further powers.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—No doubt honorable members are anxious to proceed to a division, but this is a question of such vital importance to the whole of Australia that it is well to discuss it more in detail. I do not claim to speak with any legal knowledge as to the merits of the different proposals which have been made, but I can claim to be able to express an opinion as to the effect the Bill will have, in its economic aspect, on the general community. As the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has already pointed out, the Government proposal means, simply, bringing a second dentist to operate when one is ample, and creating a new and increasing permanent item of expenditure. This is only the beginning of a number of similar proposals to be considered this session, and I desire at this, and every stage of the Bill, to enter my emphatic protest against incurring this increased permanent expenditure. Gentlemen whom we recognise as authorities have told us that there is justification for the Bill, while other equally competent authorities have, with as much emphasis, informed us that no justification exists. When doctors differ in a matter of the kind, the best course is to place the patient in charge of the most competent nurse to be found; and it is time the laymen of the Committee exercised their right to devote a little time to the consideration of what is the proper course to pursue. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, it was the aspiration of a great many Australians, as represented in the Convention, that we should have an Australian Court of final appeal. The Convention in their wisdom did not see fit to carry out that desire. When they drew up the original draft of the Constitution they provided for the establishment of a court to deal with all Australian matters, but having framed that elaborate machinery to deal with conditions which really did not exist, they forgot when putting the finishing touches on the Constitution, to reduce it in any way. Some of the representative members of the Convention saw fit to point out, towards the close of its proceedings, that in their judgment it was unnecessary then to create an elaborate court, involving considerable expense, to discharge functions which were already being carried out by a very efficient tribunal. That fact has been repeated this evening by authorities in this Committee, and nothing I could say would emphasize the point they have made. I have heard no argument which would justify me in supporting at the present time the establishment of the High Court with all this elaborate machinery for original jurisdiction. It has been pointed out that it will not cause justice to be more speedily or cheaply obtainable by any citizen of the Commonwealth. That being so, I am at a loss to understand the reasons which impel the Attorney-General to follow the course he is now pursuing. It may be that the ideals held by him, as well as by the Prime Minister, are altogether above the level of the average citizen of Australia, and that we cannot follow them; but we all know that States Governments are restricted at present in their operations by their financial position. That being so it behoves us when dealing with exactly the same people to consider whether we should not hesitate before imposing any further burdens upon them until the necessity of doing so is established. We have had statements made from different stand-points, with a view of showing that the necessity exists, but no evidence of sufficient force has been given to justify what has been termed a nominal expenditure of £30,000 on a High Court. That cost within a few years will increase to at least £50,000 per annum. It may not appear to be much to a Government who are dealing with a revenue of millions per annum, but it is this fixing of permanent expenditure that in the past has proved a source of trouble to the States Governments.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Cannot the States correspondingly reduce the expenditure on their Judiciaries?

Mr. KENNEDY.—That hope was held out to many people when we were asked to accept federation.

Mr. WILKS.—It was a bait.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Exactly. I was foolish enough to plead that it would be possible to reduce the cost of the States judicial systems.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—The bait will not take this time.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No. I am going to have something more substantial.

Mr. McDONALD.—Kyabram has decided against this proposal.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The question is not what Kyabram has done; and as a matter of fact I have not been an enthusiastic supporter of the Kyabram proposals. The only argument put forward in support of this Bill is that advanced by the Attorney-General, that the judgments of this court may at some future time attract business to it. Is that a sufficient ground to support the creation of a court upon which the present expenditure will be nearly £30,000 per annum? It offers no justification whatever. We have also to remember that this is not the only item of permanent expenditure with which the Government propose to deal this session. We have other infants coming along in swaddling clothes—the Inter-State Commission, for example.

Mr. McCAY.—And the appointment of a High Commissioner.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That appointment may be absolutely necessary, but I am not dealing with it now. These various proposals will involve a very considerable expenditure, and we must deal with each on its merits. In this matter it would be well to hasten slowly. With all due deference to the Attorney-General, I would appeal to him to accept the suggestion which has been thrown out, and to agree to the omission of the clause extending, so to speak, the jurisdiction of the court. Unless that is done we shall have to fight the Bill right through. As a Government supporter I feel very strongly about this matter, and it was with considerable reluctance that I opposed the second reading of the Bill. I have no little sympathy with the Government generally, and because I have a full knowledge of the facts, I am in sympathy with some of their administrative acts which have met with considerable condemnation on the part of the press. It will be seen, therefore, that it is with some reluctance that I felt impelled to enter my protest against the incurring of this expenditure; and I appeal to the Attorney-General, even at this stage, to say that he will accept the suggestion.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We are all ready for a division.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not feel ready for a division to be taken on this question. During the second-reading debate I pointed out that honorable members sitting behind a Government are often induced to support the second reading of a measure because of a desire to avoid giving that Government a slap in the face; but during the complications which may subsequently ensue in Committee, those who are opposed to the Bill generally, but who have voted for the second reading because of these considerations, are frequently defeated. That is why I took the first opportunity to enter my protest against this proposal. It has already been pointed out that the five Judges whom it is proposed to appoint would not meet the requirements of this clause. We have been told that instead of a court of five Judges, with a maximum expenditure of £30,000 a year, we shall require a court of ten Judges, with an expenditure amounting to anything between £50,000 and £100,000 a year. However, as the hour is late, and I do not wish to detain honorable members, I shall take the next opportunity that offers for expressing my opinion on this subject.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I think it was inevitable that the debate on this clause should become practically a second reading debate, because the position of affairs has changed since a majority carried the Bill into Committee. We are now considering the details of the measure, and have come to the parting of the ways, and I feel it necessary to occupy a few minutes in explaining my own position. When the Bill was introduced last session, I confess that I did not know how to vote in regard to it. I am one of those who look upon the Constitution as worthy almost of veneration, and I was prepared to go to almost any lengths to carry its provisions into effect. I looked upon the establishment of the High Court in some form as absolutely necessary to keep faith with the framers of the Constitution, and I was, therefore, constrained to be very careful how I committed myself to take any part against the Bill. I was then prepared to agree to the appointment of the Chief Justices of the States as an interim arrangement during the initial stages of Federation. But after I had committed myself to that temporary expedient, the Government practically withdrew the measure. Since then so long a period has elapsed that it seems necessary to me to make some permanent provision to obtain an interpretation of the difficult points which have already arisen, and which must arise in the future in regard to the meaning of the Constitution. Therefore, I listened very carefully to the speech of the Attorney-General, and, in common with other lay members, derived great assistance from the able statements of the other legal members who spoke. Having listened carefully to those speeches, I came to the conclusion that the creation of a High Court to exercise the functions contemplated by the Constitution was inevitable, and to that extent I am entirely in accord with the proposal of the Government. The Attorney-General, the Prime Minister, and the honorable and learned member for Indi demonstrated very fully the absolute indispensability of a High Court of some kind, and therefore I paired for the second reading of the Bill. But now that we have entered upon the consideration of the details of the measure, I am face to face with a number of minor difficulties. In keeping faith with the Constitution, we may go further than its provisions require us to go, and create a body which will be too expensive for our present purposes and circumstances. However, as I understand that it is the wish of the Government to report progress now, I will continue my speech to-morrow.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Senator PEARCE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Has the attention of the Government been directed to the statement made by Mr. Clayton T. Mason, Collector of Customs, Western Australia, in his letter of 27th February, 1903, re imported boiler-makers under contract, to the effect that "his staff is very small and over-worked," that "he has no facilities for boarding vessels," and, in consequence, is not able to efficiently administer the Immigration Restriction Act, these statements being repeated in his letter of 20th April?

2. Will the Government take steps to inquire as to the accuracy of these statements?

3. If, on inquiry, they are found to be accurate, will they take steps to remedy the alleged state of affairs?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The Minister for Trade and Customs reports that the staff is sufficient for Customs' purposes, but the Minister for External Affairs is considering whether it will not be necessary to make further provision by which the duties in connexion with the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act may be performed without any risk to its efficiency.

TRADE PREFERENCE.

Senator HIGGS asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Has the Prime Minister seen the following statements published in the press of the 17th June, 1903:—"The exact terms of the cable message recently sent by Mr. Deakin, Federal Attorney-General, to the editor of the British Australasian, on the subject of Mr. Chamberlain's proposals, were disclosed yesterday, as follows:—"Federal and all State Governments approve Chamberlain's proposals. Only extreme section free-traders oppose. Immense majority assured when put before the country. Personally consider preferential tariffs indispensable foundation of empire unity?"

2. Is this cable message true?

3. Were the State Governments consulted before the above message was sent?

4. Has the Prime Minister seen the following reference by the Premier of Victoria (Mr. Irvine):—"Whether Mr. Deakin is correctly reported or not, the matter cannot be allowed to pass without comment, inasmuch as to do so would imply acquiescence in the view that this Government concurs in Mr. Chamberlain's policy. The Government has not expressed any view either for or against the suggested policy, and it is intended to communicate that fact to the editor of the British Australasian, through the Agent-General for the State?"

5. Will the Prime Minister be good enough to state what are Mr. Chamberlain's proposals?

6. Are the members of the Federal Government agreed on the details of preferential trade so far as they have been outlined by Mr. Chamberlain?

7. Will the Prime Minister give the Parliament an opportunity of discussing the proposals at an early date?

8. Until Parliament discusses the proposals, is it wise for a member of the Ministry to give the British electors the impression that the public of the Commonwealth are—with the exception of certain free-traders—favorable to preferential trade?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. The Attorney-General states that the report is correct, and it is a correct expression of his personal opinion.

3. No.

4. Yes.

5. The fullest statement of these proposals which I have seen is the report in this morning's newspapers of a speech delivered by Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham.

6. No: as the details have not been outlined by Mr. Chamberlain, so far as the Government is aware.

7. Parliament will be consulted when it is considered that the proper time has arrived.

8. Mr. Deakin's message was the reply to a question telegraphed by the British Australasian, a paper published in London. It embodied his personal opinion, which, in the judgment of the Prime Minister, he was free to give.

STANDING ORDERS.

In Committee (consideration resumed from 17th June, vide page 1011):

Standing Order 421—

The following motions are not open to debate shall be moved without argument or opinion offered, and shall be forthwith put by the President from the Chair and the vote taken:—

(a) That the Senate do now adjourn.

(b) That the Senate do now divide.

(c) That this debate be now adjourned.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I move—

That paragraph (a) be omitted.

During the past two years we have not been permitted by the temporary standing orders to debate the final motion for adjournment. In the majority of British Legislatures the rule is to permit a member, on that motion, to mention matters which require redress. At the present time we can only mention a matter which appears to be of urgency, by going through the undesirable process of moving the adjournment of the Senate, interrupting the whole business, and perhaps provoking a debate which may last hours on a question which might fairly be dealt with in a few moments at the end of the sitting. It must be patent to honorable senators that it is an undesirable thing to be continually upsetting the whole course of business by formally moving the adjournment of the Senate at the commencement of the sitting. I believe that it would make for the saving of time if we had, as the members of other Legislatures have, the opportunity of dealing with matters of grievance and urgency on the final motion for adjournment.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster General).—I presume that the members of the Standing Orders Committee had some good reason for putting this provision in the rule, and I can hardly understand its being struck out without a word from some member of that body. It appears to me that if the other two motions are to be put without argument or opinion offered, it is necessary to impose that limitation also in the case of the motion for the adjournment of the Senate. The right to debate the motion should not be given unless it is carefully safeguarded, and then it might, on special occasions, be of advantage in enabling honorable senators to ask questions, as they do sometimes. If it could be moved at any time and debated we might as well give up all attempts to regulate business. I should like to hear some opinions offered before the question is put.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I have stated once or twice, and I think that the statement is incontrovertible, that all these standing orders are designed to introduce the most convenient practice for getting on with the business of the country. For over two years this rule has been in force. Has it led to any inconvenience? Has it not worked well? If that is so, why not leave it as it is? I do not for a moment suggest that it involves any great principle. The majority of the standing orders are regulations for the conduct of our own business. I have lived under this rule for 35 years, and have never known it to work inconvenience. I do not think that any one can say that it has worked inconvenience in the Senate. Before the business of the day is called on, honorable senators have an opportunity of bringing forward any question which they think ought to be submitted at once. Is not that sufficient? They will also have the opportunity of ventilating any grievance which they may have whenever a Bill which the Senate may not amend comes from the other House. Is not that sufficient? I ask the Committee to consider this matter simply from the business point of view. Shall we get on better with the rule or without it? If the motion is to be debated, it certainly will be very inconvenient to some senators, especially on a Friday. I think that we should consider not only the convenience of the Senate, but the convenience of its members generally. There is no doubt that every senator must put aside his own convenience if the business of the Senate demands it. But will it not give unnecessary opportunities for debate if the paragraph is omitted? I hope that the rule will stand as printed.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—Although I am a member of the Standing Orders Committee, still I am unfortunately in conflict with Senator Baker on this question. When I found that under the temporary rules it was impossible to debate a matter on the final motion of adjournment I was quite astounded, for I had no idea that the Parliament of any State had such a rule in its code. Senator Baker has said that he has lived under the rule for a great many years. Those of us who come from New South Wales, and I believe those who represent Victoria and Queensland, have lived under an entirely different rule. That fact might be regarded as a very strong reason why the amendment should be carried. It is perfectly true, as Senator Baker has said, that if an important matter arises which requires debate and consideration, a senator may move the adjournment of the Senate at the beginning of the sitting. But it should be borne in mind that only one such motion can be moved on the same day, and that it must relate to one subject matter. In the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, where the adjournment was very frequently moved at the beginning of the sitting, the standing order had to be altered so as to provide that it could only be moved—

For the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, the subject of which shall be first stated to the Speaker in writing.

A small box resembling a ballot-box was provided by the Speaker for the reception of these notices, and on some occasions as many as eight or ten notices would be placed in the box by honorable members who desired to debate certain questions. He had to take by chance one of these motions out of the box. The number of matters of urgency which members wanted to have discussed was large. It is true that they had an opportunity of discussing them at the close of the business of the day, but they thought it better to take an earlier opportunity. Unless a matter is of very great importance it is not wise to bring it forward in the early part of a sitting, when there are great inducements to talk which do not exist later in the day. A member who has a question which he wants to have discussed often says—"I do not like to waste three hours of the time of the House in debating this subject and delaying matters of importance; I shall have an opportunity at the close of the sitting at 10 or 11 o'clock to make known my opinions." At that time the Government may be able to give the member the satisfaction he requires. It also has to be remembered that at a late period of the evening an honorable member will probably condense his remarks and speak only for five or ten minutes, whereas earlier in the day he would be inclined to take his full half-hour. The question will not be debated by others at such great length as would be the case earlier in the day. In this way the practice which I advocate conserves time and gives half-a-dozen members an opportunity to speak briefly upon subjects in which they are interested before the adjournment. Of course there are other opportunities of dealing with subjects of importance, but the bringing of them under the notice of the House on the motion for the adjournment has the effect of saving time. Take the case of a member who makes himself a bore and a nuisance by frequently moving the adjournment. At the close of a sitting it is possible to count him out. He will then have had his opportunity, and the subject will be closed. In New South Wales a subject that had been once discussed on the motion for the adjournment could not be discussed again in the same session. I presume that we shall adopt that rule also. Senator Baker has mentioned the inconvenience of the sittings being prolonged on Friday afternoons, when many honorable senators wish to get away by train to South Australia and New South Wales. I should have no objection, speaking personally, to amending the standing orders in such a way as to provide that on Friday afternoons there should be no debate on the motion for the adjournment. We should thus conserve the interests of honorable senators who wish to get away earlier in the day on Friday, and should not unduly restrict the opportunities of others to discuss matters of importance. I hope that the Committee will accept the amendment with the modification that it shall not apply on Fridays.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—If only upon the score of convenience, I have no hesitation in supporting Senator Neild's amendment. It is very convenient to be able, upon the motion for the adjournment, to lay before the Senate matters of importance. It may not be as convenient to do so earlier in the day. There are occasions when matters of urgency arise during the day, and there is no opportunity of discussing them, unless latitude is given in the way suggested. I was very much surprised when we commenced business in the Senate to find that no latitude of this character was given to honorable senators. The rule which prevailed in the Victorian Legislative Assembly was a good one—that motions for the adjournment at the commencement of a sitting must be supported by at least twelve members rising in their places. But it was always permissible upon the motion for the adjournment at the close of a sitting to discuss grievances or questions of importance in connexion with the business of the country. I think that is a good rule. I agree with all that has been said by Senators Neild and Gould. I believe that the proposed practice will save time, because at the end of the day honorable senators will not be inclined to go as fully into matters as they would do if there were more time at their disposal. I shall support the amendment.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I wish to make a remark in reply to what Senator Baker has said with reference to the opportunities we have of discussing questions on Money Bills. It will be within the recollection of honorable senators—certainly it is within my recollection—that the President has pulled up honorable senators in attempting to discuss public questions on such Bills. He pulled me up when I was discussing a matter of public interest in connexion with the Customs administration for instance. On one occasion I had to argue that the Bill before us was one for raising money, and that I was justified in discussing the expenditure of the money so raised. I refer to that simply to show that we have not any great amount of latitude to discuss questions of a general character upon Money Bills. With all respect to Senator Baker, I would point out that we are not bound to slavishly follow the practice of the South Australian Legislature, merely because we have been using South Australian standing orders for two years. Why are we passing new standing orders at all if we are not to improve or alter the past practice? We are are only wasting time. Let us tear the document up, scatter the work of the Standing Orders Committee to the four winds, and proceed with something else. We also might as well copy the South Australian statutes and make none of our own. I protest against the idea that because we have done something in the past we must never alter it. At that rate we should never have had the Federation; we should have been content with the old system. We have already, in the standing orders which we have adopted, made an immense innovation upon the old practice in allowing three speeches to be made by the mover of a motion; at any rate, the new standing order seems to me capable of being read in that way. Hitherto the mover of a motion has had the right to reply, but not to speak to an amendment. Therefore we have gone back on our former practice, and on this fetish of the South Australian standing orders. It is a perfect fetish to some honorable senators. No doubt the South Australian standing orders are in many respects admirable, as is shown by the fact that we are taking extracts from them wholesale. But if we worship the sun, surely we may also recognise that the sun has some spots upon it; and when we have an opportunity of removing the spots from the brilliant orb of the South Australian standing orders, we ought to do so. I have moved this amendment with a view of removing one of those sun spots, and of conserving the time of the Senate. I am quite willing, however, if it be the general desire, to alter my amendment in the direction indicated by Senator Gould, so as to meet the convenience of those who desire to leave Melbourne on Friday afternoons.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I do not think there is anything very serious to argue about. The sense of the Committee is in favour of Senator Neild's amendment. A great number of us have a large amount of admiration for the South Australian standing orders, but we are not so keen about them as Senator Neild may imagine. I, for one, have no fear of any serious abuse in connexion with a suggestion which, to my mind, is an improvement; because I believe that no senator would have the hardihood to take advantage of a provision like this to provoke a discussion at a late hour of the evening. If the Government perceived any danger of a senator embracing such an opportunity to "slate" them, all they would have to do would be to keep the business going until the last train was about to start, and then everybody would be anxious to get away. It would be almost impossible if, at half-past eleven, a senator got up to discuss a serious grievance, to keep a quorum. There would be a count-out very soon. In that way there would be a means of checking any abuse. If a senator wishes to bring forward a grievance which is worthy of being debated, he ought to have an opportunity, and the most convenient time would be on the motion for the adjournment. I do not think that any alteration should be made in the case of Friday afternoons. The amendment should apply all round. If a senator wishes to bring forward a grievance on a Friday afternoon he has as much right to do so then as on a Thursday evening. The amendment can do no harm and should be allowed to be carried as it stands.

Senator DRAKE.—I wish to draw Senator Neild's attention to the fact that Standing Order 182 gives any honorable senator the opportunity of speaking upon a subject which is not relevant to a Money Bill. He may not have noticed that we have already agreed to this standing order, which says that—

In Bills which the Senate may not amend, the question "That this Bill be now read a first time" may be debated, and the debate need not be relevant to the subject matter of such Bill.

That gives an opportunity, every time a Bill which the Senate may not amend comes down, to discuss any subject.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Perhaps once a month.

Senator DRAKE.—That, I think, should be sufficiently often for an all-round discussion upon grievances. I mention this in order to show that honorable senators are not so entirely without opportunity for discussing subjects generally as might be imagined from what has been said. I hope honorable senators thoroughly understand what will be the effect of this amendment if it is carried.

Standing Order 423—

If the motion "That the Senate do now divide" be carried, the Senate shall vote on the question immediately before it, without further debate or amendment; but if the motion to divide be lost the debate should be resumed where it was interrupted.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—In order to bring this into line with the standing order dealing with this matter in Committee, as we have amended it, I move—

That the following words be added—"Provided that a vote on the question that the Senate do now divide shall require at least thirteen affirmative votes."

Honorable senators having already agreed to a similar amendment, it is unnecessary that I should repeat what has already been said.

Standing Order 428—

If any senator—

- (a) persistently and wilfully obstructs the business of the Senate; or
- (b) is guilty of disorderly conduct; or
- (c) uses objectionable words, and refuses to either explain same to the satisfaction of the President, or withdraw such words and apologize for their use; or
- (d) persistently and wilfully refuses to conform to the standing orders, or any one of them; or
- (e) persistently and wilfully disregards the authority of the Chair;

the President may report to the Senate that such senator has committed an offence.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I intend to ask the Committee to amend this standing order by the omission of the words, "either explain same to the satisfaction of the President, or withdraw such words and apologize for their use," with a view to inserting in lieu thereof the words "withdraw such words." My object is to allow an honorable senator who has been named, to offer an explanation or apology in all cases. It will be seen that under the standing order an honorable senator is only given an opportunity of offering an apology and explanation under paragraph (c), and I think he should have that opportunity under all the paragraphs. I must ask the Committee to recollect that when these standing orders were reported, the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives had not reported their standing orders. They have since reported them, and it will be found that they have altered the practice. The practice they recommend is that when a member of the House has been named, he shall in all cases be entitled to stand up in his place and explain or apologize. I think that it is advisable for several reasons that we should follow the recommendation of the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives in this matter. In the first place what they propose is not so drastic as what is here proposed, and in the next place it is advisable that the standing orders of both Houses should be similar upon a question like this. In the third place I think that it is possible we may save a long debate if we permit latitude in these cases to any honorable senator who is named to explain his conduct. It is quite true that the conduct objected to has been in the view and hearing of honorable senators, and it may therefore, perhaps, be considered superfluous from one point of view to ask for an explanation. But I think it cannot do very much harm to permit an honorable senator who is named to make an explanation. I confess that I have altered my personal opinion upon this standing order since the Standing Orders Committee reported. Speaking for myself, and not for the Standing Orders Committee, I perhaps did not allow sufficient weight to the consideration that we have only 36 members of the Senate as against 678 members in the House of Commons. This is the House of Commons rule, but what might be wise and even necessary for a House of 678 members might be objectionable in a House of 36. There is another consideration, that judging by the past, these standing orders are not required at all, because the conduct of honorable senators has been such that there has never been even a suspicion that any honorable senator on either side could have been named. It is however, advisable to have such a standing order as this for the future. But I think we might make it a little milder than it is at present. I therefore move—

That the words "either explain same to the satisfaction of the President, or," in paragraph (c), be omitted.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—This is an important matter, and I should like to know exactly what is proposed. What does the honorable and learned senator propose to insert in lieu of the words which he suggests should be omitted? Google

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—Nothing at all, because I propose when we come to Standing Order 430 to include these words—"When any senator has been reported as having committed an offence, he shall be called upon to stand up in his place and make any explanation or apology he may think fit."

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER) agreed to—

That the words "and apologize for their use," in paragraph (c), be omitted.

Amendment agreed to.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Order 429 agreed to.

Standing Order 430—

When any senator has been reported as having committed an offence, a motion may immediately be moved—"That such senator be suspended from the sitting of the Senate." No amendment, adjournment, or debate shall be allowed on such motion, which shall be immediately put by the President.

Amendments (by Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER) agreed to—

That the words, "He shall be called upon to stand up in his place, and make any explanation or apology he may think fit, and afterwards," be inserted after the word "offence," line 2.

That the word "immediately," line 2, be omitted.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The provision that no amendment, adjournment, or debate shall be allowed on such a motion seems to me to be a very arbitrary method of dealing with the matter.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It is better that there should be no debate. It would only result in an acrimonious discussion.

Senator PEARCE.—Is it not intended that the senator who moves the suspension of an honorable senator shall be allowed to state his reasons?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—No.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Order 431—

If any senator be suspended, his suspension on the first occasion shall be for the remainder of that day's sitting; on the second occasion, for one week; and on the third or any subsequent occasion, for one month.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—I should like to ask Senator Baker if there is any reason why the latter portion of the standing order should be so arbitrary. I have no intention of contesting it, but I think a little more discretion might be allowed. Under the standing order as proposed, it is imperative that the suspension on a third or any subsequent occasion shall be for one month. I should like to hear whether honorable senators do not think that some discretion in the matter should be given to the Senate.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I remind honorable senators that it is a very serious thing indeed for the President to name an honorable senator, and it will not be done except under the very greatest provocation, because if the President named an honorable senator, and a motion for his suspension were not carried by the Senate, he would be placed in a very difficult position. During the time I occupied the position of President of the Legislative Council in South Australia—eleven years—I only named a member of the Council once, and Senators Charleston and McGregor can certify that there was immense provocation, and that the legislative councillor concerned was not named without good reason. Here we have the certainty that no honorable senator will be named without the greatest provocation, and he should not be named unless he has wilfully and persistently disobeyed the orders of the Chair, and infringed the standing orders. But if he persists in such conduct for a third time he certainly should be punished. Business would be impossible if some punishment were not meted out. We provide that for the first offence an honorable senator shall be suspended for the remainder of the sitting.

Senator DAWSON.—That may be the worst offence of all.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—It may be; but if an honorable senator habitually misconducts himself, surely he ought to be punished. I do not know whether there is any great magic in the provision for one month's suspension for a third offence, but that is the period prescribed in the proposed standing orders of the House of Representatives. It is advisable to have the standing orders of both Houses identical if possible in regard to this question.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—It is extremely undesirable that this standing order should pass as it stands. I hold that view, because we are placed in a rather peculiar position. If an honorable senator were suspended for a month, the State which he represented would be deprived of its full measure of representation for that period, and that is a consideration which ought to weigh with us.

Senator FRASER.—That suspension would probably be an advantage to the State.

Senator STEWART.—That is a matter which the State concerned would be best fitted to judge. I think that the ends of justice would be served if an honorable senator were suspended for each offence for the remainder of the sitting. I do not think that we should go further. If an honorable senator were guilty of habitual misbehaviour, his constituents would be the proper judges to determine what should be done with him. If we have the right to deprive any State of its full measure of representation for any considerable period, we ought not to exercise it. I trust that the Committee will take these considerations into account, and amend the standing order accordingly.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—There is a great deal of force in the contention put forward by Senator Stewart, that a State should not be deprived of its full measure of representation for one month. I move—

That the words "one month," line 5, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "a fortnight."

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—The members of the Standing Orders Committee must have been led to adopt a standing order of this kind owing to some unhappy experience with regard to certain persons in the Commonwealth. They seem to be under the impression that, instead of dealing with honorable senators, they are dealing with a lot of common criminals—people who go round and steal, or who are probably confirmed drunkards.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator really does not mean that.

Senator HIGGS.—I cannot understand why the provision that the Senate shall deal with each offence on its merits was not allowed to stand. Why should any particular sentence be provided in this standing order?

Senator PLAYFORD.—If we were to substitute the word "may" for the word "shall," I think that would meet the case.

Senator HIGGS.—If that alteration were made, the standing order would not be so objectionable. It would be a disgrace to the Senate to have a standing order such as is now proposed. Honorable senators, with the exception, perhaps, of Senator Fraser, cannot think that an honorable senator who has the confidence of the people of the State which sent him here, with a considerable backing of votes, is likely to offend in such a way that he ought to be sentenced to a month's suspension, or to what would be practically a month's imprisonment. I do not entertain such a poor opinion of the elect of the Commonwealth. The standing order should not be agreed to.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—This standing order is supposed to work automatically, and the period of suspension should be stated definitely, instead of being left to the Senate for determination when a case occurs. If the amendment suggested by Senator Playford, and approved by Senator Higgs, that the Senate "may" suspend an offending member for a month or a fortnight, were made, the matter would necessarily involve a debate which would probably be very acrimonious, and extend over a considerable period, to the detriment of our general business. It would be much better to have some specific punishment fixed. Senator Stewart's proposal, that a man should be suspended only for the remainder of the sitting, would not act satisfactorily. If an honorable senator were suspended to-night, for example, he would attend to-morrow, and might be prepared to create another scene. He would be again suspended, and that state of affairs might go on from day to day.

Senator STEWART.—Why should it not be so?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Because we desire to conserve the time of the Senate. If an honorable senator became so objectionable he would not be of much service to his constituents, and probably, as Senator Fraser has said, those constituents would be much better served by his absence from the Senate. The Senate has power to expel an honorable senator for misconduct, but is it not better that we should have certain specific rules which will lead to no debate when a matter of this kind is being dealt with, than to have a provision which would necessarily involve debate, and might end in a representative of the Government having to propose the expulsion of the honorable senator?

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable and learned senator think that a month's suspension should be provided?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD. — I adhere to that provision, because it is similar to one contained in the standing orders of the House of Representatives, and because it is generally adopted. Take the case of an honorable senator who happened to offend to-day. He would be suspended for the remainder of the sitting. If he were a sensible man he would realize that he should not have behaved in the way which led up to his punishment; but if he misbehaved again, that misbehaviour would be deliberate, and under the standing order he would be subject to further punishment. I think it is necessary to superadd the punishment to be inflicted in a case in which an honorable senator constantly offends. Whether the punishment for the third offence should be a month or a fortnight might be left to the discretion of the Senate. I am inclined to leave the standing order as it is, but if it is altered as suggested I shall not complain.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I should like to ask the President whether he thinks that the Senate possesses an inherent power of expulsion apart from the standing orders?

Senator DOBSON.—Certainly it does.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I assume that it has that power, but Senator Gould's remarks seemed to imply that we should have to take special power under the standing orders.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I have no doubt as to the power of the Senate to expel an honorable senator if it thinks fit to do so.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Then I do not think we need trouble about providing for frequent misconduct on the part of an honorable senator. If an honorable senator were punished for misbehaviour twice, it would be right to expel him—if two lessons were not sufficient for him, it would be about time for him to go. I would not pile up penalties under the impression that any honorable senator is likely to be continually disorderly. I take it that there will never be a case of disorder except when an honorable senator is under the influence of some special excitement. We know that men sometimes give way to temper, and create scenes. It happens all over the world, and the Senate is not likely to be any more immaculate than is any other legislative body. But it is impossible to imagine that there will be any persistent misconduct on the part of an honorable senator sent here by the whole body of electors of a State. We ought not to burden our standing orders with regulations imposing penalties under the impression that honorable senators will misconduct themselves intentionally and persistently. I protest against loading the standing orders with any proposal of the kind.

Senator SAUNDERS (Western Australia).—I think it would be well to allow the standing order to remain as it is. If an honorable senator is guilty of misbehaviour, he deserves to be suspended for the day for the first offence. As the President has said, such a punishment is by no means severe. The standing order provides that for a second offence an honorable senator shall be suspended for a week. No doubt an honorable senator so punished would recognise the true import of that suspension, but if he offended a third time, one month's suspension would not be too great a penalty. The knowledge that he was liable to a month's suspension for misbehavior would prevent any honorable senator from behaving in a disorderly manner. We have to provide standing orders which will stand for all time, for it is highly undesirable that we should be continually tinkering with them. It is our duty to look at the matter from every point of view, and to endeavour to make standing orders which will not require amendment. In these circumstances, I think it would be far better to agree to the standing order as submitted.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I desire that the standing order should be amended at a point earlier than that named by Senator Walker.

Senator WALKER.—By leave of the Senate I shall temporarily withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I move—

That the words "on the first occasion" be omitted.

If the amendment is agreed to I shall move a further amendment so as to make the standing order read as follows:—

If any senator be suspended his suspension shall be for such period as the Senate may terminate.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—That would give rise to discussion and to a great deal of unpleasantness.

Senator STEWART.—The honorable and learned senator does not appear to realize the importance of taking such a step as suspending an honorable senator for a single moment from the performance of his duty.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I do.

Senator STEWART.—Let each offence be dealt with on its merits. I wish to leave the fixing of the punishment to the Senate. Only yesterday an honorable senator actually suggested that the members of the labour party ought to be both gagged and flogged. If those words are not objectionable, I do not know what words can be objectionable. We ought to approach the consideration of this question in a broad spirit. We must look beyond the senator to the people whom he represents. In suspending a senator for a sitting, or a week, or a month, we are not only punishing him, but doing an act which is of very much more consequence—depriving the people who sent him here of their proper share of representation for the period of his punishment. We ought to give the advantage to the people who send a senator here. If a senator commits an offence of this kind, to suspend him for the remainder of the sitting ought to be quite sufficient punishment. If on the second day he offends again, repeat the punishment. If on the third day he offends again, repeat the punishment. Probably on the fourth day he may come here clothed in his right mind. It is exceedingly improper, under any circumstances except the most extreme, to deprive a State of its share of representation. It seems to be the height of folly to say that for a first offence a senator shall be punished by suspension for the remainder of the sitting; for a second offence by suspension for a week; for a third or any subsequent offence by suspension for a month, while the offences may be altogether different in their heinousness. The first offence might be the worst of all, and the last offence might be a most trivial one.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—Senator Neild has asked me for my opinion on the question—Can we expel a senator? Undoubtedly we can. I have called the attention of Senator Neild and others to two sections in the Constitution Act. Section 49 says—

The powers, privileges, and immunities of the Senate shall be such as are declared by the Parliament, and, until declared, shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom.

We cannot by standing orders curtail or extend our privileges. Our standing orders are framed, and have validity only under the following section :—

Each House of the Parliament may make rules and orders with respect to—

1. The mode in which its powers, privileges, and immunities may be exercised and upheld.

We cannot by standing orders give ourselves any new powers, privileges, and immunities. Unless it is done by statute, they remain the same as those of the House of Commons. If these standing orders proposed to give us any new power which the House of Commons does not possess they would be ultra vires, and if they proposed to limit our powers they would be equally ultra vires, because by standing orders the Senate can only provide for the mode in which its powers, privileges, and immunities, may be exercised and upheld, and for the order and conduct of its business and proceedings.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—I am sorry that I cannot see my way clear to support the amendment. Of course, Senator Stewart, like myself, has great faith in the leniency and fairness of his fellow senators; but I can conceive that, in a period of great excitement, even the Senate may resort to extreme measures, and perhaps exclude a senator who was considered objectionable for a considerable period. I am not anxious to see the standing order passed without the term of punishment being specified. I have gone through periods of excitement in the Legislative Assembly of Queensland. I remember times when it has got into such a condition of mind that if the occasion had arisen I believe it would have excluded a member for the session. In many instances it was grossly unjust in its treatment of certain members who were considered objectionable. We are only framing this standing order for times of extreme excitement; and, if the period of punishment is not specified, gross injustice may be done, not only to a senator, but also to the State which he represents. If a senator by his conduct makes himself thoroughly objectionable, undoubtedly he ought to be punished, because every legislative body must have some rules for maintaining order and good conduct. If a senator grossly offends those who may be endeavouring to do the work of the country in the best way, he ought to be suspended for a day, and if on another occasion he makes himself grossly obnoxious to his fellow senators, surely additional punishment ought to be inflicted. I do not think that he should be suspended for a month. It will be reasonable and fair if he is suspended for fourteen days. I do not wish to go to the extreme limit in the matter of punishment, nor do I desire to leave the rule in such a loose form that under certain circumstances the majority might not only act unfairly in a period of excitement, but on many occasions might act unfairly with the deliberate object of excluding a senator. I am sure that Senator Stewart can imagine that some circumstances may arise which may put the Senate into a condition of mind like that which he witnessed in the Queensland Assembly ten years ago. I hope he will recognise that it is unwise to leave the rule in a loose form.

Senator DRAKE.—There is one insuperable difficulty in carrying out the idea suggested by Senator Stewart. A motion has to be made for the suspension of the senator for a certain time, and that has to be carried without debate or amendment. The term of suspension really will be fixed by the senator who moves the motion, probably a Minister. Supposing that a Minister proposes that the offending senator be suspended for a week. Seeing that there can be no amendment or debate, the motion must be either carried or negatived. But Senator Stewart desires that the term of suspension shall be fixed by the Senate.

Senator STEWART.—I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator DRAKE.—I am glad that the amendment has been withdrawn. I am inclined to think that suspension for a month is rather too severe punishment. I think that, without detracting from the salutary effect of the standing order, the suspension might very well be limited to fourteen days. I take it that these successive suspensions refer to offences committed in the same session, so that it would only be in the case of a senator's third offence in the same session that this would apply. It is only in extreme cases that the heavier penalty would be inflicted. I admit that the standing order is not quite clear, and I think an alteration should be made.

Amendment (by Senator WALKER) agreed to—

That the words "one month," line 5, be omitted, and the words "fourteen days" inserted in lieu thereof.

Amendment (by Senator DRAKE) agreed to—

That the following words be added—"Such suspension occurring within the same session."

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 432 and 433 agreed to.

Standing Order 434—

If any senator shall wilfully disobey any order of the Senate, he may be ordered to attend in his place, or, if he is under suspension, at the Bar, to answer for his conduct, and unless his excuses be deemed satisfactory the Senate may direct the Usher of the Black Rod to take such senator into custody

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—I think it is just as well to alter the word "excuses." The word used should be "explanation." I move—

That the word "excuses," line 4, be omitted, and the word "explanation" inserted in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 435 to 440 agreed to.

Joint Standing Order—

Every Public Act of the Parliament, commencing No. 1, from the day of , 1901, shall be numbered in Arabic figures, and in regular arithmetical series in the order in which the same shall be assented to by His Excellency the Governor-General, or in which the King's assent thereto is made known, together with the number of the year in which such Act shall receive the Royal assent.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I desire to move an amendment in this standing order which relates to joint standing orders, for the reason that since the Committee reported the Government have adopted a slightly different course of procedure than that which was contemplated. It is necessary to conform to the practice of numbering the statutes which the Government have adopted by using the words "in arithmetical series of each year." I move—

That the words, "commencing No. 1, from the day of , 1901," be omitted; and that after the word "series," line 4, the words "for each year" be inserted.

SUGAR BONUS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

It will be remembered that last session, when the Tariff was going through, a proposal was made to give a certain amount—we will call it a bonus—by way of encouragement, to persons who should grow sugar-cane by means of white labour only. The encouragement took this form in the Tariff—that whereas there was to be an Excise duty of £3 per ton on all sugar manufactured within Australia, a payment equivalent to £2 per ton of manufactured sugar was to be given to those who grew their cane with white labour only. There was some doubt at the time as to how that provision would operate, and before the payments commenced to be made the amounts collected in excise, in the various States, were paid into a trust fund. From that fund the bonuses were paid. The balance of the money so collected has not yet been distributed to the States, with the exception of a sum that has been, as it were, advanced. There has been no final settlement because the exact basis upon which those payments shall be made to the States from the trust fund has not yet been decided. It has turned out in operation that this amount of £2 per ton, if deducted merely from the excise paid in respect of sugar grown by white labour, would fall inequitably on the various States. During this period the quantity of sugar grown by the aid of white labour was 30,000 tons. That is to say, bonuses have been paid to the amount of £60,000. The proportion of sugar grown by white labour, as compared with black labour, in Queensland, is as 15 to 85. The proportions in New South Wales are exactly the reverse, being 15 grown by black labour and 85 grown by white labour. A great difficulty has arisen because, notwithstanding all the care that has been taken, the sugars become so inexplicably mixed in the process of refining, that it is not possible to trace sugar from cane grown by black labour, as distinguished from that from cane grown by white labour. We must treat the two kinds of sugar as being indistinguishable after refining. Therefore, supposing the payment of the bonuses were made as a rebate of £2 per ton from the £3 per ton excise, the burden of the policy we have pursued would fall entirely upon those States that are consuming locally-produced sugar. The proportions of locally-produced and imported sugar consumed in the States vary considerably. I do not think that any one could possibly have foreseen that the burden of assisting the sugar-planters in making the change from black labour to white labour was going to fall exclusively upon the consumers of locally-grown sugar; and I do not think that any one believes that that would be an equitable arrangement. If it were followed out it would lead to most extraordinary results: because the States that use imported sugar receive £6 per ton Customs duty upon that sugar, whereas the States which consume locally-produced sugar only get at most £3 per ton. If that state of things were to exist permanently it would be an advantage to the sugar-producing States to export their sugar, and to import sugar for their own consumption.

Senator HIGGS.—What State would do that?

Senator DRAKE.—I do not say that any State would do it, but it was suggested in a letter written by the Premier of New South Wales that such a thing as that might possibly occur. I use the argument to show that an absurd result would happen if the burden were to fall entirely upon the States which consume locally-grown sugar, to the extent to which they do consume it. This question would not have been so acute had it not been for the partial failure of the sugar crop in New South Wales, and more particularly in Queensland. Had there been an abundant crop, as in previous years, the local wants of Australia would have been nearly met by the local production of sugar, and in that case the burden would have fallen upon the whole of Australia fairly equitably according to the consumption of sugar. But it so happened that there was a very short crop, and consequently some of the States have relied almost entirely upon imported sugar. The consequence of that has been that their Treasurers have the great advantage of receiving £6 per ton import duty. That state of things cannot be expected to continue. As the local production increases, it must gradually disappear. When the local production overtakes the local consumption, this contribution as a bonus to the sugar-growers will, if we take as a basis the consumption of sugar, be fairly equal throughout Australia. It cannot be expected that we should wait until that time arrives, and that cannot be a good system to adopt which depends upon such accidents as I have pointed out, the accident of the relative consumption of locally-produced and imported sugar in the various States, and the accident of the seasons. The Treasurer has supplied me with some interesting tables of figures which I have caused to be circulated amongst honorable senators. The total production of Australian sugar for the year 1902-3 is stated in these tables as 91,500 tons, and the total quantity of sugar imported was 85,500 tons. So that already during this year we are supplying more than half of our requirements, notwithstanding the very bad season we have had.

Senator CHARLESTON.—We must allow for stocks held.

Senator DRAKE.—The stocks held at the commencement of the year were 2,000 tons less than at the end of the year, so that involves a very slight variation. Of the 30,000 tons of sugar produced in Australia this year by white labour, it will be seen that 12,000 tons were produced in Queensland, and 18,000 tons in New South Wales. The total consumption in New South Wales is 68,000 tons, of which 60,000 tons is the quantity consumed within New South Wales, and 8,000 tons were distributed amongst the other States in this proportion :—3,000 tons to Western Australia ; 4,500 tons to Tasmania ; and 500 tons to South Australia. In connexion with the point to which I have previously referred honorable senators will see that these quantities of sugar being refined in New South Wales from sugar produced in New South Wales and Queensland, and then sent in these varying quantities to the other States, it is almost impossible, under the previously existing arrangement, to secure an equitable payment of the amount due to the growers on the production of sugar by white labour. The Treasurer has shown at page 2 of the statement of figures circulated what would be the result of a distribution on a basis of consumption, and on a population basis. From these figures it will be found that New South Wales, on a basis of consumption, would have to find £44,400 out of a total of £60,000, and on a population basis £21,642 ; Victoria, on a basis of consumption, £2,500, and on a population basis £18,786 ; Queensland, on a basis of consumption, £7,100, and on a population basis £7,962. Honorable senators will see that, so far as Queensland is concerned, the proposed change in the method of distribution makes a difference of only a few hundreds of pounds. South Australia did not consume any locally-produced sugar, and on a basis of consumption she would therefore not have to pay anything, but on a population basis she would have to pay £5,658. Western Australia on a basis of consumption would have to pay £2,400, and on a population basis £3,246 ; Tasmania, on a basis of consumption £3,600, and on a basis of population, £2,706. If we were to adopt the principle of paying on a basis of consumption the amounts would of course vary from year to year. As I have pointed out, as soon as the local production overtook local consumption it would practically be the same all over the continent, but up to that time it would vary very much, because of the accident of one State relying more upon local production and another more on importation. It may be fairly admitted, however, that until the time arrived when local production overtook local consumption there would be a tendency to a larger consumption of the local article in the States in which sugar is produced, but it is only in that respect that the proposed alteration would be of benefit to the States which produce sugar. The proposal made is simply to substitute for an unsatisfactory and inequitable principle of distributing this particular expenditure upon a basis of consumption, the principle of distribution upon a population basis. The only advantage to the States of Queensland and New South Wales, in which sugar is produced, will be that there will be a tendency in those States to a continually increasing consumption of the local article, until the local production overtakes the local consumption. It is only in that respect that there will be a slight and continually diminishing advantage to those two States.

Senator CHARLESTON.—This will disturb the revenue of South Australia a good deal.

Senator DRAKE.—It cannot disturb the revenue of South Australia, because the amounts collected under the Excise Act have all been paid into a trust fund, and they have not yet been distributed. We are here simply dealing with the question of how we should distribute them.

Senator CHARLESTON.—To South Australia it will mean the difference between £1 and £6 per ton of sugar.

Senator DRAKE.—As there is nothing in the trust fund at the present time to the credit of South Australia, it cannot be said that the action we are now proposing to take will have a disturbing effect upon the revenue of that State.

Senator BEST.—Still it will mean a loss of revenue to South Australia of £5,658.

Senator DRAKE.—That is the amount collected upon sugar imported into that State. South Australia has had the great advantage—and it has been an accidental advantage—of collecting a large revenue upon imported sugar. But, as I say, if we were to adopt a distribution on the basis of consumption permanently it is perfectly clear that the various States might soon be engaging in a sort of cut-throat game by trying to unload locally-produced sugar on other States and importing their own.

Senator CHARLESTON.—But the other States would not accept it.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator knows that in the ordinary course of trade a trader will take the sugar which he can get cheapest. There would be nothing to prevent a State like Queensland—and I freely mention Queensland in this case, because for 1902-3 that State will not be greatly affected by this measure, though in future it may be—there would be nothing to prevent Queensland, if it could be done—and I admit all the difficulty of entering upon any sort of enterprise that conflicts with the ordinary course of trade, but we can discuss it as a possibility—systematically sending all its locally-produced sugar to the other States and importing its own. Queensland would then secure a return of £6 per ton on the imported sugar. I do not really suppose that the Government of any State would set themselves deliberately to interfere with the ordinary course of trade.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Private people would not do it, because they would gain nothing by it.

Senator DRAKE.—Private persons would not do it, and the ordinary course of trade would probably not be interfered with; but it is not desirable to have a state of things in which an interference with the ordinary course of trade would result in an advantage to the Government of any particular State. There is an interesting table on page 3 of the paper circulated to honorable senators, which shows the total revenue derived in the various States from sugar, and the amount of rebates paid. I need not go through the table, because honorable senators have it before them.

Senator MILLEN.—Will this Bill be retrospective so far as the trust fund to which the honorable and learned senator has referred is concerned?

Senator DRAKE.—The Bill dates back to the very first. The principle laid down in the Bill is the principle upon which we propose to deal with the trust fund. We propose to deal in this way with all the amounts paid in respect of excise.

Senator MILLEN.—The Bill does not state that.

Senator DRAKE.—I think it is quite clear that it does. No payments have yet been made, and the Bill we are now considering is a Bill to provide for a bonus to the growers of sugar by white labour.

Senator MILLEN.—After a certain date—the 28th February, 1903.

Senator DRAKE.—The Bill refers to sugar from cane or beet “in the production of which sugar-cane or beet white labour only has been employed after the 28th day of February, 1903.”

Senator MILLEN.—How will that affect sugar produced prior to that date by white labour, and in respect of which the Government have funds for distribution.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator will find that it is stated in clause 7 that—

All rebates of excise duty upon sugar paid before the commencement of this Act shall be taken as bonuses under this Act.

That is retrospective, and when we come to discuss the clauses I shall be able to satisfy the honorable senator that the Bill will deal with the matter from the very first. Though, in one sense it may be held that the Excise Act settles the mode of distribution, as a matter of fact it has never been acted upon, and the money has all been paid into a trust fund, because there was this question to be decided. This measure, if accepted, will determine the question, and then we can distribute the money, which is at present in the trust fund, in accordance with the principles of this Bill.

Senator PLAYFORD.—How much does that fund amount to now?

Senator DRAKE.—As I have said, a small amount has been paid. The honorable senator will find the figures on page 3 of the statement circulated. He will see that the total consumption of Australian sugar was 91,500 tons, and the total revenue from Australian sugar was £274,500.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Who is going to get this money?

Senator DRAKE.—The States.

Senator PLAYFORD.—How much will New South Wales get?

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator will find the figures upon page 3 of the tabulated statement supplied. The revenue which New South Wales derived from imported sugar amounted to £66,000, and the revenue which that State derived from Australian sugar was £168,000, or a total of £234,000. Each State will get the amount of excise that has been paid in respect of sugar according to the consumption in that State, and the amount to be paid by way of bonus is new expenditure which under terms of the Constitution will be equally distributed amongst the States on a population basis.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I think we are to be congratulated upon the presentation of this Bill to the Senate. It is a measure of fair play. The people of the Commonwealth as a whole, and particularly the people of Victoria and South Australia, were anxious that the policy of a white Australia should be carried out, and they must, therefore, be prepared to pay their proportion of the expense of that luxury. The peculiarity of the position is that the greater the success obtained in the cultivation of sugar by white labour the less will be the income received by the States of Victoria and South Australia from the present duty. In my opinion the whole of the revenue obtained from the sugar duties ought under existing circumstances to be distributed upon a population basis. If Queensland succeeded after a time in growing sufficient sugar by white labour to satisfy her own requirements, her revenue from it would be only £1 per ton under the existing arrangement, whereas if the people of South Australia used only imported sugar the Government of that State would secure a revenue of £6 per ton. It will thus be seen that the present arrangement is manifestly unjust. In order that all the States may be fairly dealt with all the revenue at present obtained from the duty on sugar should be divided on a population basis, no matter where it is collected. I intend to support the second reading of the Bill because it is a measure of fair play. I sympathize to some extent with the people of Victoria and South Australia, but they have only themselves to blame, because they were the most enthusiastic in supporting this form of protection. The result of the introduction of this policy of a so-called white Australia is a manifest instance of the unfairness of protection. The very State which has to bear the great burden of the cost of giving effect to it is being punished, inasmuch as the revenue obtained by it from the excise duty on sugar is only £1 per ton as compared with the revenue of £6 per ton obtained by the other States consuming imported sugar. Under the present system that state of affairs would exist until Queensland could supply the whole of Australia with the local article, when all the States would secure only £1 per ton from the excise duty. Every honorable senator knows that I did not favour the proposal for the expulsion of kanakas from Queensland, and I sympathized with New South Wales and Queensland, who appeared likely to be called upon to bear the whole of the cost of the white labour movement. Under this Bill, New South Wales will secure the treatment that it well deserves, for on a population basis, as against a consumption basis, it will gain £22,758 per annum. Tasmania will also gain £894 per annum. It is quite true, as the Postmaster-General has said, that at present it would almost pay the Government of Queensland to offer inducements for the export of locally-grown sugar, so that the people there would use the imported article and the State would secure the increased revenue. It affords a striking illustration of the fallacy of protection.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—At this stage I shall make very few observations, because I have given notice of an amendment which will perhaps afford me, in Committee, an opportunity of saying a little more on the subject which I am about to mention.

Senator GLASSEY.—What is the amendment?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is opposed to the payment of bonuses on sugar-cane cultivated by women and children.

Senator GLASSEY.—Oh!

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—My honorable friend shakes his head; but if he gives the matter a moment's consideration, I am sure he will be in entire agreement with my case. The whole course of his life, so far as we know him in this Chamber, has been that of a gentleman, who considers the well-being of his fellow men—and the well-being of women and children—before a great many other matters. That is his great characteristic, and I honour him for it. I think, therefore, that what I have indicated will meet with his approbation rather than the opposition that the shaking of his head perhaps implied. I desire to challenge one statement made by the Postmaster-General, and that is as to the quantity of sugar which has been grown by white labour in Queensland. I assert that the rebate has been allowed on sugar nominally grown by white labour, but in reality not grown in that way. At the close of last session I went to the north of Queensland for the express purpose of making a study of this matter on the spot. I took care to keep out of the reach and beyond the influence of proprietors of sugar plantations and sugar mills; and, as far as possible, I sought my information from unprejudiced sources. This rebate, which has been allowed upon thousands of tons of sugar, has not been given in respect of sugar grown by white labour, but of sugar cultivated by coloured labour. It was probably only after the actual cultivation had ceased that the white labour came in.

Senator DRAKE.—Everything had to be done by white labour.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The cultivation and trashing of the cane was done by coloured labour. It was only after the crops were growing "on their own," as the colloquial phrase goes, that white labour was employed.

Senator DRAKE.—That is a mistake.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If the honorable senator will tell me that he knows more about this matter than do the official inspectors of the Queensland Government, I shall, of course, implicitly accept his assurance. I am speaking, however, upon the authority of officials who have no interest in politics or in profits, and I say that it is a perfect sham to suggest that much of the cane which was made subject to rebate was ever grown by white labour. Stalwart men are not employed in cultivating sugar cane in Queensland. We have abundant evidence to show that it is practically impossible to obtain white men to cut cane, let alone to cultivate it.

Senator DAWSON.—That is nonsense.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator is one of the representatives of Queensland, and has a perfect right to his own opinion; but I have in my possession the reports of certain companies and mills, which show most conclusively that men who contracted to find white labour for cutting the cane were unable to fulfil their contract, and that in two cases they forfeited their deposits.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator refer to the Mossman mill?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is one case.

Senator DAWSON.—It is the most important.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If the statements made in connexion with the Mossman mill are not correct, I am making reference to assertions which are not facts. I have yet to be assured, however, that a number of directors of a public company which has been in existence for years, and whose interests are concerned in the working, not the mere flotation, of a company, would deliberately meet together and publish statements that were untrue. The statements to which I refer were made not only by these directors, but by those who wrote to them asking for the return of deposits which they had forfeited, owing to their inability to supply white labour to cut the crops. That failure to supply white labour has occurred not once but twice. One contractor forfeited his deposit, and the directors made it a gift to the next man who came along and undertook the work. He was promised the deposit, but he not only failed to secure it, but lost his own as well. It is impossible to suppose that these statements are untrue, for they are contained in official documents. There is the ad misericordiam appeal for consideration at the hands of the directors, which was made by the man who failed to win the deposit offered to him and also lost his own.

Senator DAWSON.—What crop did the contractor undertake to cut? Was it not a crop of ratoon, where the weeds were troublesome, and the cane half-grown?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think the statements go to show that the contractor was satisfied that the crop was a fair one.

Senator DAWSON.—It was not

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator will have an opportunity of dealing with the matter later on. If it is difficult and apparently impossible to secure white labour to cut a crop that creates its own breathing space, how much more difficult must it be to obtain white labour to work within the rows of cane, and to trash it, or, in other words, to remove the dead leaves. I am not speaking without some little personal knowledge of sugar-growing, because my late father was one of the most prominent pioneers of the sugar industry in New South Wales. He lost years of his life and thousands of pounds in endeavouring to establish the industry of sugar-growing in New South Wales, at a point south of the line at which it has since been found profitable. Therefore, I am speaking with an intimate knowledge of sugar-growing and sugar-making up to a certain point. I am not speaking as a man whose knowledge has been wholly obtained by reading reports and newspaper paragraphs, or even by visiting cane-fields. I am speaking with a sense of heavy family loss which, to a certain extent, is reflected upon myself as the son of a man who lost large sums of money, and many years of his life, in an endeavour to achieve success in a new industry. I hope that I shall be forgiven for this personal reference. I have made it simply with a view of showing that I am not a mere doctrinaire, or one who has picked up a few phrases about sugar-growing. So far back as the sixties, I had an immediate connexion with the industry.

Senator PEARCE.—Would the efforts made by the honorable senator's father have been successful had kanakas been employed?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Not where we were situated. But I have not raised the question of kanaka labour, except in so far as I have said that we have been paying a rebate on sugar produced from cane supposed to have been grown by white labour, but which was never in reality cultivated by white labour. The future lies before us. Whether by Act of Parliament we can succeed in altering the decrees of Providence is a problem we are now attempting to solve. We have heard of the Frenchman who regretted his non-existence at the time of the Creation, because if he had been there he could have given the Almighty several useful hints; and if, in accordance with a belief of that kind, we think we can alter the climate, the temperature, the atmosphere of the country, and also the characteristics of the worker, to suit existing labour conditions, by Act of Parliament, well and good. We are now engaged in that experiment, but I repeat that as regards the employment of white women by therapacious husbands and fathers, and the employment of young children, there is no word of condemnation that can be offered in opposition to such a state of affairs, which is not worthy of a man who attempts to represent the people. I am saying nothing under the shelter of privilege. I published the same statements, with my name attached, in the morning press of Sydney when I came back from North Queensland. It is notorious that there are persons engaged in the sugar industry who are debasing their women folk and destroying the health of their young children by placing them at labour which the average white man will not tackle, and the advantage they obtain from this sweated labour is supplemented by a bonus. It is the worst form of sweating for a man to make use of a wife or a daughter or a child to do such work, which even with a £50 bonus thrown in he cannot get white labourers to tackle. That is what I am objecting to, and that is what I intend to take the vote of the Senate on. I think that my honorable friends in the labour party will be the first to support the refusal to pay a bonus in respect of cane grown by female labour or by child labour, because if there is one particular subject to which they have devoted themselves, and for which they are entitled to credit in their career as a political body, it is the effort by which they have successfully assisted to put down sweating in various trades. What sweating can be worse than the sweating of a man's own children and wife?

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator mean to say that that is generally done in North Queensland?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No; but I say that there are many instances of its being done.

Senator DAWSON.—In what portion of North Queensland?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not think that the dragging in of names would raise the character of the debate. I am not going to drag in any names.

Senator DAWSON.—If the honorable senator makes a charge he ought to name the district to which he refers.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If my honorable friend says that the evil I speak of does not exist, I reply that he has his sources of information and I have mine. Surely he cannot be opposed to me in endeavouring to prevent an occurrence of the kind in the future, even if he says it does not exist at present.

Senator DAWSON.—No; I am denying the accusation, and asking that the district shall be named.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If my honorable friend knows all that has been going on for the last twelve months in every part of Queensland, well, he has almost achieved omnipotence.

Senator HIGGS.—Surely the honorable senator can name the districts in which this thing takes place.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I shall not give any names. I am speaking on the authority of Government inspectors of cane-fields, and that should be good enough information even if I had no further knowledge of the subject. If my honorable friends do not think that it exists, let them go up and inquire on the spot. I am sure that Senator Dawson will not suppose that I am making an assertion except on what I believe to be good authority.

Senator DAWSON.—Hear, hear. All I ask is that the district in which it exists shall be named.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is admitted that I do not wish to slander anybody. I am only speaking in respect of information communicated to me on the spot. Even if my honorable friend has sources of information which justify him in thinking that I have been misinformed, still that does not alter the fact that in the interests of the womanhood of Australia it is desirable that we shall under no circumstances permit the employment of women and children under a tropical sun in work for which it has hitherto been found difficult to obtain white labour.

Senator FRASER.—If they could not get black labour should they allow their crop to go to ruin?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—My honorable friend, with his known kindness of heart and goodness of disposition, will see that his question lays him open to the charge of being an advocate of the sweating of womanhood where the planter cannot get male labour. I am sure that he does not mean that.

Senator FRASER.—Not necessarily.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—With this exception, and, perhaps, one other that I believe Senator Millen intends to bring forward, I am entirely in favour of the Bill, which is, I believe, based on broad equity, because if Australia, as a whole, is to benefit by the white Australia policy, then all the States should pay the price of it, and the burden should not be thrown on one or two States. I give the Government every credit for bringing in a Bill which is equitable so far as I am able to form an opinion. I support the measure with the exception that I wish to see a provision made that child and female labour shall not be used to gather in the bonus, and I shall give my assent—at least, I think I shall—to the amendment which is to be submitted by Senator Millen with the object of securing a greater measure of equity in the distribution of the bonus.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—As regards the measure itself, I have nothing to add to what has been said. I propose to support the second reading. The oversight that has rendered its introduction necessary was one which was quite natural, and for which no blame can possibly attach to anybody. As Senator Drake has remarked, it was hardly possible to foresee everything when shaping the Tariff in the early portion of last session. It is one of those little oversights which we all have to share the responsibility of, and which may very well be pardoned. What I desire to draw attention to is the exact meaning of clause 2. I assume that its purpose is to insure that the bonus shall be paid to every cane-grower who uses white labour. But as it stands it almost seems to me that it will be only some of the employers of white labour who will get it. It decrees that the bonus shall be paid on sugar-cane or beet—

In the production of which sugar cane or beet, white labour only has been employed after the 28th February, 1903.

As we know that kanakas are being lawfully employed in Queensland, and as the Act which provides for their deportation countenances their employment until the termination of their existing contracts, it seems to me that, under the wording of this clause, a sugar-grower using a kanaka after that date, and subsequently dispensing with him, and then reverting to white labour, could not claim the bonus on the sugar which will be the result of the employment of white labour. I understand that in the case of sugar-cane it is possible to get two or three yields from one planting.

Senator DAWSON.—I have known a tenth crop to be got Senator MILLEN.—It will be sufficient for my purpose if a planter gets only a second crop. The plant having been planted and the crop reaped with black labour, and the second year's cultivation effected by white labour, it will be possible to say that the second crop was not entitled to the bonus. I cannot think that that is the intention of the Government.

Senator DRAKE.—Yes, after 19th March, 1903.

Senator MILLEN.—I am very glad to have that straight-out declaration, because if so I propose to vote against the Bill. Are we to understand that, if a planter who to-day is employing a kanaka under the State law, and can employ him for a certain time longer, next year dispenses with him to employ white labour, he is not to get the bonus, although he employs white labour?

Senator DRAKE.—If he employs black labour after that date, he will not be entitled to the bonus.

Senator MILLEN.—Supposing that in Queensland to-day a planter is employing black labour with the countenance of both the State law and the Federal law, and that next year he dispenses with black labour and employs white labour, will he get the bonus on next year's crop?

Senator DRAKE.—No, because he has been employing black labour. If he plants his cane with white labour he gets the bonus.

Senator MILLEN.—We have a Federal law in which the planters were told that they could continue their engagements with their kanakas—under their State law they can continue to employ kanakas for a given period—and that those who dispensed with kanakas were to get a rebate. Taking advantage of the opportunity which was afforded to them of gradually dispensing with coloured labour, the planters proceeded to do so. This year a planter who has 50 or 100 kanakas under contract lets that contract run out, dispenses with black labour, and then employs white labour, but next year, although for the whole period of twelve months—from the reaping of one crop to the gathering of the other—he has never had other than white labour on his plantation, he is not to get a bonus, because the plant was planted some time previously.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Would the honorable senator expect the planter to get the whole of the bonus?

Senator MILLEN.—I lay down this principle: that if, from the gathering of one crop till the taking in of the other, the whole of the work is done by white labour, the planter is entitled to the bonus.

Senator GLASSEY.—That is the only practicable plan to carry out the whole of the arrangement.

Senator MILLEN.—It is the only honest plan.

Senator DRAKE.—All the planters told me that they were perfectly satisfied with this extension.

Senator MILLEN.—After that explanation, sooner than see the Bill put through I shall vote against it. Because I do not believe for a moment that it was ever intended to tell the planters, when we passed the Pacific Island Labourers Act, concurrently with the sugar rebate provision in the Excise Act, that we were playing a fraud with them, for that is really what it amounts to. What was the good of offering this opportunity of gradually dispensing with kanaka labour if we were simply to say that for the whole time, seven or ten years, as long as a single root remained under cultivation, in the planting of which the kanaka had anything to do, the planter was not to get the bonus?

Senator DRAKE.—That is not so.

Senator MILLEN.—Then the honorable and learned senator is to blame for my being in the wrong, because I asked him the question, which I will put again. If a planter plants a crop with black labour this year, and dispenses with black labour on the 31st December this year; and if during the whole of next year he employs white labour only, does he get the bonus?

Senator DRAKE.—If he plants with black labour he does not get the bonus.

Senator MILLEN.—The root of the cane is put in this year, and will produce several harvests. Yet the Postmaster-General says that if that root has been planted by black labour this year or last year—

Senator DRAKE.—I do not say last year.

Senator MILLEN.—When, then?

Senator DRAKE.—This year; if it is planted by black labour this year there will be no bonus.

Senator MILLEN.—That is the position I am taking up—that during this year some planting is done with kanaka labour; a crop is taken off; and from that time to the gathering of the next crop, nothing but white labour is employed on the plantation. Yet for the subsequent crop, and for the next one, and for the next crops up to ten—because I have the assurance that ten crops can be taken from one plantation—no bonus will be paid.

Senator DRAKE.—A plantation would not be much good if ten crops were taken off it; five might be taken.

Senator MILLEN.—If roots have been planted by kanakas and one crop has been taken off with the aid of black labour it is at all events admitted by the Postmaster-General that the planter would be able to take off four more crops from the same stools. But no bonus will be paid on account of the four subsequent crops.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—That is only in the future; it does not apply to the past.

Senator MILLEN.—Does the honorable senator suppose that I want him to tell me that?

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—The honorable senator did not seem to understand it.

Senator MILLEN.—It may be impossible for the honorable senator to understand what I understand, but I think I know. I have an assurance that four or five crops can be taken from one plant or root; and, although the kanakas are there to-day under the Federal law as well as under the State law, if a plant is put in to-day with the aid of kanaka labour, and four subsequent crops are taken off it with the aid of white labour, and those four are entirely cultivated by white labour, the planter cannot get the bonus. What is the planter to do with the kanakas whom he already has in his employ?

Senator DRAKE.—Get rid of them.

Senator MILLEN.—He cannot; because if he did he could be sued for breach of contract under the State law. I am not saying that so long as a planter employs kanaka labour he should get the bonus, but I do say that when he has "white-washed" his plantation and done what this Parliament wants him to do by dispensing with kanakas and employing white labour only, he should receive the bonus for the crops taken off his plantation during the time it was cultivated by white labour. He is entitled to ask for and receive the bonus provided for in this measure for what he has done in that respect.

Senator DAWSON.—Otherwise he will keep his kanakas for the five years.

Senator MILLEN.—There is a distinct inducement to do so.

Senator DRAKE.—If we alter this regulation the inducement will be to keep the kanakas.

Senator MILLEN.—What inducement is there to dispense with the kanakas when the planter cannot get the bonus?

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator wants the planter to get the bonus for sugar partly grown by white and partly by black labour.

Senator MILLEN.—If the honorable and learned senator means that the planting of the root by black labour means partly growing the cane by black labour, he is correct. But it is surely necessary to allow for the transition stage between the employment of white and black labour. It is necessary to recognise that something of the kind had to take place. You should not bring your guillotine down so sharply.

Senator DRAKE.—We have extended the time twice.

Senator MILLEN.—For what?

Senator DRAKE.—To give the planters an opportunity of planting with white labour.

Senator MILLEN.—I am not speaking of the action of the Government in the past. If I were I might have to employ stronger language. I am speaking of the Bill now before the Senate, and I ask for the judgment of the Senate as to whether it will allow the clause which I have been criticising to be passed as it stands. It is inevitable that, kanakas having been employed upon the sugar plantations of Queensland, some legacy of their work should remain. You cannot get rid of them all at once. It must be seen that there is necessarily a stage when the planter will be passing from the use of black labour to the use of white. There must be a reasonable recognition of the facts of the case. The planters who have put in roots with the aid of black labour, cannot be expected to rip up those roots and re-plant with white labour.

Senator DRAKE.—They are not required to rip up their roots, but they should not claim the bonus until they have done the work with white labour.

Senator MILLEN.—Surely if a planter puts in rattoons, and a crop is taken off them, and afterwards he dispenses with black labour, and harvests his crop, and cultivates his plantation with white labour, he is entitled to claim the bonus.

Senator CHARLESTON.—He would then be getting a bonus on the black labour employed in planting.

Senator MILLEN.—But what is the other position? If you do not give the planter the bonus, he has every inducement to retain kanakas in his employment until his stools are worked out. I could understand it if the Government said, "While we intend to pay the full measure of the bonus for sugar which from the inception of the first planting has been handled by white labour, we will pay a smaller proportion of the bonus for sugar produced from crops that have been only partly handled by white labour." In the cases I have indicated, where plants were put in with kanaka labour and in subsequent years crops were taken off by white labour, to give the planters some proportion of the bonus in recognition of the fact that they have dispensed with black labour would be a fair solution of the difficulty. But to say that they are to get no bonus at all in the future and no inducement for dispensing with black labour is most unfair. Some provision should be made on the lines I have mentioned. While the full bonus is paid to those who plant and handle and cut their cane with white labour only, at least some proportion of the bonus—what proportion I do not say—should be given to those who in the later stages of cultivation have employed white labour only. I would allow nothing for the crop produced while kanaka labour was employed; but the moment the planters dispense with their kanakas and employ white labour let them have the benefit of the policy we have sought to inaugurate, and give them a proportion of the bonus.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—This matter is so intensely complicated that unless we give it very long and careful consideration I believe that we shall make another blunder. The Bill now before us is certainly an improvement upon the previous measure, but it does an injustice to the State which I represent as compared with New South Wales to such an extent that I feel bound on behalf of Tasmania to ask my honorable and learned friend, the Postmaster-General, to pay careful attention to me for a few moments while I consider the terrible loss that Tasmania is going to sustain, and the exceedingly advantageous position in which New South Wales is about to be placed. I am alluding to the fact that very few black labourers have in the past been employed in New South Wales, and to the enormous loss of revenue which my State is suffering, while New South Wales suffers no loss whatever.

Senator DRAKE.—Some honorable senators want to give £2 a ton to piebald-grown sugar for ever.

Senator DOBSON.—I should like the Minister to understand that for the year 1900 the consumption of sugar in Tasmania was 7,800 tons, which at £6 per ton brought us in a revenue of £47,000. That meant a larger revenue than the whole of the income tax of Tasmania. But we are now called upon to suffer a loss of that revenue to such an extent that the question becomes very serious. I do not know whether my brother Tasmanian senators are going to support me, but I shall feel bound to propose some amendment with the object of doing justice to my State. Taking the excise at £3 per ton and the rebate for white-grown sugar at £2 a ton, if all foreign sugar is shut out, and if no rebate is claimed, Tasmania will lose £23,500 a year. But if rebate of £2 a ton is claimed on all sugar produced in Australia and consumed in Tasmania, our loss will be £40,000 a year.

Senator DRAKE.—Is the honorable and learned senator giving those figures from the tables issued by the Treasury?

Senator DOBSON.—No; from information supplied by the statistician of Tasmania. Our loss may range from £23,000 to £40,000. Even in the tables now put before us, Tasmania's revenue is put down at £34,500, whereas I have shown that in 1900 we received £47,000 from this source. A small State like mine cannot afford to suffer this enormous loss. I never heard that there was any black labour trouble in northern New South Wales. I understood that the great bulk of the sugar cane produced there was—to all intents and purposes—cultivated by white men. My argument is borne out by the figures before us, which show that the sugar produced by black labour in Queensland was 85 per cent. of the whole quantity, whereas in New South Wales the sugar produced by black labour was only 15 per cent. of the whole. Those figures show that there are really very few kanakas employed in New South Wales. Yet Ministers have been induced to bring in a Bill which will make the consuming States, which are already losing seriously on their sugar revenue, pay a bonus to New South Wales for inducing her to do what she has always done.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Can we differentiate between New South Wales and Queensland?

Senator DOBSON.—I certainly think we ought to do so. I quite understand that there would be a difficulty about differentiating between Bundaberg, Mackay, and Cairns; but if there are 300 or 400 miles between the Tweed and the Richmond rivers, where sugar is grown in New South Wales, and Bundaberg, why cannot we differentiate between the State which has no black labour and the State which has?

Senator DRAKE.—Can we, under the Constitution, give a bonus to one State and not to another?

Senator DOBSON.—I am afraid we cannot, but that is no reason why an injustice should be done to Tasmania. The facts show that instead of conserving the interests of Australia, as some of us thought we were doing, we were simply the slaves of a phrase when we inaugurated this policy. I want to call attention to the loss of revenue which the Commonwealth is going to sustain. Let us look the facts fairly in the face and see exactly what we are doing for the sake of making Australia white—when we know all the while that it is going to be piebald. I understand that the consumption of sugar is about 180,000 tons, and if the time comes—as come I hope it may—when the whole of our sugar is produced in Queensland and New South Wales—principally in Queensland—we shall lose on the basis of £5 a ton about £900,000 a year. When the consumption has increased to 200,000 tons the loss will be absolutely £1,000,000. I should like Senator Drake to supply us with an estimate showing what the Minister for Trade and Customs and his officers think we shall have to pay for a white Australia. Let us know what it is going to cost, and then let us ask ourselves whether the game is worth the candle? Probably our friends in the labour corner may say that it is worth while, and other honorable senators may have the courage to say that it is not. If it is going to take from Tasmania a revenue of £30,000 a year in one item, all I can say is that we cannot possibly afford it.

Senator PEARCE.—Does it require courage to speak the truth?

Senator DOBSON.—What is the use of my honorable friend talking in that way? It is not a question of telling the truth, but a question of opinion. We all know that at certain times it is human nature for people to wish to go with the crowd. It is not a question of the truth—I wish it was—it is a question of opinion upon which no two of us agree. Our experience, since we passed the Act, goes to show, so far as evidence can be obtained, that we have probably made a mess of it. I do not care to consider whether they can or cannot, but we have evidence to show that white men will not do the work required to be done in the north of Queensland. That evidence comes to us from bishops, clergymen, and missionaries, who desire to see a white Australia as much as any honorable senator in this Chamber. All the evidence coming to us goes to show that we cannot get the sugar industry efficiently attended to by white labour.

Senator HIGGS.—As a lawyer, what does the honorable and learned senator think of the evidence given by Senator Neild?

Senator DOBSON.—As a member of the Senate I read every pamphlet and every article published on the subject, and I believe—having confidence in men who understand the matter probably better than Senator Higgs—that if the work has got to be done by white labour the effect will probably be to deteriorate the race in the north of Queensland.

Senator FRASER.—The race will object to that.

Senator DOBSON.—Of course it will. If Senator Higgs is prepared to dispute that, the honorable senator is prepared to dispute the opinion of men who know more about the subject than he does himself.

Senator GLASSEY.—Would not that apply equally to all the industries in the north?

Senator DOBSON.—Not to the same extent. I understand that it was stated in another place that the real difference in cost between the cultivation and harvesting of cane by white labour, as compared with black labour, is only 6d. per ton. Honorable senators will see that, in this Bill, we are allowing 4s. per ton. Do not let us make any more blunders. Is a bonus of 4s. per ton a fair bonus? We have been told by an honorable member in another place that 6d. per ton would be a fair thing, and it will be admitted that there is a vast difference between 6d. and 4s. I ask the Minister in charge of this Bill, and every other honorable senator, before we agree to pay a bonus of 4s. per ton, to see that we have statistics and facts to enable us to determine what a fair bonus would be. There is an enormous difference between 6d. and 4s., and I should like to know where the truth lies. Another matter alluded to at some length by Senator Millen is old ground as far as I am concerned. When I went to Bundaberg I found the planters there up in arms, and when I came back I tabled certain questions in the Senate, to which Senator O'Connor gave me bluffing answers, amidst the cheers and laughter of the labour party. When I got back to Tasmania, I was so impressed by the gross injustice of what the Government was doing that I wrote to the Minister for Trade and Customs, and I got back a snubby letter. Within a month from that time, the Minister for Trade and Customs had done the very thing which he had been requested to do by the planters and by myself. On two occasions he very properly extended the time during which the planters could register as being willing to cultivate entirely by white labour. The Senate has sanctioned the continuance of kanaka labour until the 1st January, 1907, and we have also sanctioned the introduction of kanakas up to the 31st December, 1903. Taking those facts in conjunction with the point in which Senator Millen and myself are interested, it will be seen how grossly unjust this Bill is. We allow the planters under the law to introduce black men up to the end of this year, and we compel them to introduce them under, I believe, a three years agreement. We thus facilitate action on the part of the planters in introducing kanakas. Some of the planters may have extended their agreements with the kanakas for a further three years. Yet if they plant cane by black labour, and at any time hereafter say that they are going to employ white labour, and actually cultivate with white labour for twelve months, they will not be entitled to a bonus. If the planter has entered into an agreement with his kanakas, and is bound to keep them, surely he has a right to plant cane with that black labour; and if the moment their agreement is up he deports them to their islands, and then continues to cultivate that cane for twelve months with white labour, as a matter of right and justice we cannot deny him the bonus. Just as the Minister for Trade and Customs would not listen to what he was urged to do by the planters and by myself, and yet on two subsequent occasions extended the time, so will the right honorable gentleman again have to extend the time provided for under this Bill.

Senator DRAKE.—The planters told me that this was all they wanted, and that they would not ask for any further extension, and I told the Minister for Trade and Customs so.

Senator DOBSON.—I ask Senator Millen not to think me guilty of inconsistency because, while agreeing with him that, as between planter and planter, a great injustice is proposed under this Bill, I hold that, as between Tasmania and the planters, another consideration of justice is involved, and I am inclined to think that the poorer States, who require revenue, have gone to the end of their tether in trying to do justice to the planters. As between the poorer States and the planters, I do not know that we should go a step further. We have treated them most liberally. I am in a difficulty, because while, as between planter and planter, I agree with Senator Millen's contention, as between my own State and the planters I think we are being asked to pay far too much for a white Australia, when we might have avoided paying anything if we had simply allowed the kanakas to die out.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable and learned senator is in a difficulty upon every question.

Senator DOBSON.—Senator Pearce will, I hope, admit that I have made my difficulty plain. In dealing with a measure of this kind a number of side issues demand consideration, and all I plead for is that honorable senators will give this Bill full consideration in order that we may not make another blunder which we would have to correct later on. So firmly do I believe that we shall make a blunder, that I should like to limit the Bill to some extent, and if it could be done under the Constitution I should certainly move the omission of the words "the Commonwealth," with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "within the State of Queensland." If that cannot be done under the Constitution I scarcely know what course we should adopt, but I shall avail myself of such opportunities as present themselves to show the injustice which Tasmania is suffering from. I should like Senator Drake to supply us with figures showing the actual difference in cost in the planting and harvesting of sugar-cane by white and by black labour, because, as I have stated, we have been informed that the difference is only 6d. per ton and not 4s. as provided for in this Bill.

Senator DRAKE.—I shall tell the honorable and learned senator all I know about it.

Senator DOBSON.—I should also like to have statistics showing how many black men were engaged on the sugar plantations in New South Wales when we passed the Pacific Island Labourers Act, and how many there are there now?

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—This Bonus Bill will operate very unfairly as regards South Australia. In South Australia we have been paying a heavy penalty for a great many years in order that the idea of a white Australia might be given effect to. In obedience to the sentiment in favour of a white Australia we prevented the introduction of coloured labour into the Northern Territory. But, notwithstanding the sacrifice we have made, of some £80,000 a year for several years, we are now called upon to make another great sacrifice on behalf of a State that paid no respect whatever to the white Australia sentiment, but whose people on the contrary, in the most selfish way, proceeded to develop its territory in the way most profitable to themselves. We have laboured under the disadvantage of maintaining the idea of a white Australia, and have suffered a large loss of revenue. The prodigal daughter, Queensland, is now coming back to the fold, and is making a great appeal for consideration, because she is prepared to support the idea previously given effect to by South Australia, and we are now asked to put the ring on her finger and kill the fatted calf.

Senator MILLEN.—Did not South Australia once make an experiment with coloured labour, which proved such a ghastly failure that she was glad to let it alone?

Senator CHARLESTON.—South Australia made no experiment with coloured labour.

Senator MILLEN.—Not in the Northern Territory?

Senator CHARLESTON.—It is true that Chinese were allowed in to build the railway in the Northern Territory, but years ago we passed an Act in South Australia prohibiting any further introduction of Chinese. The taxpayers of South Australia have already paid about £50,000 towards the cause of Federation in connexion with the consumption of the one article of sugar. The revenue derived from sugar prior to Federation was something like £45,000, and this year it is £97,500.

Senator PLAYFORD.—And yet we get our sugar just as cheaply.

Senator CHARLESTON.—We do not get it just as cheaply. I can give the honorable senator figures to prove that the consumer in South Australia does not now get his sugar as cheaply as before Federation.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I know I am getting the same sugar from the same man, in the same bags, and at the same price.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Then the honorable senator is being more generously treated than other people in South Australia. I can quote figures taken from official statistics of the State of South Australia, and also figures supplied by the Colonial Sugar Refining Company. It will thus be seen that the Colonial Sugar Company's charges have really been increased by £3 per ton, and it is difficult to understand how Senator Playford is able to obtain sugar for the price at which he previously secured it. As a matter of fact, consumers of sugar in South Australia are to-day paying £4 5s. per ton in excess of the price they would have had to pay for it if we had not federated. On October 1st, 1901—seven days prior to the laying of the Tariff on the table of the House of Representatives, and at a time when the duty on sugar was £3 per ton—the price of the Colonial Sugar Company's 1A sugar was £16 5s. per ton under bond, and £19 15s. duty paid. On 1st November of the same year—a few days after the introduction of the Tariff—the prices were £16 5s. under bond, and £22 5s. duty paid, the duty having been increased to £6 per ton. Honorable senators will see, therefore, that the price was increased to the full extent of the additional duty imposed. On the 1st November, 1902, the price of sugar all over the world—and this is a matter to which I would call Senator Playford's special attention—had fallen £1 5s. per ton. The prices in South Australia were then £14 5s. under bond, and £20 5s. duty paid. The price of sugar under bond had fallen, but it will be seen that the full extent of the duty was added to the ruling rates. The present prices in Adelaide are £15 10s. per ton under bond, and £21 10s. duty paid, so that even now we are paying more for our sugar supplies than we had to pay prior to Federation. There has been no juggling in connexion with these prices. They are quotations from the Colonial Company's 1A sugar, and they show that, notwithstanding the fall of £1 5s. per ton since 1st October, 1901, the price of 1A sugar, duty paid, in Adelaide has increased by £1 15s. per ton. The fall of £1 5s. per ton in the price of sugar all over the world, and the additional £3 for extra duty, represent £4 5s. more than we should be paying had we not federated. Senator Playford tells us, however, that he is paying no more for his sugar than he had to give for it prior to the introduction of the Tariff. Instead of now being called upon to pay £1 15s. per ton in excess of the price demanded before Federation, we should really be paying £1 5s. per ton less. That would have been the position had we not federated. The position is very clearly stated. Owing to the imposition of the duty of £6 per ton, the people of South Australia are now called upon to pay 100 per cent. more duty on their sugar than they were required to give for it before. But it may be urged that the whole of the £97,000 revenue which has been collected from this source has gone into the coffers of the State, and that the Government has received the full benefit of the increased collection. We have been clearly told, however, by the Postmaster-General, that in prosperous years sufficient sugar will be grown within the Commonwealth to supply the wants of the people of Australia. That is what we are all hoping to see; but we have to remember that as soon as that position is reached, South Australia will be credited with only about £16,000 a year, instead of the £97,000 per annum now obtained from this source.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That will be about £1 per ton of sugar consumed.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Yes. Consequently South Australia will have to make up that loss of about £80,000, which represents about $\frac{1}{2}$ d. in the £1 on our land tax by means of increased taxation. Notwithstanding that we shall lose that amount through the Customs, the consumers will not pay less for their sugar. We are asked to contribute a further sum of £5,000 per annum to Queensland and New South Wales, although it has been shown that New South Wales never employed coloured labour to any great extent. This proposal would not have been applied to New South Wales but for the fact that the Constitution provides that a bonus shall not be given for a specific purpose to any one State, but shall be applied to the whole Commonwealth. South Australia has been making great sacrifices, and now she is to be called upon to sacrifice nearly £100,000 a year, in order that she may subscribe to the finances of New South Wales and Queensland. The financial position of these States is better than that of the State which I have the honour to represent. New South Wales at all events is in a better position than South Australia, while Queensland is doing what we decline to do in the interests of this sentiment. This Bill will be monstrously unjust to the people of South Australia.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—Senator Charleston has referred at considerable length to the great injustice which will be inflicted upon the State which he represents if this rebate is applied on a population basis. Prior to Federation no Excise duty was levied on sugar grown in Australia, and the existing duty of £3 per ton really means that the sugar-growers of the Commonwealth have to pay that impost for the privilege of carrying on their operations. In other words they are called upon to pay to the people of Australia as a whole the sum of £274,500 per annum, although to those who produce their sugar by white labour a refund of £60,000 is to be made. It will thus be seen that instead of any injustice being inflicted upon any State by reason of the imposition of this excise duty, a very great benefit is being conferred upon the States among whom the revenue so obtained is distributed. The imposition of the duty has been a distinct advantage to the various States. Of course, a portion of the impost is returned if the sugar upon which it is levied is grown by white labour; but I cannot see where any injustice occurs.

Senator CHARLESTON. — The honorable senator should not forget the bookkeeping period.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — But the excise will continue after that period has elapsed. The honorable senator said that South Australia had made enormous sacrifices in order that the policy of a white Australia should be carried out, and that Queensland had acted in a most selfish manner. South Australia certainly prohibited coloured people from entering the Northern Territory. The Government of that State had an opportunity of leasing the Northern Territory to a syndicate upon the condition that they should have a free hand in regard to the employment of coloured labour, and they are entitled to a certain degree of credit for refusing that offer. It must be remembered, however, that no State would have allowed a syndicate or a chartered company to take such an enormous area under its exclusive control. Therefore, while South Australia is to be commended for its action in that matter, the fact must not be overlooked that it did only what any other State would have done in the circumstances.

Senator CHARLESTON. — We could have given up the Northern Territory and saved over £80,000 a year.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — But South Australia took it over.

Senator CHARLESTON. — For the benefit of Australia.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — Purely for the benefit of South Australia. I would point out that Queensland was the first State in the Commonwealth to prohibit the introduction of coloured labour. Thirty or 40 years ago when there were something like 30,000 Chinese on the gold-fields near the Palmer River, Sir John Douglas brought in a Bill to prevent coloured labour from coming into Queensland. That Bill was not assented to by the Imperial authorities, and, in order to carry out its object, the State Government had to resort to something in the nature of a ruse—it had to apply strict quarantine regulations, and quarantine all ships which came from China and other parts with coloured labour for Queensland. In view of the fact that the present proportion of coloured labour in Queensland is not nearly so large as it is in the Northern Territory, the remarks made by Senator Charleston are somewhat harsh. There is a larger proportion of coloured people in the Northern Territory than there is in South Carolina, United States. For every three white people in the Northern Territory there are two coloured aliens, but in Queensland the ratio is very small.

Senator PLAYFORD. — But the whole of Queensland is not within the tropics, while the Northern Territory is.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — I am not referring to that fact. I think that Senator Millen's contention is an admirable one. If the people who are growing sugar in Queensland desire to substitute white for coloured labour, surely we should give them every encouragement. In dealing with this matter we must recollect that having put in a crop, the planters do not plant again for from three to six or seven years. If we say to them that until they have put in their crops by white labour, they shall not reap the benefit of this rebate, although they employ white labour in all the remaining operations, we shall force them to continue the employment of coloured labour, although, ostensibly, we desire them to discontinue it. If the amendment is carried, and we provide that as long as they employ white labour from the time of one cutting until the next take-place, we shall mete out justice to them. If they comply with that condition they will be undoubtedly entitled to the refund. Many of these people are employing coloured labour at present, and if we carry the Bill as presented by the Government every kanaka that it is possible to introduce this year into Australia will be brought in. Those who are in the unfortunate position of having failed to plant since the 24th February last will receive no benefit so long as their crops continue, and therefore they will import as many kanakas as they can in order to derive the benefit of cheap labour.

Senator DRAKE. — But they have known all about this matter from the first, and two extensions have been granted to them.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — These people must be in the unfortunate position of not being able to substitute white labour, because they have had coloured labour under contract.

Senator DRAKE. — The planters at Cairns told me that they would be perfectly satisfied if they got this extension.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—Certain planters may have made that statement to Senator Drake, because they may have been in a position to accept an extension and benefit by it, but other planters, probably the majority of them, would not be in that position. It is a common thing for a man to say, "As it does not affect me, I am quite agreeable to it"; he does not think of other persons.

Senator DRAKE.—It affects these men very much.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—It will affect them beneficially, because they can get the bonus. Our desire is to get the planters to discontinue growing sugar by coloured labour. If they comply with this requirement—from one cutting to another cutting—then they ought undoubtedly to be allowed to receive the bonus.

Senator DRAKE.—I hope that my honorable friend will give me an opportunity of explaining the clause before he makes up his mind.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—Many senators are in favour of a white Australia so long as it does not cost their State anything. For instance, Senator Symon said the other day that if the bonus had to be paid on a population basis, it would cost South Australia a couple of thousand pounds and put a strain on the Federal feeling there.

Senator DOBSON.—Does not the honorable senator think that there ought to be a limit fixed? Is he prepared to pay £1,000,000 to get rid of the kanakas?

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—We do not pay anything; we receive a large sum and hand back a small portion of it as a bonus. We receive £274,000 a year from the planters for the privilege of growing sugar-cane, and a small portion of that sum, £60,000, is given back.

Senator FRASER.—Those figures are wrong; we are handing back two-thirds of what they pay.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—Yes, if it is all grown by white labour, but not one-half of it is grown by white labour. If we were handing back everything, we should be in no worse a position now than we were in before federation, because we should be handing back only what we received from them. We all enjoy very great benefits as the result of sugar-growing in Queensland, and therefore we ought to be very well satisfied to encourage the white Australia policy, and to agree to the bonus being debited to the States on the per capita basis.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I am sure that Queenslanders generally must feel very grateful for the manner in which senators from other States have met this proposal of the Government. There are only two States—Queensland more so than New South Wales—which are particularly desirous of getting this bonus. While we are naturally anxious to get the benefit of the bonus, and of a white Australia, we must see that we do not defeat our aim. I venture to think that if Senator Millen's proposition is carried out we shall not succeed in our desire to have cane produced by white labour. Perhaps honorable senators may think it strange that I should urge a limit to be put on this proposal, but I do so in the interests of the producers of white-grown sugar. When the Pacific Island Labourers Bill was passed, towards the end of 1901, all the planters knew that kanaka labour was to be done away with. The Government and all those of us who favoured a white Australia were in a dilemma as to how best to encourage the white grower, and it was decided that the best way would be to give a rebate of 4s. a ton to the man who produced his cane with white labour. A number of growers—over 1,000—registered to produce white-grown sugar, and the question was put to the Minister—"Am I to be debarred from getting the bonus because I planted my cane with black labour in 1901? I do not think I should be so debarred." The Minister said "No; we shall not debar you because your cane was planted in 1901. We shall not debar you if your cane was planted in the early part of 1902. But if you plant cane with black labour after that time you will not get the bonus." That was the limit at that time. Senators Dobson, Drake, and others went through Queensland, and a number of cane-growers said that they did not know that the white Australia policy was likely to be so successful, otherwise they would not have planted their cane with black labour, and they wished to know if they would be debarred from getting the bonus this year if their cane was planted with black labour at the end of 1902. The Minister came out with a new regulation, and said—"Those who plant cane with black labour up to February, 1903, shall get the bonus, but we are not going to allow any further extensions. If you plant cane with black labour after the date you will not get the bonus." What will happen if it is made possible up to the end of 1907 for a man to claim the bonus for white-grown sugar? How will the Government be able to say what is white-grown sugar?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—They will register twelve months before.

Senator HIGGS.—If they register twelve months before, I imagine that it will not be open to the end of 1907. To show the success of the rebate or bonus system, 1,600 out of the 2,610 planters mentioned by Dr. Maxwell in his report—all small men it is admitted—are registered to produce white grown sugar. If we allow a man to get the bonus this year, to employ kanakas next year to do the greater portion of the work in producing white grown sugar, and to come along in 1905 and ask for a bonus, is that fair to the planters who have continued to employ white labour since the commencement of the operation of the Act? I do not think it is. Senator Drake knows of some cases in which the planters have taken advantage of the bonus for 1902, and as soon as it was paid, reverted to the use of black labour. Is that what the Senate wishes to encourage? Senator Drake has told us that at Cairns he was waited upon by a deputation of planters, who said that they would be perfectly satisfied with this concession. Some honorable senators think that an injustice is being done, but I am satisfied that no injustice will be done in limiting the time to 1903. The great injustice which I think the Bill does is in providing that at the end of 1907 the bonus shall cease, because in the Commonwealth we have 80,000 coloured aliens. The Premier of Queensland, who hoped the white Australia policy would get a fair trial, has said that a number of the planters in that State are employing Hindoos, Chinese, and other coloured aliens in place of the kanakas. What is to happen at the end of 1907, if one plantation has 100 Hindoos employed and a neighbouring one has white men employed? Should not the planters who employ white labour receive some encouragement? Would honorable senators by the withdrawal of the bonus compel those planters to revert to the employment of coloured labour—Papuan, South Sea Islanders, or Hindoos? I imagine that there will be considerable difficulty in getting rid of the kanakas.

I shall do my best to see that the provisions of the Act are carried out, but we do not know what obstacles may be placed in our way. Now, dismissing the kanakas from our consideration, we have in the Commonwealth 70,000 other coloured aliens, in respect of whom we have no legislation. Until the law is altered we shall not be able to send the Chinese away, and in all probability a number of the bigger planters who now employ South Sea Islanders will, as soon as they have to get rid of that labour, employ Hindoos and Chinese. The small grower who is prepared to employ white labour should be in some way encouraged in that regard, and should not be asked to compete with the planters who can employ Hindoos and Chinamen. This sugar question has given the free-trade party a nut to crack. Although we have an import duty of £6 per ton and an excise duty of £3 per ton, yet the people throughout the Commonwealth, so far as I can ascertain, get their sugar cheaper now than they did before.

Senator CHARLESTON.—They do not.

Senator HIGGS.—As a small householder, I know what I pay, and from the grocers I know what is charged generally. In Melbourne sugar which was sold at 2½d. per lb. before federation is now sold at 2½d.

Senator CHARLESTON.—The world's price has fallen £1 5s. a ton.

Senator HIGGS.—There may be a slight difference in the wholesale price, but I am speaking of the cost of the article to the consumer, whom the free-trade party said would have to pay the extra duty.

Senator MILLEN.—The imposition of the duty has been an injury and not an advantage to the grower, because he has to sell for less now than he did before, according to the honorable senator.

Senator HIGGS.—No; what I mean to say is that there has been such a lowering of the price of sugar in Europe that, with our duty, it can come in and keep down the price of the local article to what it is. I commend this fact to Senator Millen's notice, because he was very much amused when somebody said that the consumer did not pay the duty. We can now show that the sugar consumer is not paying the duty in this case.

Senator MILLEN.—If that is the case, will the honorable senator vote for abolishing the duty, and putting up the price for the benefit of the growers?

Senator DRAKE.—If we abolish the duty the price will go down lower.

Senator HIGGS.—If we took off the £6 per ton, the sugar industry in Queensland would be ruined. Even with black labour we could not compete with sugar-producers in other parts of the world. There is no getting away from the solid fact that, while we are paying £6 per ton on imported sugar, we are paying less for our sugar retail. I shall try in Committee to secure an extension of the term from 1907 to, say, 1910. I know that the date 1907 which we fixed in the Customs Tariff Bill has created a fear in the minds of sugar planters that the rebate may be taken away from them at that date. The date ought to be extended in order to give them an additional assurance. The excise ought to be retained, because it does not come out of the growers' pockets, but largely out of the pockets of the Colonial Sugar Refining Company. The bonus or rebate of £2 per ton has been a God-send to the growers of cane by white labour in Queensland, because they get the same price now for their cane—12s., 13s., or 14s. per ton—as they did before, in addition to the bonus from the Government. The storekeepers and others throughout Queensland are delighted with the change, and have become converts to the white Australia policy. I do not anticipate that those who favour that policy will have any trouble with their constituents at the next election, so that Senator Fraser's doleful prognostications as to what is going to happen to me at the hands of Queenslanders are not likely to be realized.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I have frequently said that the Government policy in respect to sugar was very foolish. It is now proven to be so from the very Bill which we have in our hands. They now have to undo what they formerly did. I am not going to oppose the Bill—unless I change my mind afterwards—but even if we make this alteration there will be more trouble ahead. The Queensland sugar industry was making enormous headway under the State Government. It had no protection whatever.

Senator DRAKE.—Oh yes it had.

Senator FRASER.—What was it?

Senator DRAKE.—£5 per ton.

Senator FRASER.—That was of no use to the growers.

Senator HIGGS.—Oh, yes, it was.

Senator FRASER.—There was a nominal duty throughout Australia I am quite aware, but every honorable senator knows that it was of no value. It was of about as much use to the producer as would be a duty imposed on wool, wheat, and butter. I have bought sugar in Queensland for the last 35 years. Quite recently I have paid as low as ten guineas for No. 3 sugar produced in Queensland. The sugar was sold in Melbourne, Sydney, Adelaide, and Tasmania, and even in London, without any advantage from a duty and competed with sugars grown in other parts of the world. It was a remarkably cheap product from the point of view of the Queensland people. Of course Queensland sugar, sold in Melbourne in competition with sugars produced elsewhere, could not be cheaper than the other sugars because it had to pay duty.

Senator DRAKE.—The Queensland growers would not like to sell sugar in Melbourne now in competition with the world.

Senator FRASER.—Exactly. When we imposed a duty of £6 per ton on imported sugar we gave the Queensland grower an immense advantage because their sugar is sold throughout the Commonwealth without paying any import duty whatever.

Senator DRAKE.—Then there is the £3 excise.

Senator FRASER.—Yes; but the men who grow their sugar by white labour have now and always will have the advantage of £5 per ton over imported sugar. Of course that is an immense pull to them, and until their sugar is exported will continue to be an advantage. I do not begrudge them the advantage, considering the disabilities under which we have placed them. But, though it is of no use trying to gather up spilt milk, what ought to have been done was to leave the sugar business alone for a few years. Really and truly there was no white Australia about it. The industry would have made great headway if we had let it alone. It will not make great headway under difficulties, because, no matter what honorable senators say, it will be impossible to grow sugar north of Townsville, without black labour—or labour that will be able to stand the climate. It cannot be done. We now have proof that it cannot be done. I have repeatedly said on the floor of this Senate and now repeat that we ought to have left the sugar-growers alone; because people cannot, even if they wish to do so, grow sugar by white labour in Cairns and similar districts.

Senator STEWART.—They are doing it.

Senator FRASER.—I do not say that there may not be a struggling small man here and there who may attempt to do it, but I maintain that sugar will not be grown north of Townsville as successfully as it has been grown with the aid of black labour. It is impossible. To grow it with the aid of white labour means asking white men to do what they ought not to do, and cannot do if they try. This policy means putting back that part of Queensland into a primeval condition, which is a foolish thing to do. The statistics before us fully prove my statement. Only 15 per cent. of the sugar grown in Queensland is produced by white labour. This Bill does not treat the growers fairly. Suppose a man puts in a crop this year. The stools will produce sugar for five or six years. It does not appear to me to be at all fair or equitable to refuse to pay that man the bonus, if in the future he cultivates and harvests his sugar with white labour. Is it to be said that because the cane was put down by black labour last year, and because the grower continues to produce sugar from the roots that are in the ground, and employs white labour only, he is to be deprived of the bonus which is to be paid to other growers? The position is absurd and unfair. A grower may have put in a crop with the aid of black labour some years ago, and there may be alongside him a man who put in his cane with white labour. It will require an army of inspectors to carry out this business. We have too many inspectors already. The Commonwealth is overladen with public servants.

Senator DRAKE.—One of the objections to Senator Millen's proposal is that it would make the work of inspection more difficult.

Senator FRASER.—I grant that it may. But are you going to perpetrate a glaring injustice because to do otherwise will entail some expense?

Senator DRAKE.—We cannot see the injustice.

Senator FRASER.—I do.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We say to the planters—"Do away with black labour, and you shall get the bonus."

Senator FRASER.—But that is not quite so. A planter has put in his cane with black labour, but has afterwards entirely done away with black labour. He is producing his crop of sugar with the aid of white labour. He will get crops off his plantation for five or six years. Yet, because he put down the roots with black labour, he cannot participate in the bonus.

Senator DRAKE.—He can, unless he has planted with black labour after the date mentioned in the Bill.

Senator FRASER.—As I understand it, because a crop was put in by black labour last year, although for the five succeeding years the planter grows sugar with the white labour, he cannot participate in bonus.

Senator DRAKE.—We say that after the 1st March, 1903, he must not plant with black labour.

Senator FRASER.—That is not quite so severe as I understood it to be. But are the people of the far north of Queensland to be ruined entirely by trying to comply with this law? I say there will be very great difficulty, and very great loss entailed. Of course they are getting a great advantage, and I shall personally offer no objection to it; but, unless I find that I am mistaken in some of my facts, I shall have to vote for the amendment suggested by Senator Millen.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON (Tasmania).—I should like to say a few words about this Bill, which is one I entirely disapprove of. I do not desire to touch upon the subject of a white Australia, beyond saying that when Queensland spoke out so very strongly upon that subject, she ought to have realized also that if her policy was to be carried out she should be responsible for the burden it entailed. She should not have expected that she would be allowed to come cap in hand and ask such a poor State as Tasmania to pay for the privilege she desired to obtain. Last year Tasmania's share of the burden to enable Queensland to secure the privilege was £16,206. We lost that amount of money, and got nothing in return for it.

Senator MILLER.—Did not Tasmania pronounce for a white Australia, and did not Tasmanian representatives approve of the Pacific Island Labourers' Bill?

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—I do not think that Tasmania did. Speaking for myself I was most strongly against it. I say that here in the Senate Chamber, and I can go out upon it. I do not see why the Government should now penalize Tasmania still further to the extent which will result from the operation of this Bill. I am sure that every honorable senator is animated as I am myself with a desire to deal fairly and squarely, and to treat all the States of the Commonwealth liberally and properly. But in a matter of this kind it is the duty of the Government to consider the straits that the smaller States are put into financially by the passage of legislation of this character. If we must adopt the bonus arrangement to meet the necessities of Queensland—

Senator DRAKE.—That is not so. It does not affect Queensland.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—I do not say that I shall do anything to prevent it, but if we must adopt some such legislation I hope that while the bookkeeping provisions of the Constitution have to be maintained, the Government will bring forward some scheme whereby the difficulties we are labouring under in various ways, and in this way particularly, may be alleviated to some extent, pending the equalization of the Customs revenue per capita over the whole community.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator must not take it for granted that the per capita system is going to obtain.

Senator Lt.-Col. CAMERON.—I quite admit that, but the honorable senator will agree with me that we require some scheme which will deal fairly with all parties. The honorable senator spoke of honesty of purpose just now, and all I ask for is honesty of treatment for the different States. When I find that the small State of Tasmania, which is now in great difficulty financially, is called upon to pay £16,206 for this purpose, it appears to me that the Government cannot have given sufficient consideration to the position of that State, or they would not have brought forward a Bill like this without some provision to meet the case I have laid before the Senate.

Debate (on motion by Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER) adjourned.

SUGAR REBATE ABOLITION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

This is a small Bill consequent upon the Bill which we have just been considering.

The matter with which it deals is necessarily put in a separate measure, for reasons which are well known to honorable senators. It deals with the Excise Act of 1902, and makes a necessary alteration in the schedule so as to enable the payments to be made as bounties, and not by way of rebate. The Bill is a very simple one, as honorable senators will see, and consists of only three clauses, giving the necessary authority for the alteration to which I have referred.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I rise only for the purpose of asking the Postmaster-General how far he proposes to proceed with this measure? The honorable and learned senator himself has stated that this is a natural sequence of the measure which we have just set aside, and it would clearly not do to pass this Bill before we have dealt with the other measure.

Senator DRAKE.—I wish it to follow the other measure.

Senator MILLEN.—So long as it is not intended to go on with this Bill now, I am satisfied.

Debate (on motion by Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER) adjourned.

CANADIAN-AUSTRALIAN MAIL CONTRACT.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—I move—

- (1) That the Senate approves of an extension for a period of two years of the arrangements entered into on the 5th day of June, 1899, and the 10th day of August, 1899, by the Governments of New South Wales and Queensland respectively, for the carriage of mails between Australia, Fiji, and Canada by the steamers of the Canadian-Australian Royal Mail Line upon the following terms:—

- (a) That the amount of subsidy payable by the Commonwealth be increased by a sum not exceeding £8,000, being the Commonwealth proportion of a total increase of £16,000.

- (b) That provision be made for the efficiency of the vessels employed in such service.

- (2) That this resolution be communicated by message to the House of Representatives.

In this motion the Government are asking the approval of Parliament to the extension of the present Vancouver mail contract for another two years. At the outset, however, I desire, by leave, to amend the motion as I am able now to state what will be the exact cost of this extension to the two States primarily interested. I propose to amend it by striking out the words "not exceeding £8,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "of £6,363 12s. 9d."

Motion, by leave, amended accordingly.

Senator DRAKE.—The total amount of the increased subsidy, namely, £16,000, will remain, but the proportions had not been worked out at the time that the motion was framed and placed upon the notice-paper, and, therefore, I could not then give the exact amount. I shall now show the proportions of the subsidy which will be paid by the various contributing bodies. The arrangements relate to services which are practically one, and it is just as well that we should deal with them in that light. The contract, which was originally entered upon for a series of four years, expired on the 30th April last. There can be no doubt that during that period the service resulted in a considerable loss, owing largely to the fact that the trade between Australia and Canada has not yet had a fair chance to develop. We hope that in consequence, among other things, of the establishment of more immediate cable communication between Canada and Australia, the traffic between these two great countries will increase. In the meantime we are asking for authority to extend this service for another two years, so that at the expiration of that time we shall be able to consider the very much wider question of a service of a much better character. I may mention here that I have endeavoured to make arrangements, so that all our mail contracts, including the coastal contracts of the various States, shall fall in about the same time. In that way we shall have a very much better opportunity to negotiate for a first-class mail service. I have had some figures prepared which perhaps will be interesting to honorable senators. They involve matters in regard to which I am continually being questioned, and perhaps it would be as well to place them upon record. The contract for the P. and O. and Orient lines, of which we have heard so much of late, will terminate on the 31st January, 1905, and the subsidy is £72,000 per annum. The contract for the Canadian-Australian line, presuming that this extension is ratified, will expire on the 30th April, 1905, and the subsidy in connexion with it will comprise £13,636 7s. 3d. paid by New South Wales, and £10,227 5s. 6d.

paid by Queensland. Then there are certain Queensland contracts. For example, we have the A.U.S.N. contract to carry mails between Brisbane, Cooktown, Gladstone, Townsville, and Cairns—generally known as the Barcoo line—which expires on the 28th October, 1905. The subsidy in that case is £16,750 per annum. There is also the Gulf Line from Brisbane to Normanton, which will expire on the 15th January, 1906, and the subsidy in connexion with which is £6,000 per annum. We have recently entered into a short contract with regard to Tasmania, which will expire on the 30th September, 1906. Under that contract we shall be paying at the rate of £500 per month until the 30th September next, when we shall pay at the rate of £9,000 per annum until 31st January, 1905, when a large new steamer will be put into service; the payment will then be £13,000 per annum. Another contract provides for a service on the north-west coast of Western Australia—from Fremantle to Wyndham. It will expire on the 28th February, 1906, and under it we are paying £4,000 per annum. The contract for a service on the south-east coast of Western Australia—Albany, Esperance, and Eucla—expires on the 31st December, 1905, and for that service we are paying £6,000 per annum. For the service between Adelaide and Port Darwin we are paying £3,600 per annum. These represent the principal contracts that we have for the carriage of mails by sea. It will be observed that they will all expire during the year 1905 or the beginning of 1906, when we shall have to decide the big question of the mail service between Australia and Great Britain. We do not know what service the companies that are now doing the work, or other companies that may attempt to come in, will be prepared to offer us, but I think it will be agreed that we should have as many strings as possible to our bow when the time comes to call for tenders. That time is rapidly approaching, and I am now taking steps with a view to calling for tenders for new services. It is certainly desirable that when that time arrives we should be able to offer what inducements we can to first-class companies. The service to which this motion refers cannot be put forward primarily as being a postal service, nor can any of the others which I have mentioned. It has been the practice in the past for the various States to debit the expense of these services to the Postal Department. That practice has been looked upon as a convenient one, but I hope that we shall soon follow the example of other countries, such as Canada, and have a commercial or development fund for the purpose of subsidizing services which, in the main, are run, not for the purpose of carrying postal matter, but to develop commerce and accommodate shippers and passengers.

Senator WALKER.—Is it proposed that the cost of the extension of the existing contract shall be charged only to New South Wales and Queensland?

Senator DRAKE.—This particular extension will be charged to those States. Although it will be a new contract in the sense that we shall have to draw up a fresh agreement and sign it, we regard it really as being an extension of the existing service. The old agreement has actually run out, but the company has been paid to continue the service from month to month. We propose now to extend it for two years from the 1st of May last, in order that it shall not come to an abrupt conclusion. There can be no doubt that the company has lost very heavily in the past in carrying out this service. Of course I cannot undertake to say definitely what its losses have been. Various amounts have been stated, but it cannot be denied that the service has been a losing one for them. In making the new arrangement, therefore, we had to consider the terms upon which the company would consent to carry on for another two years. That matter involved long negotiations between the Government and the company, and the increased amount of £16,000 was the lowest that they would consent to accept for the continuation of the service. Hitherto the subsidy has been paid in the following proportions:—New South Wales, £10,000 per annum; Queensland, £7,500 per annum; Canada, £25,000 per annum; and Fiji, £1,500 per annum. Those payments make up the total subsidy of £44,000 which has been given up to the present time. The increase of £16,000, which will bring the total subsidy up to £60,000, has been apportioned in this way: Canada will pay an additional £9,090 18s. 2d. per annum, the Commonwealth an additional £6,363 12s. 9d. per annum, which will be debited as transferred expenditure to New South Wales and Queensland, and Fiji an additional £545 9s. 1d. per annum. The increased sum of £6,363 12s. 9d. to be paid annually by the Commonwealth will be distributed between Queensland and New South Wales, so that the last-named State will be called called upon to pay £3,636 7s. 3d., while Queensland will contribute £2,727 5s. 6d. per annum. One condition which has been insisted upon by the Government and agreed to by the company is that the Miwera, which, as is generally known, is not equal in speed and convenience to the other two boats on the service—the Moana and the Aorangi—shall be taken off for one trip and completely overhauled. Necessary repairs are to be effected and she is to be improved, so as to be made thoroughly efficient to the satisfaction of the Prime Minister, or at his option, of the Postmaster-General. If the Miwera is improved so as to give that satisfaction, we reckon that she will be able to make her trips as satisfactorily as the Moana and the Aorangi, and we shall then have between Australia and Vancouver a service which will be very satisfactory from a passenger, as well as a cargo, point of view. Of course, as a postal service, it will also be of very great advantage to us as between Australia and Canada.

Senator WALKER. — How about the length of time it will take the mails to go to England?

Senator DRAKE.—From three to four days longer than it takes the mails by the P. and O. line to go to England. So far as Canada is concerned, it is an up-to-date and as good a mail service as we could expect to get. We should have no regular communication with Fiji if it were not for this service. I do not think that I have put the case too strongly because it is of no use to try to make out that it is a first-class mail service. We ask for an extension principally because it is one of our trade routes, and a route in a direction in which we hope that trade will considerably develop. We think that it would be a very unfortunate thing if at this particular time that service should cease.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Is there any condition in the agreement prohibiting the use of coloured labour?

Senator DRAKE.—The contract will be carried out according to the conditions of our Post and Telegraph Act. It is not usual to ask for the approval of Parliament in a matter of this kind, but the original contract was made subject to parliamentary approval, and obtained that approval, and therefore we think it is right before we take any step to extend the contract that we should again ask for parliamentary approval.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I do not rise with a view of offering any opposition to the motion, for indeed it has my very cordial support, but there are one or two matters to which I should like to draw the attention of the Postmaster-General. While I say that I am not prepared to take exception at this stage to the proposal that the whole of this expenditure shall be charged to certain States, I wish to place on record that I am not prepared to sanction that as a principle so far as the vessels which have to do with our outgoing commerce are concerned. I admit at once that it is a renewal of an existing arrangement, but that arrangement was made when the States were separate entities and had necessarily to arrange for the conduct of their affairs. Surely it was not unreasonable to assume that once Federation became an accomplished fact all matters of this kind were to be dealt with by the Federal authorities for Federal purposes. This mail service, the cost of which is to fall on two States is distinctly for the benefit of every State in the Union. Can it be supposed for a moment that only the mails of New South Wales and Queensland are transmitted by these boats? I think it would not be at all difficult to show that this is a charge which might fairly be laid on the Commonwealth. I am not prepared now to take any exception to the motion, or to move any amendment, but as one of the representatives of New South Wales, I wish it to be distinctly understood that, whilst at the present time I agree to the motion, I do not, in any way, indorse the proposition which it really contains.

Senator DRAKE.—It is continuance and maintenance: it all turns on that.

Senator MILLEN.—I am quite aware of that. At the same time, I think it must be admitted that I am stating a reasonable case, and I hope in a reasonable way, when I say that this mail subsidy is distinctly for the benefit of the whole Commonwealth. Surely it was to be supposed that in our external relations matters were to be dealt with from a Commonwealth stand-point only—that if there was any purpose in establishing the Commonwealth at all, it was to permit of that being done.

Senator DRAKE.—Then the bookkeeping clauses come in the way.

Senator MILLEN.—That is quite true, but they will not affect the contention I am advancing—that this charge is one which might fairly have been distributed amongst the States seeing that the result of the expenditure must be a general benefit. I do not mean to say that the lion's share of that benefit may not be reaped by the two States containing the ports of call. These subsidized steamers running to another country must clearly carry the mails of all the States.

Senator DRAKE.—We will charge other States poundage.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable and learned gentleman cannot charge the other States poundage in this case, because he pays a lump sum.

Senator DRAKE.—Yes, we can.

Senator MILLEN.—If it is done the honorable and learned gentleman is wrong in saying that this cost is to be charged against New South Wales and Queensland.

Senator DRAKE.—That is what will be done first of all; but those States can get the advantage of any poundage which is charged to other States.

Senator MILLEN.—The poundage is so small that it is hardly worth talking about. I do not think that it in any way affects my contention that since this service is for the good of all the States it ought to be paid for by the States in proportion either to the population or to the benefit which it is held that they derive therefrom. Seeing that I have approached the subject with some idea, so far as the representative of one State can do, of rendering some slight assistance to the other States, I may be pardoned for expressing the hope that the representatives of the other States will consider, in a similar spirit, any proposition wherein it may appear that New South Wales gains some slight advantage. I wish to draw the attention of the Postmaster-General to the time-table. If a letter which I had the opportunity of perusing is correct, there has been a great deal of clumsiness in fixing the dates for the despatch of the vessels. I understand that two steamers largely serving the same purpose have sailed on the same date.

Senator DRAKE.—We have no control over one of them.

Senator MILLEN.—The steamer over which the Postmaster-General has no control has a fixed sailing day, and if he knows the day on which the Oceanic boat sails, surely it ought to be possible, as an ordinary matter of business, in making his arrangements with a firm he proposes to subsidize, to have some voice in fixing the dates on which their boats shall sail.

Senator DRAKE.—Would not the other company change their sailing dates then? For some reason or other they always will send out their boats on the same day—why, I do not know.

Senator MILLEN.—No; the honorable and learned gentleman sends out his boat at the same time as they send out their boat. I do not hold him responsible for the sailing of the other boat, but I merely suggest that some step might be taken to largely increase our mail facilities with the American continent and Europe. I am sure that the honorable and learned gentleman will admit the desirability of doing that if it can be done.

Senator DRAKE.—We tried to do that, but we found that the non-subsidized boat would run on the same date as the other. That is the tendency, and that is what we want to check.

Senator MILLEN.—Possibly there is a tendency of that kind in order to compete with the subsidized boat, but I still think it is possible to take some step to improve our external communication.

Senator DRAKE.—We are trying to do so.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I am very pleased that Senator MilLEN has spoken as he has done. My attention has also been drawn to this matter. If it is to be a purely mail service, it is a question whether it would not be more rapid via San Francisco. But I take it that the wish of the Senate is rather to support the all-red route, and hence our willingness, I presume, to put up with the slight delay in the carriage of the mails. The information which has been furnished to me would seem to show that very shortly a mail will go from San Francisco to New York in three and a half days, and consequently it is desirable that our mail boats should possess a greater rate of speed than they have hitherto done. I was glad to hear Senator Drake say that the Alouera is to be replaced—by a boat of larger tonnage, I presume!

Senator DRAKE.—She is to be overhauled and repaired.

Senator WALKER.—I presume that when the contract expires, two years hence, tenders will be called for a service either via Vancouver or via San Francisco.

Senator DRAKE.—Very soon.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SENATE ELECTIONS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

The Bill is designed to prevent an inconvenience which, we think, may arise under the wording of the Constitution Act on the occasion of the next election of senators. We have the general provision with regard to the election of members of the Senate, which, I think, is perfectly clear to all senators. We have all gone through an election for the term of six years, and I think I need hardly say anything with regard to that portion of the subject. Section 15 says—

If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service, the Houses of Parliament of the State for which he was chosen shall, sitting and voting together, choose a person to hold the place until the expiration of the term, or until the election of a successor as hereinafter provided, whichever first happens. But if the Houses of Parliament of the State are not in session at the time when the vacancy is notified, the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a person to hold the place until the expiration of fourteen days after the beginning of the next session of the Parliament of the State, or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens.

At the next general election of members of the House of Representatives, or at the next election of senators for the State, whichever first happens, a successor shall, if the term has not then expired, be chosen to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term.

That has happened in the case of two States—in Victoria by the death of Senator Sargood, and in Western Australia by the resignation of Senator Ewing. Consequently at the next election for senators in those States the people will be called upon to elect three senators for six years, and one senator for the balance of the term of the senator who was previously sitting here.

Senator WALKER. — Senator Ewing's term is only three years.

Senator DRAKE.—I thank the honorable senator for the correction. Still, the one case is sufficient to illustrate the position. The case that has occurred recently may happen again—that there may be some casual election to fill the place of a senator whose full term was six years. In Victoria at the next election the people will be called upon to elect three senators for six years, and one for three years. The question is, how is that to be done? It might be done by holding separate elections at the same time: one of three senators for six years—for which any one, under the conditions of the Constitution Act, might be nominated—and one for a senator to sit three years. It appears to me that a very great difficulty might arise from holding separate elections for the senators for the six years term, and for the one senator for the three years term, at the same time. It would be exceedingly difficult for electors to know how to vote. In the first place, the probability is that those persons who were nominated for the six years term would also be nominated for the three years term; because the persons who were nominated for one of the full terms might feel that, in order to secure their election, it was wiser also to be nominated for the shorter term. On the voter going to the polling place he would find four, five, or six names on the voting paper for the election of the three senators who were to be chosen for six years. He would have to vote for those senators, and then take another ballot-paper containing the same names, and vote for one senator for the three years term.

Senator MILLEN.—That could be prevented by barring a candidate from double nomination.

Senator DRAKE.—I hardly think we could do that.

Senator MILLEN.—It would be one way out of the difficulty.

Senator DRAKE.—I do not think that we could say constitutionally that Jones or Brown should be debarred from being a candidate for the casual vacancy because he was also a candidate for the full term.

Senator MILLEN.—We have debarred members of States Parliaments from candidature.

Senator DAWSON.—But it had no effect.

Senator MILLEN.—I am not advocating the course I have mentioned, but I suggest that it could be done.

Senator DRAKE.—We have debarred members of States Parliaments under certain conditions, certainly; but apart from that question it is not advisable that what Senator MilLEN recommends should be done, because a candidate might feel that, in the event of not being elected for the full term, he might succeed in securing election for the shorter term. Why should he be debarred from being elected for the casual vacancy because he was also nominated for one of the seats for six years?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Why can we not say that the successful candidate who gets the fewest votes shall be elected for the shorter term?

Senator DRAKE.—That is exactly what we are saying in this Bill. By following the line of common sense, Senator Playford has reached the conclusion that the Government recommend. Certainly our proposal has the merit of simplicity. We assume that every candidate would like to be elected for six years, if possible, but that if he cannot succeed in securing election for six years, he would like to be elected for three years. Therefore, the fairest course is to elect the four senators together, allowing any number of persons to be nominated for the four seats, letting the first, second, and third on the poll be elected for six years, and the fourth on the poll be elected for three years. This seems to be the simplest and the fairest plan, and obviates the difficulty that might arise if we attempted to have two elections at the same time.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I second the motion for the second reading of this Bill. Having read it through carefully more than once, I cannot find fault with it, and I support it with much pleasure.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I cannot say that I agree with the proposals contained in this Bill, making provision for the election of senators. Probably I speak feelingly upon the point because, as far as I can see, the measure can only affect the State of Victoria on the present occasion. But other senators have an interest in it because, if it becomes law, it may affect them in the future exactly as it will now affect senators from Victoria. There is a provision in the Constitution for the rotation of senators. When we had to arrange as to the retirement of senators, we agreed that the three lowest on the poll for each State should be the first to retire. When that arrangement was made, there were a good many honorable senators who did not agree with the proposal.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They did not agree because they were the lowest on the poll.

Senator BARRETT.—There may be a good many reasons which lead to a candidate being low down on the poll. The money element entered strongly into the last election. A candidate with £10,000 at his disposal in a State election has a much better chance than a candidate with only £100 or £200. On the occasion to which I refer, the Government proposed that for each State the three senators who were lowest on the poll should retire at the end of the first three years. Many of us thought that that was hardly fair. Although I did not oppose the arrangement, I considered that the fairer method would have been to choose the retiring senators by lot, because, as I have already said, there are elements apart from political capacity which play an important part in elections.

Senator MILLEN.—The moneyed men may in some cases have been those who were lowest on the poll.

Senator BARRETT.—The moneyed men have a great advantage in these elections notwithstanding our Electoral Act, because, as the Americans say—"Money speaks." Those whose friends spend money in their behalf always have the best chance. Certain senators were penalized by the arrangement to which I have referred. Now, under this Bill, a retiring senator, because he happens to be 40 or 50 votes lower on the poll than a man who comes in to fill a casual vacancy may, under the peculiar conditions to be created, lose the chance of election for a six years' term. That is not fair. It is not just. I will illustrate the case of those who in Victoria will retire at the next election as against Senator Reid, who has been elected to fill the seat formerly occupied by Senator Sargood. Senators Best, Styles, and myself will retire and seek re-election. At the last election there was a very close contest so far as we three were concerned. A little more than 3,000 votes divided us. Suppose that at the next election there are for the four seats five candidates. It may be that Senator Reid will obtain a few more votes than I secure. In that case, under this Bill, Senator Reid will get a six years' term, and I shall have to face the electors again at the end of three years. That is to say, I shall have to contest three elections in five and a half years.

Senator DOWSON.—Still, he will be the choice of the electors.

Senator BARRETT.—I say it is not so.

Senator MILLEN.—It will not be the honorable senator's own choice if he is at the bottom of the poll.

Senator BARRETT.—The honorable senator knows exactly what I mean—I am speaking of the advantages one candidate may have over another. The chances are that, if we were all similarly placed with regard to monetary support, the results would not be the same. I think that, under the circumstances, the three retiring senators who obtain re-election, should enjoy the six years' term. I would place the other senator, who is chosen to fill the casual vacancy, in the position in which he was when he came into the Senate, namely, of having to sit for the term of the senator whom he succeeded.

Senator DAWSON.—The Constitution says that he has to go up for election.

Senator BARRETT.—But under this Bill, when a senator has been once penalized, he may be penalized again in an unfair manner. I cannot, at this moment, foreshadow any amendment, but I intend to oppose the clause which I have criticised. I think some provision could be made which would do justice all round. I do not think the provisions of this Bill are fair, and I shall, therefore, oppose the second reading.

Senator FERGUSON (Queensland).—I notice that in connexion with the nomination clause of this Bill we are directed to "see the principal Act." I find that the section to which we are referred in the principal Act disqualifies a member of a States Parliament from being nominated for election as a member of the Federal Parliament. That in my opinion is not a section which should have been introduced into the Act. I know that when the Electoral Bill passed this Chamber there was no such clause in it. I was not here when the Bill came back from another place, and I intend to refer to that section now. It seems to me that it was intended to give to honorable senators a monopoly of their seats. I have no doubt whatever that that was the object of the section. Most of us won our place and position through our reputation in State politics, and our only formidable opponents when we seek re-election will be those who are similarly known to the electors. According to the section no member of a State Parliament can be nominated for election to the Federal Parliament, unless he resigns his seat as a member of the State Parliament at least a fortnight before the day of nomination.

Senator DAWSON.—That is not in this Bill.

Senator FERGUSON.—I am aware of that, but we are directed to that section by this Bill. We know that the Commonwealth Parliament offers very few attractions to State members, because the sacrifice of time involved in attending this Parliament is too great. The objection to the section is that it unduly restricts the choice of the electors.

The PRESIDENT.—I would ask the honorable senator if he thinks that question is relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill!

Senator FERGUSON.—I desire to express the opinion that the nomination of candidates for election to the Senate should be left entirely to the people. It is not for us to make any law which will restrict the electors in their choice.

The PRESIDENT.—Under our standing orders no amendment can be moved in a Bill which is not relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill. I do not think that the question raised by Senator Ferguson has anything to do with the subject-matter of this Bill. I do not give a positive opinion at present, but I doubt very much whether any amendment could be introduced into this Bill dealing with the matter which the honorable senator is now discussing.

Senator FERGUSON.—I bow to the President's ruling.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I think that perhaps upon consideration the President may be inclined to admit that a Bill "to make further provision for the election of senators" might be amended in almost any direction. On the point raised by Senator Ferguson, if I may be allowed just a word, I would say that, while I opposed the section calling upon State members to resign before they could be nominated for election to the Senate, because I thought it was unfair, those who were in favour of that section certainly had something to say on their side. They argued that if such a provision as that were not included in the Federal Electoral Act, a member of the Senate or the House of Representatives might hold two seats, and they pointed to Senator Ferguson as a shocking example of the evil which they proposed to avoid. The honorable senator, in addition to the seat which he holds in the Senate, holds a seat in the Legislative Council of Queensland.

Senator FERGUSON.—That is as great an honour as to have a seat here.

The PRESIDENT.—I think that this argument is a very strong illustration of the point I took. We are now discussing a Bill to provide in what manner senators who occupy casual vacancies shall be elected, and I do not see that that has any necessary connexion with, or is relevant to, the question now being raised. There may be great differences of opinion upon the matter referred to, but it is not raised by this Bill.

Senator HIGGS.—I shall leave that matter, and deal with the point raised by Senator Barrett. I do not think that the honorable senator's position would be very much improved if the arrangements proposed in this Bill were not made. I think it will be a convenience to the elector, if, when he comes to vote, he has a ballot paper enabling him to fill four vacancies, rather than two ballot papers, one enabling him to fill three vacancies, and the other enabling him to fill one. I would ask Senator Barrett whether he thinks he would not be in just the same position if there were no casual vacancy to be filled? If the honorable senator could not secure a place amongst the three senators to be elected, if there were no casual vacancy he would be left out altogether, and would really be in a worse position. In the case of a man who could not secure a place amongst three senators, but who might secure a place if four were to be elected, it is an advantage to have a by-election taking place at the same time as the election for the three senators.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I should like to draw the attention of the Postmaster-General and the Senate to what appears to me to be an oversight in this Bill. It sets forth certain forms, schedules (a) and (b), which are modified duplicates of schedules in the principal Act. I see nothing in the Bill now before us to substitute the schedules (a) and (b) for the schedules in the principal Act, and a difficulty will arise as to whether the forms of the principal Act or the schedules of this Bill are to be used. For instance, there is a slight variation in the form of the writ for elections, and the Bill does not say that the modified form here proposed is to take the place of that set out in the principal Act. I ask which form is going to be used? I think there should be something in the Bill before us to say that the schedules attached to this Bill are substituted for the forms provided in the main Act in order that the matter may be made perfectly clear. Honorable senators will remember that in the Sugar Rebates Abolition Bill, which was discussed this afternoon, it is clearly stated that bounties are to be substituted for the rebates. In a similar way, I think that this Bill should state that the schedules attached to it are to be substituted for those in the principal Act. I invite attention also to the clause of this Bill dealing with the powers of the Court of Disputed Returns. I do not know that the opening for any difficulty is quite so wide in this case, but if honorable senators will look at clause 11 of the Bill they will find that the Court of Disputed Returns is given power to declare three things, one of which is that any candidate who is not returned as elected was elected to fill a periodical vacancy or casual vacancy as the case may be. If honorable senators will turn to the principal Act they will find that under section 197 a similar power is given in slightly different terms. I am not at all certain whether the ingenuity which sometimes marks the legal fraternity may not determine that as this measure is the later one something is intended other than that which is provided for by section 197 of the principal Act. Under sub-section (5) of section 197 of the principal Act the Court of Disputed Returns may declare any candidate duly elected who was not returned as elected.

Senator DRAKE.—This Bill is incorporated with the principal Act.

Senator MILLEN.—If the two Acts are to be incorporated why should we state twice, and in different terms, what we wish the Court of Disputed Returns to do. This is not an additional power, but one which is already given to the Court of Disputed Returns, and there is therefore no necessity to reaffirm it. If it is intended that there should be any variation of the powers conferred upon the Court of Disputed Returns it would be as well to make some reference to the fact in this Bill, and possibly to repeal section 197 of the principal Act. But if that is not intended there is no necessity to reaffirm in this Bill a power already conferred upon the court. I should like to say with regard to the very important and interesting point raised by Senator Barrett, that no honorable senator ever for a moment entertained the idea which seems to have floated through Senator Barrett's mind, that that honorable senator will have any difficulty in being again returned to the Senate.

Senator BARRETT.—I did not say that.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator seemed depressed by a belief that that might be so.

Senator BARRETT.—If the honorable senator thinks that, he makes the greatest mistake he ever made in his life.

Senator MILLEN.—I am very pleased to hear it, because I am sure that honorable senators, and myself particularly, will welcome the return of Senator Barrett after the coming elections. I could not help thinking that, in the views which the honorable senator enunciated, there was a claim that honorable senators have something like a prescriptive right to a seat in this Chamber. Stated in that bald way that may perhaps appear to be a startling doctrine to enunciate, still, I think the views enunciated by Senator Barrett, when boiled down, come to that. What the honorable senator's contention amounted to was this: If four senators have to be elected, one of them, because he happens to have held a seat here previously, should be given some advantage over another.

Senator DAWSON.—Which would not be possible if there were not a fourth vacancy.

Senator MILLEN.—Senator Barrett appeared to me to be affirming this: That if, as may be the case in Victoria, four ex-members of the Senate stand for re-election, the three of them who previously held their seats for a longer term than the fourth should be given some prior right to the fourth irrespective of the number of votes he may poll.

Senator STYLES.—The fourth was not elected by the people.

Senator MILLEN.—Quite so, but I think Senator Barrett enunciated the doctrine which I have stated in somewhat different words to the Senate—that if on going up for election the four ex-senators are returned, the three who have held seats in the Senate for the longest term shall have some prior right over the fourth, and whatever number of votes they may poll the fourth man shall be the senator returned to serve for a three years' term, even though he may have polled two votes for every one pulled by the other honorable senators. I do not say that the majority is always right, though it generally is when I happen to win an election, but I remind honorable senators that we shall be treading upon very dangerous ground if we attempt to lay down in a Bill of this kind anything which departs from the principle which the Bill itself contains. I see no reason for what has been suggested, and I think that people outside will probably consider that it is an attempt to establish some prescriptive right to the seats they have once given us.

Debate (on motion by Senator STYLES) adjourned.

PAPER.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table—

Victorian Military Forces.—Alteration of Regulations.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—We have made very good progress this week, and as there is no pressing business for consideration to-morrow, I move—

That the Senate, at its rising, adjourn until Wednesday next.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 8.48 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 18 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SALMON.—I desire to make a personal explanation with reference to the following paragraph, which appears in this morning's Argus, under the heading "In the Federal Galleries":—

Mr. Wilks, desiring to criticise Mr. Salmon's attitude with regard to the High Court, found himself in a quandary. How could he, in addressing the Chairman, criticise the arguments of the occupant of the chair? Mr. Wilks got over the difficulty easily. Speaking with such fervour and fluency that an obvious inadvertence was readily intelligible, he persisted in addressing Mr. Salmon as Mr. Chanter, and in bombarding the supposed occupant of the chair with voluble arguments directed against the speech of the real occupant.

I desire to point out that I have delivered only one speech upon this question, and that that speech was in opposition to the Bill. There must have been some misapprehension in the mind of the writer of the paragraph to which I refer, but I should not like a wrong impression to be conveyed to the public.

CODLIN MOTH PARASITE.

Mr. McCOLL.—Has the attention of the Prime Minister been directed to the report that there has been discovered in Spain a complete remedy for the codlin moth pest, which is the greatest scourge from which our orchardists suffer? I ask him to take steps to procure full information on the subject, and, if necessary, to obtain a supply of the alleged parasites of the moth, and distribute them throughout the States. If he does so, he will confer a great benefit upon the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not debate the subject.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable member himself brought under my notice this morning the following press report:—

Mr. George Compere, entomologist to the West Australian Agricultural Department, returned to the State last week, after a lengthy trip through America and Europe in search of parasites for pests that have given trouble to local orchards. In Spain he found six different parasites of the codlin moth. One of these had completely eradicated the codlin moth in one Spanish district. Mr. Compere did not bring any of the codlin moth parasites with him, in consequence of their not being required here.

I do not know in what light the action suggested, if taken by me, would be viewed by the Agricultural Departments of the States, but I shall consider the question with the desire to do anything that lies in the power of the Government to assist the States in the eradication of so deadly a pest.

ADJOURNMENT (Forma).

ELECTORAL ROLLS.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have received an intimation from the honorable member for Macquarie that he desires to move the adjournment of the House to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, "the delay in the preparation of, and the incompleteness of, the Federal electors' rolls."

Five honorable members having risen in their places,

Question proposed:

Google

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I make no apology to honorable members for taking this step, because I find that 150,000 people have been disfranchised by the incomplete collection of the names for the proposed Federal rolls. This House took a great deal of trouble to provide a most liberal franchise for the Commonwealth electors. The Adult Franchise Act, which confers the franchise upon females as well as upon males, was assented to by the Governor-General on the 18th June, 1902, so that it has now been in operation for twelve months, and the Electoral Act was assented to on the 10th October following, so that it has been in operation for eight months. Honorable members may, therefore, ask how is it that the rolls necessary under those Acts have not been prepared? In the remarks which I have to make on this subject, I shall speak more particularly of what has been done in New South Wales, because I know more about the state of affairs there than in other States, and I shall leave other honorable members to speak in regard to the States which they represent. Although the Commonwealth electoral law differs very greatly from the electoral law of New South Wales, being much more liberal than it, the Minister for Home Affairs has taken as the basis for the Commonwealth roll the State roll for males which was collected in April, 1902, and revised in October of the same year. To show the difference between the provisions of the Federal law and those of the State law, I may mention that whereas a man is entitled to vote at the Federal elections after he has resided six months in Australia, no person who has resided in New South Wales for less than twelve months, even though he may have been a resident of Australia for twenty years, can obtain an elector's right and be enrolled, and every elector must have resided for a month in the division for which he is enrolled before he can vote at an election. Under the Federal law a man who had resided in Australia for six months and had taken up his residence in any State for one month could vote at the Federal elections, but in New South Wales he would not be able to vote at the State elections until he had resided there for twelve months, and in the division for which he was enrolled for one month. Then, again, under the Federal law, persons in receipt of assistance from the Government are entitled to vote; but under the State law such persons are disfranchised. Furthermore, the members of the military and naval forces in receipt of full pay are entitled to vote at Federal elections, but they are not entitled to vote at the State elections. The State law also contains other disqualifications which are not imposed by the Federal law, and makes it necessary for intending voters to procure electors' rights, which are not required under the Federal law. Yet, notwithstanding these great differences between the law of the Commonwealth and the law of the State, the Minister for Home Affairs has taken no steps whatever to obtain the compilation of an electoral roll in accordance with the law of the Commonwealth. A roll has been collected upon the basis of the State roll, but there is a discrepancy between the census returns and the names on that roll of about 42,000 males, and about 29,000 females, or about 71,000 in all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not the information which I have given to the House.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I think that when the honorable member looks into the matter, he will find that my figures are correct. The roll in the hands of the Minister omits several thousands of electors qualified under the Federal law, because it was compiled under the State law. If allowance is made for the omission of the names of such persons, the discrepancy will be seen to be still greater. No doubt the honorable gentleman will tell the House that he has had a Federal roll prepared, but I would inform honorable members what has actually been done. The New South Wales Government authorized the collection of the names of persons entitled to vote under the State law without reference to the Federal law, and on the 24th September, 1902, a circular was issued, also by the State Government, directing the collection of the names of females entitled to vote, not under the Federal law, but under the State law, which, as I have shown, contains many disqualifications which are not in the Federal law. The roll of female voters collected in New South Wales by the State authorities has never yet been revised, and yet the Minister for Home Affairs wishes honorable members to believe that he has taken every step to so prepare the Federal rolls that every male or female entitled to vote under the law passed twelve months ago shall be placed on the roll. I find that in 1891, when no electors' rights were issued, after deducting those who were entitled to vote under a property qualification, the difference between the number of persons on the roll and the total male adult population of New South Wales was 45,362. When we deduct from this number those who were disqualified from one cause or another, there was a difference at that time between those who were actually on the roll and those who were entitled to vote of only 7,163. From the time that the electors' roll in New South Wales was used in 1901, up to October, 1902, when the last return was submitted, there has been an increase of 14,000 in the number of male adults in the population of that State. Yet we find that, whereas in 1901 there were 318,370 electors' rights issued, the rolls as compiled at present contain the names of only 303,000 male electors. Notwithstanding the fact that there has been an increase of 14,000 in the adult male population of the State, and that many persons were disfranchised in 1901 because of their not having resided in one place for a sufficient length of time to qualify themselves under the State law, and the further fact that the Federal electoral law is much more liberal than the State law, we find that there has been a decrease of 15,000 in the number of male voters as compared with two years before. This shows clearly that there is a real deficiency, and that upwards of 40,000 male electors in New South Wales have not been placed on the roll. I need not at this stage enter into the question of the re-arrangement of the electoral divisions of New South Wales, because I do not think that honorable members have any right to introduce that subject unless they are asked to submit suggestions from the electors. Under the Federal electoral law, the Minister is required to appoint a chief electoral officer for each State, but I would ask if he has done so? He is also required to appoint a Commonwealth electoral officer for each division. I would again ask if he has done so?

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable member has not reason to complain very often about the Minister not making appointments.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is quite true. It is also provided that an electors' roll for each State shall be prepared as soon as practicable. That provision was made eight months ago, and the Minister has not appointed any officer to prepare the rolls, or to ascertain the exact number of persons to whom the right to vote should be extended. I have taken a good deal of trouble to go through the rolls, and I have found a number of decreases. For instance, although there has been an increase of population in Sydney, the number of electors in every one of the eleven divisions of that city show a decrease, compared with the roll of 1901, the total being 4,842. In the suburban electorates there is a decrease of 3,600.

Mr. THOMSON.—There should be an increase.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Of course we all know that. In the country electorates to the south, there is a decrease of 2,809; in those to the west, a decrease of 2,710; and in those to the north, 1,056; or a total decrease for the State of 15,058 compared with the roll of 1900. The Minister has done nothing to ascertain the number of persons who are entitled to vote, and, although I do not for one moment expect that he should give his personal attention to every detail of the work of his office, I think that perhaps he would have been better engaged in looking after the administration of this Act than in travelling about to some of the States. He might at least have secured the services of a competent officer to ascertain the facts of the case, and to make sure that every man who is entitled to vote is placed upon the roll. I ask the Minister whether he has any Federal roll whatever at this moment—whether he can show that any roll has been prepared under the conditions of the liberal franchise provided for in the Federal law? The basis of the rolls which he has must have been the State rolls which have been prepared under an entirely different law, and a large number of persons who would be disfranchised under the State law would be fully entitled to be placed upon the Federal rolls. There must have been fully 30,000 or 40,000 persons who have never taken up their electors' rights, but under the Federal law every person who has resided in Australia for six months—whether he has taken up his elector's right or not—is entitled to have his name upon the Federal roll for the division in which he lives. Supposing that my name were on the roll for the Bathurst division, and that I moved from Bathurst to Perth, about four miles distant, I should have my name struck off the State roll unless I resided in Perth for one month; but that would be no reason for omitting my name from the Federal roll. The Federal roll has been framed solely upon State rolls, and apparently no inquiry has been made as to the disqualification attaching to those whose names are not included on the State rolls. I do not wish to detain honorable members any further, but I felt that it was my duty to direct attention to this important matter, and to, if possible, stimulate the administration into taking the steps required to secure the preparation of proper rolls. If we allow matters to drift as the Minister has done, we shall probably find that from 100,000 to 150,000 persons who are entitled to vote, will be left off the rolls. It was the desire of every member who supported the Electoral Act that every man and woman entitled under the law should be afforded an opportunity to exercise the franchise at the next Federal election, and therefore it is important that every precaution should be taken to secure this end. The decreases to which I have referred should have been the subject of inquiry by the Minister, and he deserves censure for not having taken proper steps to administer his Department. He was warned by the leader of the Opposition that he would probably find himself in some such position as that in which he is now placed, because he appointed as the officer in charge of the Electoral Department a gentleman who was recommended for retirement from the public service of New South Wales in 1884, and who was retired in 1896. It was shown at an inquiry into the administration of the electoral office in that State that 55 officers were employed, and the staff was afterwards reduced to fourteen, at which strength it remains to the present day. I trust that the Minister will see that prompt steps are taken to insure that every person entitled to vote under the Federal law shall be placed upon the rolls.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—A very unhappy instance has been afforded of the muddle into which a department can fall. It is a pity that, although the likelihood of this position being brought about was pointed out to the Minister, no provision was made against it. I do not think that we can altogether blame the Minister, because when we put a man into a position which he is not capable of filling we can expect only one thing, and that is muddle. We did expect a muddle, and we have got it, and those honorable members who support the Government are to blame for continuing to give the Minister their countenance. It is plain that at least 150,000 electors have been disfranchised. If the Minister for Home Affairs had had no time to carry out the requirements of the Act, there might have been some excuse; but over twelve months have elapsed since the passing of one Act, and eight months since the passing of the other, and yet nothing has been done. The collection of Federal rolls in New South Wales, under proper administration, should not occupy more than two months, and if the work were carried out in connexion with the State Electoral Department, the expense need not have exceeded about £1,000. I dare say that fully that sum has been muddled away in other directions, with the result that there is nothing to show for the expenditure. It was pointed out to the Minister at the time that there was a strong probability of confusion arising; indeed, the leader of the Opposition went so far as to absolutely declare that confusion would arise. It has arisen. Of course it may seem hard that the blame should fall upon the Minister for Home Affairs, but upon whom else should it rest? When honorable members find that the same conditions which prevail in New South Wales obtain in the other States, we are afforded an excellent illustration of how much time may be wasted in doing nothing. The 150,000 electors who are at present disfranchised in New South Wales, as well as the 60,000 or 70,000 who occupy a similar position in Victoria, are entitled to lay the whole blame for the loss of their votes upon the Minister himself. At the same time the Government cannot escape from their responsibility in the matter if they allow the Minister for Home Affairs to continue to fill an office which he is incompetent to administer. By the same process of reasoning, Ministerial supporters, if they permit the present muddle to be continued, cannot evade their share of responsibility. In two months this confusion could be rectified. The whole of the Federal rolls could be compiled afresh. I understand that in New South Wales an expenditure of £1,000 will be necessary to bring the Commonwealth roll to a proper condition. Will the Minister take the necessary steps to achieve that object, or, if not, will the Prime Minister assume control of the matter? As far back as November last I was convinced that, upon some ground or other, the elections for this House would not take place in December next, if the Minister for Home Affairs could possibly help it. I did not know at that time what excuse could be urged against the adoption of that course, but I see now that his intention is to delay the collection of the rolls and thus to confuse the minds of the people. There is still ample opportunity to prepare the rolls in time for the elections, and if that is not done the Commonwealth will be plunged in an additional expense of £50,000 in May next, to cover the elections for this House. If we are prepared to permit that, can we wonder if there is a general outcry against the extravagant expenditure of this Parliament? Apparently, irrespective of the extravagance of the Government, honorable members are quite content to allow them to continue to mismanage affairs. I admit that the mismanagement is not intentional, but the fact remains that they are incapable of doing anything else. They are not to be blamed for their lack of mental ability. It is their misfortune that they were born without it.

Mr. PAGE.—Why does not the honorable and learned member put them out of office?

Mr. CONROY.—I have endeavoured to do so, and to make their enormities known to the people. Through the efforts of myself and other honorable members who have been fighting for sound government, I believe that the great body of the electors, when they have an opportunity, will prevent the return to Parliament of representatives who are willing to tolerate the continuance of the existing muddle.

Mr. KIRWAN (Kalgoorlie).—I am very glad that the honorable member for Macquarie has brought this matter under the attention of the House. It is high time that we expressed our disapproval of the delay which has occurred in making the necessary preparations for the forthcoming general election. I have in my hand a telegram from Western Australia which shows that, bad as may be the condition of electoral affairs in the eastern States, it is infinitely worse there, although I cannot submit figures—as the honorable member for Macquarie has done—to demonstrate the discrepancy that exists between the census returns and the electoral rolls. More than a week ago I received the following telegram from a member of this Parliament who is at present in Western Australia—

Cannot find any electoral officer for State. Has any appointment been made? No clerical staff has been appointed. Slow progress has been made in the preparation of list of names by the police and postal officials. It is estimated that Kalgoorlie list alone will take several months to complete. The State cannot be distributed into divisions till the lists are complete, and Parliament will not be able to consider the divisions before the elections, unless business is bustled. This will be a very serious position indeed.

That shows that the Department for Home Affairs has been even more lax in the performance of its duties, so far as Western Australia is concerned, than it has been in the other States.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member knows that that statement is not correct, because I have told him so myself. He has no right to repeat the misstatement here.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I wish to correct the Minister. He is making a very great mistake, because I have had absolutely no conversation with him upon this matter.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Nonsense; the honorable member's mind must be going.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I can assure him that it was not with me that he had a conversation. I am absolutely certain that he is mistaken. I have never spoken to him upon the matter. Had I done so, there would have been no occasion for me to make use of this telegram. I have been waiting for him to return from Tasmania in order that I might bring the matter forward. The Minister's accusation shows that it is his own mind which is becoming weak. But the chaotic conditions of which I complain are not confined to Western Australia. In New South Wales the difference between the census returns and the electoral rolls represents 90,000 names of electors, and in Victoria, 40,000. In those two States, therefore, there are 130,000 electors whose names are entitled to be placed upon the electoral rolls, but which do not appear there. I contend that any division of the electorates, either of Victoria or New South Wales, which is based upon such rolls, will not be a just one. There has been a blundering and neglect which is not creditable to the Department for Home Affairs, or its Ministerial head.

Under the circumstances, only one of three courses can be adopted to rectify that blundering. It has been suggested that the elections for the House of Representatives might be postponed until its members retired by effluxion of time. I am sure that if anything of that kind is done, it will be against the wishes of seven out of eight of the members of this House. It would be contrary to the best interests of the Commonwealth if the elections for the Senate and the House of Representatives did not take place simultaneously. The elections for the other Chamber must be held in December, and the people would be called upon to submit to unnecessary expense if those for the House of Representatives were not held at the same time. That suggestion, therefore, would not receive the support of a majority of honorable members of this House, and I am equally certain that it is opposed to the wishes of the great bulk of the people.

Mr. THOMSON.—A correct roll is also needed for the Senate.

Mr. KIRWAN.—That is so. The same objections which have been urged to the present rolls of electors for the House of Representatives are equally applicable to the rolls for the Senate. There is another proposal which has been made in some quarters, namely, that the elections might be conducted upon the divisions at present existing in the various States. If that course has to be adopted it will certainly be the fault of the Department for Home Affairs, and it will also be contrary to the desire of honorable members as expressed when the Act was passed.

Mr. THOMSON.—It will be contrary to law.

Mr. KIRWAN.—As the honorable member reminds me, it would be necessary to pass an amending Act before such a step would be in accordance with the law. There is only one other course which can be pursued, and that is to endeavour to have all the rolls ready in time to enable the elections for the two Houses of this Parliament to be held—as was originally intended—simultaneously. The elections for the other Chamber must take place prior to the 31st December. If the electorates are to be recast, the Department will have to make almost a superhuman effort to have the rolls ready in time for the elections. I notice that in the press this morning a time-table is published regarding the fixtures for the elections so far as Victoria is concerned. That table is very much behind the time when compared with the fixtures for the other States. If it were possible for all the divisions of the States to be completed by the 1st July there would be the greatest doubt whether all the necessary work could be accomplished before the elections should take place. The time-table to which I have referred reads—

July 1.—Division of States possibly completed.

July 31.—Plans will have been exhibited for 30 days in accordance with the Act.

August 4.—Plans laid before Parliament.

August 18.—Resolutions passed by both Houses approving of divisions in all the States.

August 21.—Proclamation of the polling places.

August 21 to September 21.—The assignment of electors to polling places, and the preparation and printing of the lists, containing about 1,750,000 names.

September 22.—Exhibition of the lists, and notice of the special courts of revision.

October 22.—The lists will have been exhibited for 30 days.

November 2 to November 12.—Special courts of revision.

Arrangements cannot be made in a shorter time, and if the writs for the elections are issued on 31st October it will mean that the rolls cannot be printed or made available for candidates or electors in sufficient time for the necessary arrangements to be made for the elections. Then, supposing that this Parliament objects to the division of any of the electorates, and sends back the report to the Commissioner for a redistribution, the new divisions cannot be fixed in time for the next election. Under the circumstances the Government are undoubtedly at fault for not having made the necessary preparations beforehand. The Electoral Act was assented to on the 10th October, or nearly eight months ago, and yet the Commissioners were not appointed, nor any effort made to prepare for the elections, until many months subsequently.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is another misstatement. I shall give the dates presently, and I think I shall make the honorable member rather ashamed of himself.

Mr. KIRWAN.—A start should have been made at the beginning of October, but nothing was done; and I shall be glad indeed if the Minister can show that what I am saying is not in accordance with fact. I am sure that none of us are desirous of making out a case against the Government unless their action justifies it. But the impression I have is that which any outsider might receive, and the Minister, if he has a good case, ought to be glad that the matter has been brought forward, and an opportunity afforded him to justify himself in the opinion of honorable members, and also in the opinion of the country. As already pointed out, there is a deficiency in two States alone of 130,000 names, and that is a matter an explanation of which is due from the Minister. The Minister would have been far better employed in administering his Department than in gallivanting around Tasmania, telling the people of that State how much he has been attending to the wants of the community. I wish it to be clearly understood that I am not in any way averse to Ministers delivering political speeches so long as the work of their Departments is attended to; that is their first duty, and political speeches might be left for their leisure. It is in the interests of the country that Ministers should travel about the Commonwealth, but it is not in the public interest that, in thus travelling about and delivering speeches, they should neglect their work.

Mr. HUGHES (West Sydney).—I notice that there are deficiencies in certain electorates which I know very well cannot be attributed to data of recent compilation. In Sydney there are certain districts with settled and fixed populations, which may become more dense each year; while there are other districts in which the population is becoming less, owing to the fact that dwellings are being razed to the ground for the purpose of erecting warehouses and other business premises. I see that the re-adjustment of the Federal electorates has been based on the old State rolls—manifestly an incomplete and imperfect basis; and in my opinion this House ought to insist on the rolls being compiled by the Federal, and not by the State authorities. I observe that, in the Glebe electorate in Sydney there was a voting strength of 3,280 in 1901, and that in the intervening period there has been a decrease of 361. I do not know how that result has been arrived at, but it must be within the personal knowledge of the Minister that a fluctuation of that sort is more likely to be accounted for by removals, and by the neglect of new arrivals to apply for electors' rights, which is not essential under Federal law, than in any other way. It is quite true, as the honorable member for Kalgoorlie said, that the Minister for Home Affairs has been making himself well acquainted with the requirements of this great continent; but the honorable gentleman ought to have left some competent authority to attend to the business in his absence. That, I am afraid, the Minister did not do. As I have already indicated, I am of opinion that the re-adjustments of the Federal electorates ought to be based on data furnished by the Federal authorities. The Minister appointed some presumably competent person to perform the necessary work, but it is quite clear that nothing was done by that person towards compiling the rolls on which the Commissioners were to be asked to complete their work. Under the circumstances the Minister should take a conciliatory attitude, and give the House some sort of assurance that that which has not been done should be done immediately. There is no reason for assuming that this motion for adjournment is hostile; and I am sure honorable members are very much indebted to the member for Macquarie for introducing the subject. I had no idea, and I feel sure other honorable members had no idea, but that the rolls were compiled by the Federal authorities. The female portion of the electors are indebted entirely to the States authorities, although they received the franchise for reasons unconnected with the States, and may vote on considerations different from State considerations. I should like to hear what the Minister has to say to account for the extraordinary lassitude in this particular Department—a lassitude which is only partly explained by the criticism levelled against the head of the Department by the leader of the Opposition, who described that gentleman as utterly incompetent. Whether that is sufficient to explain the lassitude of the Department I do not know, but I can never consent to allow the whole of the blame to rest on the departmental officers. The Minister in charge of the Department must shoulder the responsibility if he chooses to employ incompetent persons.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I am not in a position to know the cause, but I think the Minister will admit that matters are in a very unsatisfactory condition, in view of the action taken for mapping out the States into new electorates. I do not know that the difficulty could be altogether avoided by the Department. In New South Wales, on account of the severe drought during the past twelve months, large numbers of electors have been driven away from their usual places of residence. People engaged in agriculture, grazing, and mining pursuits have been compelled to leave the western parts of the State and go towards the east; and I am reminded by the honorable member for Bland, who, like myself, represents a western district, that in a great many cases, although the male population remained, the female population were sent into the towns and cities. In a number of the western centres those entitled to the franchise were temporarily absent when the names were being collected, and in some cases their names were on that ground refused by the police. It is very doubtful whether the names of these people were collected in the districts where they happened to be temporarily resident, and I know of cases where, under the latter circumstances, the names were refused on the ground that the residential conditions had not been fulfilled. These facts account very largely for the big difference which has been discovered between the census returns and the rolls, and seem to indicate the possibility of a very big injustice to country districts under the proposed redistribution. So far as New South Wales is concerned, the political weight in this House has shifted from the country to the city in the case of one representative; in other words, the country has one representative less, and the city one representative more, as compared with the present arrangement. In view of the abnormal conditions, and of the unsatisfactory state of the rolls, the present attempt to carry out the divisions of the State is simply farcical. The whole question of allocating the electors should be considered before a decision is finally arrived at. Those electors whom the Department believe to be in the State, but who cannot be discovered, should be found, or some attempt made to find them before the final decision. The machinery employed by the States in this work up to the present time has been very imperfect. A considerable number of electors who are qualified under the Federal law are disqualified under the State law, and no account is taken of these. Then so far as my inquiries go, no complete list of the female voters in the State of New South Wales has yet been compiled. The only list which the Federal Electoral Department has, or which is in any way available to the public, is one on which appear the names of those females who themselves applied for electors' rights.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member should know that that statement is absolutely wrong. I thought he had sense enough to know better.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—The police collected the names.

Mr. BROWN.—I am aware that the police collected the names, but I am not aware that rolls containing the additional names have been issued, and there is no certainty as to when they will be issued. My contention is that until very recently the only names of females appearing on the rolls were the names of those who applied personally for elector's rights to the different electoral registrars of the States, and not the names which were handed to the police.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not correct. The police canvassed the whole State.

Mr. BROWN.—I have recently made a tour through my electorate, and when there I was asked by female electors how they could ascertain if their names had been collected by the police, and were on the Federal rolls. I could not give them any information on the subject, but if the Minister can do so, he will be conferring a great benefit upon them. Of course, I was able to inform them that the Minister had intimated that, if they wrote to the Electoral Officer for the State, their cases would be inquired into; but unless some other method is adopted, the Electoral Officers will require large additions to their staffs to enable them to deal with the correspondence which will come to them. The whole matter is in a very unsatisfactory position. The Minister should devise some scheme which will enable electors to know definitely if their names are upon the rolls, and to take steps, if they have not been enrolled, to get their names placed on the rolls. If the States are divided in accordance with the States rolls the division will be of very little use. What is necessary is that the Federal rolls shall be brought up to date, and that then they shall be open for the inspection of the public. Then, when they have been finally revised, the States should be divided. But if the redivision of the States takes place before the Federal rolls are complete, it will be simply farcical, because the work will all have to be done over again. I do not approach this matter in a spirit of hostility to the Department, but I desire that there shall be no delay in the completion of the rolls. If the present anomalies are not removed, the probabilities are that a very large number of the electors of New South Wales will be disfranchised when the Senate elections are held at the end of this year, and if the Government see fit to send the members of this Chamber to the country at the same time, the injustice will be intensified. Therefore it is necessary that consideration should be given to this matter at once, especially as not only is the State of New South Wales affected, but also the States of Victoria and Western Australia, and probably the other States of the Commonwealth, too.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—So far as the electoral rolls in Queensland are concerned, every one is perfectly satisfied with them.

Mr. McDONALD.—No.

Mr. PAGE.—Well, I speak for those of my own electorate, which covers more than half of Queensland. Some honorable members have electorates which might almost be effaced with a postage stamp, but it would take more than a blanket to cover mine. The police have had the greatest difficulty in collecting the Queensland rolls, but the consensus of opinion in my electorate is that the work has been well done. Those whose names have not been collected have in many cases gone to the nearest police station, and had them put on the rolls, and in this way thousands of names have been added since the first collection. Those are mostly the names of the nomadic population, which is very numerous in the western portion of the State—names which the police cannot very easily obtain, because it is impossible for them to visit every water-hole and billabong in the State. But if in New South Wales there has been no systematic enrolment of electors, the dereliction of duty by the officers of the Department is very serious. I know that a house in the middle of Grafton, in New South Wales, was unvisited by the police. If that can happen in Grafton, I do not know what might not take place in the western parts of the State. It is not to be wondered at that 42,000 names have been left off the roll. No one has called at the house where I am staying in Melbourne to collect the names of the inmates, and I have advised them to write to the Chief Electoral Officer. But, as the honorable member for Canobolas has pointed out, if it is left to the individual electors to get themselves enrolled, a great many will be disfranchised. The intention of Parliament was that every man and woman in the Commonwealth, of the full age of 21 years, should be able to vote at the Federal elections, and I am at a loss to understand why there should be such a discrepancy between the number of such persons in New South Wales and the number of names on the Federal rolls for that State. I know that the Minister is fully alive to the facts, because, in conversation, he told me that he could not account for them.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—He has not taken any satisfactory step to prevent the disfranchisement of electors.

Mr. PAGE.—Perhaps he will justify himself later on. There was a very amusing paragraph in the Age this morning, in which it was stated that a policeman had forgotten to hand in 1,000 names which he had collected. I have heard of men in New South Wales holding 500 electors' rights, but this policeman was even a better politician, and could keep twice as many names up his sleeve. The fact of the matter is that, as everything is new, it is difficult to make the arrangements work smoothly, though I believe that everything will be right when the proper time comes. There is one question, however, which I should like to ask the Minister. According to statements which appeared in the Queensland press during the recess, no adequate provision has been made for the printing of the Queensland rolls. As Queensland covers a vast territory, it will take some time for the rolls to circulate through the different electorates. Therefore the sooner they are sent out the better. But it is said that the authorities do not know how to get them printed—whether they should purchase linotypes, or buy more type. If proper arrangements are not made quickly, however, the rolls may not be available when the elections occur, and we shall then be in a worse position than in the first instance. In Queensland they hold revision courts in November, to purge the rolls, and they do it with a vengeance. One court struck off 400 names at a sitting. They do not ask whether the electors are still qualified; they simply strike their pens through the names, and often men are unable to get themselves re-enrolled before the next election. But if the States rolls are used for the Federal elections, some of us will have great difficulty in getting back. I know that it will be almost impossible for me to do so. I should like the Minister for Home Affairs, therefore, to inform us what provision has been made for the printing of the Queensland rolls, and if everything is in readiness for their publication at the earliest moment?

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I think we are obliged to the honorable member for Macquarie for bringing this matter forward, because, although the Department has had difficulties to contend with which were almost inevitable, I do not think sufficient expedition has been exercised in the collection of the rolls, and in the adjustment of the electorates. It seems to me that, as things are going, the rolls will not be ready at the time of the Senate elections, and, of course, would not be available if the elections to this House occurred at the same time, as I think they should.

Mr. McCAY.—More than "should"; they must.

Mr. WATSON.—In my opinion, the manner in which the Department is allowing matters to drift is likely to result in our having either to fall back on the old rolls, or to postpone the dissolution of this House for a longer time than is necessary. The report of the New South Wales Commissioner will not be available for presentation to this House for some weeks to come, and in some of the States even a longer period will elapse. I do not know whether we shall have any opportunity of criticising the reports or referring them back to the Commissioners for further consideration. If we have an opportunity for criticism we must consider the time that will be available to the Commissioners for going through the various divisions once more, and allow for a month after they have completed their labours to give time for the lodging of objections. That is an aspect of the matter which shows the necessity for hurrying the work on, because, once the divisions are settled, the rolls will have to be made up for the different districts from the lists now sent in. That will take some time. Then the rolls must be exhibited for a certain period to enable persons to see them before the Revision Court sits. That will mean another month's delay, and after the revision has taken place the rolls will have to be corrected again in order to make them complete, in view of the decisions given by the courts. Even if we accept without question the decisions of the Commissioners the complete rolls cannot be issued before at least the end of October. On the other hand, if the House refers any of the reports back to the Commissioners for further consideration, or if the Senate exercises its right to take a similar course, another five or six weeks' delay will be involved. This being so, it seems to me that the Minister and the officers of his Department have something to explain. I know that the Minister has shown a desire to push matters on, but his efforts have not been fully seconded by his officers, if one may judge by results. I think that it is time some change was made in the direction of affairs if we are to have the rolls prepared in time for the next general election. I believe this can be done even now, if the work is taken in hand vigorously, and pushed on with all possible speed.

Mr. A. C. GROOM (Flinders).—If the statements appearing in the press are to be believed—

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Surely the honorable member does not believe the statements in the newspapers? The statement which appears in the Argus to-day is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. A. C. GROOM.—I do not know anything about the statement to which the honorable gentleman specially refers, but if there is any truth in the statements which have appeared in the press from time to time as to the large discrepancies which have occurred in Victoria and New South Wales—the Age places them at 150,000—I think honorable members will admit that the matter is very serious. Even if the discrepancy amounts to only half the number stated, I think it was a mistake for the Minister to allow the maps showing the boundaries of the new electoral divisions to be issued.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They are not issued to the public.

Mr. A. C. GROOM.—They have been issued to honorable members, and I took it for granted that they had also been issued to the public.

Mr. McCAY.—They are being exhibited in all the post-offices.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Commissioners can do what they like with the maps, and they are compelled by law to issue them in the way they have done.

Mr. A. C. GROOM.—A statement has appeared in the press with regard to 1,000 missing electors, and I understand that these belong to me. They will belong to the honorable member for Gippsland, if the new boundaries recommended by the Commissioner are adopted; but, until the new subdivision is confirmed, they belong to me. If the mistake to which I refer had not been made there would have been no necessity to alter the boundary of the Flinders division, and to bring it within a mile of the town of Brighton in order to include a number of suburban residents, and thus make up the number of electors required for the constituency. In this one instance, a serious mistake has occurred in my constituency, and no doubt the same could be said regarding others; and, if there is anything like such a large discrepancy as reported in the press, a very searching inquiry should be made. It has been stated that the police have made a house-to-house visitation in the whole of the electorates in order to enrol electors; but they did not come to my house, and I do not believe they have ever been near the place. One honorable member told me that a short time ago the police visited his house, when he was absent, to obtain information with regard to the roll. The policeman interviewed the housemaid and got information which satisfied him. We know what takes place on such occasions, and, as a matter of fact, in this case the information given was entirely wrong. If that was the general plan adopted to obtain information for the compilation of the rolls, we can quite understand how the discrepancy occurred. I hope the Minister will have the maps withdrawn and new ones issued when the rolls are complete.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—The object of passing the Electoral Act last session was to afford the Government plenty of time to make the necessary preparations for the forthcoming elections. So far as Queensland is concerned, I must admit that the roll compiled for the purposes of the next Federal election is very much larger than the old State roll, but still a number of names have been omitted. I do not intend to find much fault with this, because I can quite realize the difficulty of collecting names in outlying places, especially when it is remembered that the drought has probably driven some of the country residents into quarters where even the police would not be able to find them. During the last two or three weeks I have received communications from several persons who complain that their names are not on the roll. They do not blame any one for the omission, but they want to know how they can repair it, and it is difficult to obtain information. I communicated with the Electoral Department, and was told to write to the police, or to send direct to the Federal Electoral Registrar in Brisbane. I have adopted the latter course, but whether this will bring about any result I do not know. My principal complaint is that, although the Electoral Act was passed early in October, 1902, it was not until nearly the end of February last that the Electoral Department started to compile the rolls in Queensland. I understand that some difficulty occurred between the Federal authorities and the Queensland Government as to the mode to be followed in collecting the names. The Queensland Government desired that the State electoral registrars should collect the names, but the Federal Government insisted, and properly so, that the police should collect them. I want to know how it was that such a long time was allowed to elapse before negotiations were entered into? Several months were allowed to pass without any steps being taken; but if the Minister and those under him had been alive to the position they would have taken steps immediately after the passing of the Act to arrange for the compilation of the rolls. Then we could have had the lists printed, and the final reports of the Commissioners might have been presented to the House at the opening of this session. To all appearances, however, it is not likely that we shall receive the report of the Commissioner for Queensland for another two or three weeks. It will be another week or eight days before the maps can be printed. These will have to be sent to the various centres of population for exhibition, so that objections may be lodged, and three weeks must pass from the time the maps are sent out before they can reach such distant places as Camooweal, Burketown, or Windora. What possible chance can residents in such places have of registering any objections they may take to the boundaries defined by the Commissioners? A good deal of blame must be attached to the Department for having allowed a state of confusion to be brought about. It has been stated—I do not say that the report is true—that the Government do not want the election for the House of Representatives to be held in December. If the elections do not come off then, the country ought to rise up in arms against the Government. I am as sympathetic as most honorable members towards the Government, but I would not screen them if they brought about such a state of confusion that the elections could not take place at the most convenient and desirable time. If the Government do not want the elections to come off in December, why do they not get up and say so?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Because it is not a fact.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is very unfair to make such an assertion.

Mr. McDONALD.—I am not making any assertion. Several questions have been asked as to the intentions of the Government, but up to the present we have not been able to obtain any satisfactory reply. If the statement which I have repeated is wrong, the Minister for Home Affairs will have an opportunity of telling us so this afternoon. From present appearances it would almost seem that there is no possible hope of holding the elections for the House of Representatives in December, and, personally, I very much regret it.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—There is no doubt that the compilation of the first Federal rolls has been carried on under exceptional difficulties. In the face of the desire which has been expressed for economy, the Minister has not cared to spend more money than absolutely necessary, and has tried to make use of the States officers. Although the police officers do their work very well, taking it all round, our previous experience in connexion with the compilation of rolls is that they miss a considerable number of names, and it now becomes the duty of the Electoral Department to afford to those whose names have been missed every opportunity to become enrolled. In New South Wales the roll was collected in July, when the condition of the country generally was abnormal. In my electorate a number of large mines were closed down, and in one case alone 300 men were thrown idle, and had to move to other parts in search of work. I understand that in some cases the police refused to enrol men who had no place of residence. This was owing to the difference between the Federal and the State laws with regard to the registration of voters, and no doubt from this cause alone a large number of men had their names omitted from the rolls. Then a large number of persons were omitted because of their removal from one part of the State to another. It seems to me unfortunate that any Commissioner should be asked to settle the boundaries of the new electorates under the peculiar circumstances in which we find ourselves. When on a recent visit to my electorate a number of residents inquired of me how they could insure getting their names placed upon the Federal roll. I advised them to go to the nearest post-office and ascertain if their names did not already appear there, adding that, if they did not, under the Federal electoral system it was very easy indeed for an elector to get his name upon the roll, and very hard for him to have it removed, whereas the reverse was applicable to the case of the State roll. In New South Wales we have put a stop to the practice which was referred to by the honorable member for Maranoa, so far as elections for this Parliament are concerned. When the Electoral Act was under consideration, I understood that postmasters were to be created electoral registrars. That appeared to me to be a very wise step to take, seeing that postmasters are Federal officers. In my innocence, therefore, I told the electors to interview the postmasters or the electoral officers. Subsequently, however, I was informed that they had acted upon my advice, but could gain no information whatever. Upon my return to Melbourne I at once acquainted the Minister for Home Affairs with the facts, and I understand that he immediately took steps to ascertain what was the real position. At the same time, I think that the officers of his Department have been slow to grip the situation, although I am free to admit that the difficulties which they had to face on the present occasion rendered their work unusually hard, and necessitated the exercise of greater push and energy. I differ from the honorable member for Macquarie when he says that the majority of those who have been disfranchised are to be found in the metropolitan districts. I think that they are to be found in the provincial districts, for the reason that persons belonging to the back country have been taken off the State roll on account of temporary absence from their districts. I could mention instances in which it is quite evident that the police never visited certain homes to ascertain whether the names of the female inmates were upon the roll. I suggest that the present difficulty could be met, to a large extent, by making use of the services of the police and postmasters. In the country districts the police are acquainted with almost everybody resident there, and if they were asked to search the State rolls to ascertain whether any names which should appear there have been omitted, and if so, to see that the fault was remedied, I think the discrepancy which now exists between the census returns and the Federal rolls would be considerably diminished. The Minister for Home Affairs, I admit, has already taken some steps to overcome the difficulty by advertising, but I would point out that there are many people who do not see the newspapers, and who therefore are particularly liable to be disfranchised. I think that if we made use of the services of the police officers it would be possible, within the limited time still available, to have the rolls ready for the senatorial elections. At the same time, if the elections for this House are to take place simultaneously with those for the Senate—and I have already expressed myself in favour of the adoption of that course—it will be utterly impossible to decide upon a fair division in connexion with the new electorates unless extreme activity is displayed in the preparation of what is practically a new roll. The failure of the Department has been largely due to its dependence upon the State rolls, although I think that, when the Electoral Bill was under consideration, most honorable members favoured the idea of making use of the services of the police. I know of one instance in which a voter obtained his elector's right as far back as the 5th June of last year, and yet his name does not appear upon the Federal roll. I can offer no explanation for this, but we all know that hundreds of similar cases occur in connexion with the preparation of the State rolls—cases which are not remedied before the Revision Courts hold their sittings. I think that if the officers charged with the work of compiling our rolls displayed a little more activity, it would be quite possible to have them ready in time for the elections in December.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—It appears to me that our object in passing the Electoral Act last session was to place every adult in the Commonwealth in a position to record his or her vote at Federal elections. If the motion submitted this afternoon by the honorable member for Macquarie achieves that result this discussion will not have been in vain. If I followed correctly the figures quoted by that honorable member, it is evident that the last speaker has been misinformed. According to the honorable member for Macquarie, 65 or 70 per cent. of the electors who are at present disfranchised belong to the metropolitan districts.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is a mistake. The officer at Sydney wrote last night informing me that a number of applications for enrolment were coming in from the country.

Mr. FULLER.—I shall be very glad if the Minister has any information to put before the House in connexion with this matter. Some exception has been taken to the collection of the Federal rolls by State officers.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—How could the work have been done otherwise?

Mr. FULLER.—To my mind, it does not matter a twopenny-tram ticket whether the rolls are collected by State officers or not, provided that they are correct. We know, however, that in New South Wales the franchise for the return of members to the State Legislature is so different from the liberal franchise for the Commonwealth elections, that unless special instructions were given to the officers charged with compiling the rolls there, they would naturally fall into error. I understand that no such instructions were given, and the result is that a very great discrepancy exists between the census returns and the Federal rolls. I was really surprised to hear that the female electors had been so overlooked by the Department for Home Affairs. Honorable members have been informed that the female roll has not been revised, much less printed.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable and learned member is basing his argument upon an assumption which is not correct.

Mr. FULLER.—I am glad to have that assurance from the Minister. I had not previously understood that the statement of the honorable member for Macquarie was inaccurate.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What statement?

Mr. FULLER.—The statement that the female roll has not been printed, much less revised.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It has been revised.

Mr. FULLER.—After the women of New South Wales having given credit to the Minister for Home Affairs for granting them the franchise, and after the nice little presentations which they have made him from time to time in the shape of slippers and dressing gowns, it comes as a surprise to me that he has not treated them better. I trust that he will see that they are placed in such a position that they are able to exercise the franchise at the forthcoming elections.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK (Gwydir).—In dealing with the new electoral divisions which it is proposed to create, I hope that the Minister for Home Affairs will give the residents of outlying districts an opportunity of knowing what position they really occupy. I have recently been in the north-west of my State, where the people, in the absence of maps, do not exactly know in which electorate they are. The electorate of Gwydir is connected with the railway system, and the natural course of trade is with the towns along the North-Western Railway line, but some of the important centres of population in the district have been taken from my electorate and included in that of Broken Hill, a place with which they have no connexion whatever. The people in the Gwydir electorate desire to see maps.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would call the attention of the honorable member to the fact that the question before the House is the "delay in the preparation of and incompleteness of the Federal Electoral rolls."

Mr. CRUICKSHANK.—Unfortunately I was not here when the motion was submitted, and I understood that it permitted a general discussion of the subject. The placing of the names on the rolls in the outlying districts is of great importance, but I find that a number in my district are omitted. Now that we have the adult franchise it is necessary to have country districts very closely canvassed, or otherwise a great preponderance will be given to the city electorates. In the latter, those who have to collect the names have merely to walk from house to house, and there are certain hours when the complete household may be found at home. In the country districts, however, the collectors have to call at the stations, and possibly be content with a list of the employes and other persons about the place, many of whom are probably there to-day and gone to-morrow. In the country, at election times, great difficulty is caused by the fact that many of the settlers find that they are not on the rolls, and I ask the Minister to give instructions that the police be required make as complete a list as possible.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister for Home Affairs).—In some instances a great deal of feeling has been imported into the discussion. I do not object in the slightest degree to the motion submitted by the honorable member for Macquarie; indeed, I am rather indebted to him for it, because it affords me an opportunity of justifying everything that has been done by my Department, and of clearly proving that there has not been that neglect and delay which some honorable members attribute to my officers. The Electoral Act was assented to on the 10th October last, and immediately afterwards preliminary steps were taken with a view to ascertain the conditions under which the co-operation of the States officials would be available in the collection of the lists. When the Electoral Act was before this House, as will be admitted by honorable members, a great desire was shown for economy; and, therefore, in the compiling of the lists, my object was, as far as possible, to keep down expenditure. It did not seem to me possible, in a reasonable and complete manner, to collect these lists without the aid of the States. Apparently the proper course was to endeavour to get their assistance through the police. The only other course I could have taken was to appoint special collectors throughout the various States, and pay them large sums of money for the work done. I might, of course, have obtained the assistance of the various post-office officials; and, indeed, in some of the northern parts of Western Australia that was done. On the 17th November a circular letter was issued to each of the States, with the exception of New South Wales, asking officially for the services of the States officers in collecting the names of electors. To that circular letter replies were received from Victoria on the 22nd November, from Queensland on the 26th November, from Western Australia on the 1st December, and from Tasmania on the 6th December. An interim reply was received from South Australia on the 6th December, the question being raised in that State as to which was the best course to adopt. The authorities in South Australia were prepared to take their rolls as completed at the last revision, but I did not agree to that, and after correspondence, an arrangement was made under which the plan suggested by the South Australian authorities was carried out in the northern parts of that State, but in the settled parts in the south, the aid of the police was called in. Immediately on receipt of consent from the States to the members of the police force collecting the names, it was arranged that the necessary books and printed instructions should be issued. I arranged that the Federal Government should pay to each foot policeman, and each mounted policeman, so much for the day or week he was employed in the collection of the names. The books and instructions were issued to Victoria at dates from December, 1902, to January, 1903; to Western Australia in January, 1903; to Tasmania in January, 1903. The preparation of these book-lists, as they were called, took up a great deal of time, considerable difficulty being experienced in getting the printing done with reasonable celerity. I ask honorable members if there was any delay up to this stage?

Mr. KIRWAN.—That was two months after the passing of the Act.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Act was approved on the 10th October, and communications were sent to the various States on the 17th November.

Mr. KIRWAN.—Six weeks later.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No, five weeks later, and in the meantime considerable work had to be done in devising the scheme under which we were to work. I think the honorable member for Kalgoorlie is unfair and unreasonable in saying that there was any delay up to this stage.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Unless, of course, the Minister was expected to do the work himself.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If I had gone to expense in engaging special collectors throughout the States, I should have been attacked now for not employing the States officials. A specimen book was forwarded to the Queensland Government on the 31st January, the delay in this case arising from a little difficulty between the Electoral Department here and the Electoral Department in that State, where the desire was to have lists differently worded. A similar difficulty arose in one or two of the other States, but a little longer time was occupied in the case of Queensland, in arranging definite terms, than in other cases. The lists were then collected by the police, by whom the work was completed in Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia in May, and in Tasmania in June. The completion of the work in Western Australia is promised by the end of this month. When once the books had left my hands I had no control over the action of the police, but I repeatedly corresponded with the Premiers of the various States, and, through my officers, with the police authorities. I was in Western Australia in February, when I ascertained that difficulty had arisen because the police did not desire to do the work. I thought I had arranged matters satisfactorily, but when I returned to the east I found it necessary to send an officer to Western Australia. It was not, however, until after a great deal of trouble that the arrangement was made for the police to collect the names in that State. Had it not been for the action taken by Mr. James, the Premier of Western Australia, when my officer arrived there, I should not have been able to have the rolls compiled by the police in that State; but I understand that since then the work has gone on satisfactorily. Honorable members must not blame the Department, or the gentleman who has been attacked, though not by name, in one or two instances to-day, particularly by the honorable member for Macquarie. That officer, Mr. Lewis, has done the work as well as it could be done by any officer. He may not be everything that everybody desires, but I must give him every credit for working hard, early and late, in overcoming the difficulties and differences which arose in the States. First I had to send Mr. Lewis to Queensland, and afterwards to Western Australia and to Tasmania, though the last-mentioned visit was due to a misunderstanding. Mr. Lewis has done the work in a manner that reflects the greatest credit on himself, and before I resume my seat, I shall refer further to his character and his ability for conducting business of this kind. It is most unfair to attack an officer who is doing his best.

Mr. WARSON.—His best does not seem to be very good.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have had, perhaps, as much experience as any honorable member or Minister in dealing with public officers.

Mr. PAGE.—Mr. Lewis did his work well in Queensland, at any rate.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Mr. Lewis has done his work in the face of great difficulties in every State. It must not be supposed that the Federal Government had simply to say that a thing should be done in order to have it done. We had to make interim arrangements with the States, and in some cases antagonism was shown. What I have said describes the position of matters up to the present time. The honorable member for Macquarie said that he could not find a Commissioner, Electoral Registrars, or other Electoral Officers in any of the States. The Commissioners are appointed, and are doing their work; but I have not yet appointed all the officers who will be appointed, because the time has not come when they are required, and thus I am saving money all the time.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But a large number of people in New South Wales are prevented from getting on the roll.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The officers mentioned could have nothing to do with the collection of the rolls, and there would have been no difference had they been appointed seven or eight months ago, except that salaries would have been paid where no necessity existed. Surely I could expect that, with the assistance of the police, the rolls would be as well collected as by the State authorities on other occasions?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What did the Minister do in New South Wales?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In New South Wales, the Revision Court, so far as the male voters were concerned, had just completed its work, and I should like to know whether I was not justified in accepting that revision, and thus saving double expense?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; the Minister was not.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member for Macquarie has laid great stress on the fact that twelve months' residence is required in the State, as against six months in the Commonwealth, to qualify for a vote. But I would point out that the total number of residents of under one year in the State of New South Wales is estimated at only 8,800. If the difference pointed out by the honorable member had any effect, it would not, under these circumstances, be so serious as represented. We must remember that, between the publication of the maps and the final forwarding of them to the Federal Government, there will be an opportunity given of rectifying any omissions. As soon as the matter has been dealt with by Parliament another revision court must be held; and, therefore, if a few names have been left off, they may very easily be placed on the roll. There are two periods of a month each in which electors will have an opportunity of getting their names on the roll.

Mr. WATSON.—During the first period there will be no officer other than the Electoral Officer for the State, of whose existence very few people are aware, to apply to.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have appointed an officer in New South Wales, whose office is in Sydney, and I have extensively published the fact that all information on the subject is obtainable from him. The discrepancy to which reference has been made is between the number of adults residing in the State according to the last census returns and the number of names appearing on the lists. Now, the collection of names was finished in October last, only about twelve months after the census returns were compiled.

Mr. SPENCE.—The names were collected in July.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In July and September; but the final revision was made in October. Therefore the discrepancy should have been smaller than it would be now. In connexion with the collection of the female rolls, I agreed with the Government of New South Wales to pay a portion of the cost, because it was more economical for us to pay part instead of the whole cost, since the New South Wales rolls are practically the same as the Federal rolls. Those rolls have now been collected, and most of them have been printed. But when I discovered the discrepancy which has been referred to, I at once arranged with the Premier of New South Wales and the Government Printer of that State to have all the rolls printed. I am getting the work done at a most reasonable cost, and the rolls have now nearly all been sent to the various post-offices in the State. An advertisement has also been published in the newspapers of each district stating why the rolls are being circulated, and asking the electors to look through them, and, if they find that their names have been omitted, to make application to the Chief Electoral Officer in Sydney.

Mr. WILKS.—Would it not have been wiser to do that earlier?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I could not do it until I knew of the discrepancy.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The time allotted to the honorable member under the standing order has now expired.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I hope with the indulgence of the House to finish my remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of honorable members that the Minister for Home Affairs have leave to finish his speech?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN.—Will the rolls which have been sent out contain the female names collected by the police?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; they will contain every name that has been collected.

Mr. WATSON.—How are they divided—according to the proposed divisions or according to the existing divisions?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Only the roll for the district is sent to that district, and I believe that the rolls are divided in accordance with the State electoral divisions, the names on them being arranged in alphabetical order. The honorable member's question brings me to a matter which has caused a great deal of difficulty. The Act says that in the final arrangement of the rolls, each roll must show the polling places at which the electors must vote.

Mr. WATSON.—There must be a separate roll for each polling place.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes. It is a very inconvenient arrangement, because it will necessitate the printing of twenty or thirty very small rolls; but it is my duty to conform to the provisions of the law. The rolls, however, cannot be arranged in the manner I speak of until I know what the divisions will be, and what arrangement will be made in regard to polling places. Not only have I sent the rolls to every post-office in New South Wales, but I have asked the Postmaster-General to instruct his officials to pay particular attention to the matter, and to give every facility to persons who wish to inspect the rolls or to make application for enrolment where their names have been omitted.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—On what date was that done?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—About a fortnight ago.

Mr. BROWN.—When does the Minister expect to be able to make up the new rolls which will include the names which have been sent in to the Chief Electoral Officer?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I hope, because of the active measures which have been taken, to be able to place the Commissioner for New South Wales in possession of all the names so sent in before he finally forwards his proposed divisions to the House, which will probably be done during the first week of next month, because the addition of a large number of new names to the rolls may have the effect of causing him to alter his divisions to some extent. All I can do, however, is to try to induce the public to take sufficient interest in the matter to get rid of the present discrepancies, and not allow themselves to be disfranchised. Honorable members who accuse the Department, and myself in particular, of not taking active measures to do what is necessary, have not understood what has been done. When the matter has been dealt with by the House, every opportunity will be given to persons whose names still do not appear on the rolls to be enrolled, because a revision court will be held after an interval of a month. I do not know what people want more than that. In Tasmania the rolls have been completed.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—When will the maps showing the Tasmanian divisions be ready?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Commissioner for Tasmania had the quota telegraphed to him yesterday, with instructions to commence the work of dividing that State at once. He is engaged upon that work now, and we hope to have his report either at the end of this week or next week. The South Australian divisions have been completed.

Mr. MAHON.—What about Western Australia?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The returns were promised in May, but the advice we have since received from that State is that we may expect them any day. I cannot prevent the State officers from taking a little longer to do the work than was originally promised. Honorable members must be reasonable, and acknowledge that I cannot do more than urge the State authorities to see that as little delay as possible occurs. I hope to know within a week at furthest what is proposed in regard to Western Australia. Therefore, things stand in this position at present. The Queensland division has been made, and we have received the maps from that State. The same remarks apply to New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. We hope to receive the Tasmanian report within a week, and we shall have the Western Australian report within a few days. Honorable members have said that it will be almost impossible to have the rolls ready by December next. Not only will the rolls be ready then, but, even if the House returns to the Commissioners both the New South Wales and the Victorian divisions for alteration, we shall still have time to get the rolls ready by December.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable gentleman will be very lucky if he does.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The whole thing has been arranged, and I am prepared for the contingency. Every opportunity will be given to both Houses to deal with this matter without being rushed. The insinuation that the Government have had in their minds the desire to prevent the holding of the elections for this House simultaneously with those for the Senate is one which it should be beneath any honorable member to make. I deny the truth of such a statement. I have now pointed out the difficulties with which I have had to contend. Perhaps honorable members will be surprised when I tell them that altogether about 4,500,000 documents will have been printed and circulated before the elections can take place. I mention that fact to show how gigantic the work is.

Mr. WILKS.—And yet some people say that the honorable gentleman's Department has nothing to do.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—My Department is very much undermanned.

Mr. MAUGER.—And very much overworked.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes. Unless I had really earnest men to deal with this matter I should be in a difficulty.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable gentleman should engage more men. He ought not to sweat his officers as he is doing.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — I am glad the honorable member for Macquarie has brought the matter forward, because his motion has afforded me an opportunity to show that the statements which have been referred to have been made under a misconception. Although the honorable member for Kalgoorlie has evidently forgotten the occurrence, I am certain that he spoke to me in one of the lobbies about a fortnight or three weeks ago on the matter he mentioned.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I am certain that I never had a conversation with the honorable gentleman on the subject. He cannot mention the date of the conversation, the place where it occurred, or anything about it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I can mention the place, though I cannot mention the date. Of course, the honorable member would not knowingly make a misstatement, and I am sure that he will accept what has been said in regard to the matter. The trouble which has been referred to as existing in Western Australia does not exist there.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I read from a telegram which I had received from a member of the Federal Parliament, who is now in Western Australia.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I know that that is so, but I may mention that I was told the other day at Menzies' hotel, where I stay, that no one had taken the names of the persons living there. When I made an inquiry on the subject, I found that my officers had collected every name. I have investigated three or four complaints of the same kind, and in each instance I found that the names had been collected. People often found statements upon surmises which are not true. The acting head of the Electoral Department has been attacked to-day, and I feel that he has been unfairly dealt with. He was connected with the Electoral office of New South Wales from the year 1887. He was specially appointed by the late Sir Henry Parkes, and his salary was advanced to £600 a year.

Mr. WATSON.—And he was specially removed by the Public Service Board.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — He was intrusted by the leader of the Opposition, not very long before the right honorable gentleman went out of office in New South Wales, to prepare, in conjunction with Mr. Kelynack, a Local Government Bill, and I believe he did his work well.

Mr. WATSON.—He did not do his work in the Electoral office well.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am inclined to think that he did. I think that in fairness to the gentleman in question I should read the following statement to the House :—

Mr. Lewis was engaged for 25 years in the Survey Department of New South Wales, during the latter part of which he had charge of the Reserves Branch, having the administration of some 40,000,000 acres of Crown lands.

On the 30th June, 1887, when in receipt of a salary of £490 per annum, he was retired from this position owing to the abolition of the office consequent on the reorganization of the Department, and the introduction of the scheme of decentralization. Prior to this retirement, Mr. Lewis (together with the Surveyor-General, the Deputy Surveyor-General, the Chief Draftsman, and many other senior officers similarly situated) was granted three months' leave of absence, and was paid by the Government the unpaid superannuation deductions, in consideration of meritorious service. On the day that the three months' leave should have commenced, the late Sir Henry Parkes sent for Mr. Lewis and appointed him as Local Government Officer with electoral reform at an advanced salary of £600 per annum. More recently this position was continued by Sir George Dibbs, and, as Commissioner for the subdivision of the State of New South Wales into districts under the new (State) Act for electoral purposes, Mr. Lewis was entirely responsible for the organization of the new system which came into operation in July, 1894. This service extended over a period of nine years, and it was not until the year 1896 that Mr. Lewis retired from the public service of New South Wales. (Seven years ago, not twenty years, as stated by Mr. Reid.)

Mr. WATSON.—He was asked by the Public Service Board to retire.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That does not appear, and I think the New South Wales Public Service lost a good officer in Mr. Lewis.

Mr. WATSON.—I think that they saved money by getting rid of him.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think so. The statement proceeds—

Mr. Lewis also held a commission (from the Right Honorable George Reid) for the subdivision of the State of New South Wales into shires, boroughs, and district Government districts, under Mr. Reid's proposed legislation. In conjunction with Mr. Kelynack, he prepared a Local Government Bill under instructions from Mr. Reid. Mr. Lewis was appointed in January, 1900, as one of a Commission of three to divide the State of New South Wales into Commonwealth divisions for Federal purposes. In 1901, the gentleman referred to was appointed as one of a Commission of Experts to formulate a scheme, or electoral system, to embrace the entire Commonwealth.

I may mention that instead of Mr. Lewis getting a high salary, such as has been stated, he receives only £300 per annum, in addition to the pension to which he is entitled from the New South Wales Government.

Mr. WILKS.—He also gets travelling allowances.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—His expenses are paid when he is travelling, but he has no special allowance.

Mr. WILKS.—He was paid £1 a day living allowance when he was in Melbourne some time ago.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—He received that allowance only until the House decided that it should be discontinued, and he has not received any since. The Commonwealth are making a saving through employing Mr. Lewis.

Mr. WATSON.—I believe that we are losing thousands by employing him.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am sorry that the honorable member for Bland is displaying such inveterate hatred towards Mr. Lewis, because I know of no justification for any such feeling. It has been stated that Mr. Lewis is a decrepit old man, but he is only 57 years' of age, or two years younger than myself; and I do not consider I am decrepit. In justice to Mr. Lewis, I give the House and the country his record, which is a perfectly honorable one.

Mr. WATSON.—He is a very estimable person privately, I have no doubt; and I have nothing to say about him personally.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know how I should have got through this electoral business so well if it had not been for Mr. Lewis. After the explanation I have given, honorable members will see that if there has been any delay, it occurred between January and May, the period during which the electoral lists were in the hands of the police, and therefore the Department cannot be blamed for something over which it had no control. It must not be forgotten that we were for the first time compiling the rolls under exceptional conditions.

Mr. A. C. GROOM.—What about the discrepancies?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There is no discrepancy in Queensland, and the discrepancy in Victoria is not very large—only about 35,000 to 38,000.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—A great many persons declined to have their names placed on the rolls.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think that would account for any considerable number.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — Yes, it would ; for a considerable number.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The opinion has been expressed that a discrepancy of between 20,000 and 25,000 might be expected in the first instance under normal conditions.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But what about the discrepancy of 80,000?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I admit that I was startled when I saw there was such a large discrepancy, and I lost no time in adopting the most, speedy means of affording an opportunity for every person to have his or her name placed upon the rolls.

Mr. PAGE.—Why not do the same in Victoria?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Because the lists are not printed. I had it in my mind to do something of the kind, but when I asked what the cost of printing the rolls would be, the reply was £3,500. It would be a serious thing if we had to pay such a large sum of money for that purpose. The cost of issuing the rolls in New South Wales will not be more than as many hundreds.

Mr. FISHER.—Why should there be such a great difference?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Because New South Wales had a roll already printed so far as male voters were concerned.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, that is so, and they sell the rolls to any one at a price not exceeding 10d. a copy.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is the usual course here.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know anything about that. I know that New South Wales charges 10d. a copy for the rolls, and that the total cost to the Department will, I believe, be about £225.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They had a list of male voters already set up.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; that partly accounts for the difference, but the female lists are being specially printed, and they are nearly finished.

Mr. PAGE.—What has been done in Queensland?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I communicated with the various States with a view to having the printing done, and in all cases except that of Queensland, the matter has been settled. I was informed—and I communicated with the Premier of Queensland to ascertain if the statement was correct—that it was not intended to print the rolls in the Government Printing-office, but to farm them out. That was not the intention of the Federal Government. We could, ourselves, farm out the printing of the rolls, but our object was to have the work done in the Government Printing-office. The reply received by me does not appear satisfactory.

Mr. FISHER.—When was that?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—About three weeks ago, I think. Yesterday the Prime Minister received communication upon the question, which I have not yet seen. However, if the Queensland Government undertake the printing of the rolls in the Government Printing-office, the whole thing can be entered upon at once, because the price is satisfactory. I have given a perfectly true and plain statement of facts. Regarding the male rolls in New South Wales, I certainly think that as they had just been completed when the Act was passed, the cheapest, most expeditious, and the most satisfactory way was to take them as they were. Supposing I had insisted upon collecting the names in October? They had been collected to the end of June, and therefore there would have been a difference of only three months, which I do not think would have had so much effect upon the lists as would justify us in going to the extra expense. If honorable members supposed that I intended to appoint special officers in every State instead of employing the State officials, they were much mistaken. I think that I have made the arrangements as economically as possible. If I had incurred any very great expense, I should have had the press howling about my extravagance. In Western Australia there will be no difficulty, because the whole matter will be settled in a few days. I do not know whether it will be necessary to submit the reports of all the Electoral Commissioners to the House at once. So far as I can judge, the reports from Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia, and, perhaps, Tasmania, will not be much cavilled at, and will probably be accepted. In New South Wales and Victoria I know there have been expressions of serious dissatisfaction, and I shall have the divisions for those States brought forward first, if possible. I think it will be wise to submit them at once, in order to see if the House will accept or return them. I believe that I shall have them ready for submission to the House in the first or second week of next month. I can assure honorable members that whatever course is taken, plenty of time will be given for a re-division if necessary, and for meeting every requirement of the law, including the holding of the Revision Courts, and making every preparation for the elections in December. I think that is all the House requires, and all that honorable members can reasonably expect. I have been accused of not attending to this matter, but although I have not always been in my official chair—and I do not regard it as necessary to be always there—I have given all the requisite instructions to my officers, and I am well pleased with the way in which they have carried them out.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—I had hoped that there would be no necessity for any further debate after the explanation given by the Minister. The honorable member for Macquarie has done good service in fixing the attention of the Minister upon certain lapses of his Department, and in directing the attention of the public to the fact that there is a discrepancy between the number of electors on the rolls and those who should be there. I did not hear any attack made upon Mr. Lewis personally, but the question is whether he has performed his work as an electoral officer with efficiency, or otherwise. I maintain that the delay that has taken place, and the incompleteness of the rolls, are due to faulty administration. The Minister admitted that he was startled at the discrepancy disclosed, but his officers should have been alive to the facts months before they appear to have recognised them. It was only when the Commissioner mapped out certain divisions upon erroneous data that a discrepancy of any considerable character was disclosed.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — While the matter was in the hands of the police we could do nothing.

Mr. WILKS.—Honorable members have not attacked the Minister, but merely the machinery of his Department. The electoral officers had charge of the compilation of the electoral rolls, and they knew of the census returns, and yet the discrepancy between the two was not discovered till a few weeks ago. If ever a Department deserved a rating, at the hands of a Minister, it is certainly that which the Minister controls. Yet the honorable gentleman calmly informs the House that his Department is excellently managed.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The moment the lists were received so that a comparison could be instituted, the discrepancy was discovered.

Mr. WILKS.—The Minister now assures us that the Federal rolls are being exhibited throughout the different districts. Surely that could have been done before the new electoral divisions were mapped out. I am in thorough accord with most of the remarks that have fallen from honorable members who have addressed the House upon this question, and there is no need for me to dwell upon the points which they have made. But I should like to point out that there is a discrepancy, not only between the census returns and the Federal roll, but also between the electoral rolls for 1900 and 1902. I find, for example, that comparing the present State roll with that upon which this Parliament was elected, there is a deficiency in the city and suburban area of 8,500 electors, whilst in the country the deficiency is only 6,500. That is the best answer which can be supplied to the contention of some honorable members that a proper quota has not been struck for Sydney and its suburbs, and that the country districts have been neglected. The very reverse is the case. There will always be a large floating population around any city which will account for a great discrepancy in the State rolls; but under the Federal system, electors can be so very easily enrolled, that there should be practically no such discrepancy. Too much reliance has been placed upon State officers and State machinery. That the city has gained an advantage over the country is not true, as an examination of the rolls for 1900 and 1902 will show. I believe that, to a large extent, the discrepancy which exists can be accounted for by the floating population. I trust that the Minister for Home Affairs will not regard the motion which has been submitted as partaking in any way of the nature of a party attack. I hold that it is the duty of Parliament to put its electoral machinery in the most healthy condition possible. That it is not in such a condition at present is evidenced by the fact that the names of 150,000 electors have been omitted from the Federal roll. That is a proof of the inefficiency of the Minister's Department.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—An extraordinary feature of the matter is that in every State except New South Wales and Victoria the names are very evenly collected.

Mr. WILKS.—I have no desire to blame the electoral officers too severely, because of the large districts which they have had to canvass. At the same time it is positively shameful that this discrepancy should have been discovered only after the quota has been decided upon and the districts have been mapped.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—I had no intention of taking part in this debate until the Minister for Home Affairs declared that he did not propose to make the same effort to discover the electors whose names do not appear on the Federal roll in Victoria that he intends to put forth in New South Wales. He bases his reason for making this distinction upon the expense which would be involved. It has been stated in the press that of the 35,000 electors who have not been enrolled in Victoria, 30,000 are resident in the country districts. It is very probable that that is a fact, because in the drought-stricken districts of this State, whatever may be the position in New South Wales, regarding the distribution of the electors who have not been enrolled—

Mr. WILKS.—I was quoting from the official returns.

Mr. SKENE.—I am perfectly satisfied, so far as Victoria is concerned, that the names of a large number of the dwellers in the northern areas do not appear on the rolls. At the time that the rolls were collected they were absent from their homes. The whole of the small holders in the mallee district were compelled by the drought to leave their homes and go south, taking their stock with them. This is a most important matter, because 30,000 electors in the country represent not merely a quota, but the maximum for an electorate.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Their names would still be upon the roll.

Mr. SKENE.—One country electorate has been entirely cut out of the plan of the new districts, and if that has been done by reason of the residents being absent from their homes, and becoming enrolled elsewhere—

Mr. TUDOR.—They do not water their stock in the metropolitan areas, surely.

Mr. SKENE.—Probably the honorable member does not know as much about this matter as I do. I am aware that the whole of the stock in the district which I have mentioned was removed to districts south of the Dividing Range. Assuming that these people were enrolled outside of their own district, the effect must still be the loss of the electorate from which they came. The Wimmera electorate was reduced by 5,000 votes. Seeing that the temporary absence of these electors from their homes would have that effect, I do not think that the Minister, because of the expense that would be involved, should stay his hand in endeavouring to find them. He says that such action will cost only £350 in New South Wales, whereas in Victoria it would cost £3,500. But, even if it did cost that sum—assuming that a country electorate has been wiped out of existence because of the abnormal conditions, prevailing when the roll was being compiled—it is surely worth the expenditure to have it restored. When the Electoral Bill was under discussion, the matter to which I am now directing attention was very strongly argued by the representatives of country constituencies, and was eventually settled in a fair spirit. I hold that, as far as possible, the country districts should be given reasonable representation—a larger representation than that to which they are numerically entitled as compared with the city electorates. That was conceded when Parliament fixed a margin of 20 per cent. either above or below the quota in connexion with the representation of rural districts in this Parliament. If the country is not diligently searched for these electors, and if an electorate has been struck out, the whole advantage which Parliament proposed to confer upon those districts has vanished. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will reconsider his attitude upon this matter. Certainly the expenditure of £3,500 is not a large one to insure fair play as between town and country districts, which fair play this House decided should be given under the Electoral Act.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I am sorry that many honorable members have seen fit to attack Mr. Lewis so bitterly, and to condemn the Minister for retaining him in his position. My opinion is that Mr. Lewis is a real up-to-date, courteous, sympathetic business man, who endeavours in every possible way to facilitate the work of his Department. I have frequently come into contact with him in prosecuting inquiries about electoral matters in Tasmania, and I have always found him able to put his hands upon the necessary papers at once. Is it to be suggested that we should retire officers simply because they have reached a certain age? We shall all grow old in a few years, and will it then be said that we are unfit to discharge our duties? If matters are not progressing satisfactorily, it is easy enough to remedy the evil at a later stage, but that is no reason why we should take advantage of a man who is not able to defend himself upon the floor of this House.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I was rather surprised at the manner in which the Minister for Home Affairs attempted to justify himself with regard to the collection of the Federal rolls in New South Wales. My contention is that the State roll was taken as the basis for the mapping out of the new Federal electorates, whilst in the matter of the female roll, a circular was sent out by the State Government of New South Wales directing it to be collected according to the law of New South Wales, and not according to the Commonwealth law. That roll has been collected, and has not been revised. If the Minister had only taken the trouble to look into this matter some months ago, he would have seen that, comparing the State roll for 1900 with the new Federal roll for 1902, there was a deficiency—when there ought to have been a large increase—of 15,000 electors in New South Wales. The deficiency is made greater when we take into account the increase there should be in the number of electors under the extended Federal franchise.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I told the honorable member that the estimate was 8,800.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The persons in New South Wales with a residence of under one year are 11,400 males, and 5,920 females—a total of 17,000.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—But under the Commonwealth Electoral Act only six months residence in Australia is required.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—If I happen to have resided the requisite length of time in Victoria, and change my residence to New South Wales, I have only to be in the latter State one month in order to have my name put on the Federal roll, but one year is required under the State law. And in the figures I quote I make all allowance for such cases. We have to consider persons who are in receipt of State aid, and also the military, all of whom ought to be on the Federal roll, although they are not on the State roll.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The military votes number 450.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—And those in receipt of State aid are about 3,100. What I contend is that the Minister or the Department ought to have taken steps immediately after the Electoral Act was passed to have a proper roll compiled, a work which I do not suppose would in New South Wales have cost more than £1,000 if the police had been employed. I am referring now, of course, to the mere work of collecting the names. I understand that the police in the State of New South Wales last year collected the roll of female names at a cost of about £900. In my opinion, the names could have been collected, as in 1900, by the police, under the supervision of the State, the Government of which would have been only too glad to afford the necessary assistance. But the Minister has never obtained a Federal roll in New South Wales of either male or female voters, and the consequence is the large deficiency of 70,000 names. No instructions were given to collect the names under the Federal law, and they were collected under the State law. I felt it my duty, in the interests of the public, to submit the motion, not for any party purposes, but in order that the matter might be fully ventilated. I am afraid, however, that the explanation of the Minister in regard to New South Wales will not be regarded as satisfactory.

Question resolved in the negative.

PAPERS.

Sir JOHN FORREST laid upon the table the following paper:—

Gazette notice of alteration of regulations for the Victorian Military Forces.

The CLERK laid upon the table—

Return showing the number of private telephones in each municipal or police district in Tasmania (only excepting the cities of Hobart and Launceston) which have been relinquished since the regulations issued by the Postmaster-General came into force.

TELEPHONIC AND TELEGRAPHIC GUARANTEES.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (for Mr. JOSEPH COOK) asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What is the amount of the losses on the telephonic guarantee lines in New South Wales?
2. How long was this amount accumulating?
3. What was the value and yearly average of the total telephonic business during the same period?
4. What was the average yearly amount of the bad debts?
5. What was the average yearly proportion of bad debts to total business?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The return asked for is not yet complete. It will be furnished as soon as possible.

Mr. PAGE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether, in view of the fact that the Telegraph Department has authorized the construction of a telegraph line to Tarcoola, in South Australia, without requiring any cash guarantee for construction and maintenance, the Postmaster-General will treat the State of Queensland similarly, and place an amount on the Estimates for the construction of a telegraph line from Jundah to Stonehenge (Queensland)?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

If it can be shown that the same conditions exist in connexion with a telegraph line from Jundah to Stonehenge, in Queensland, as were shown in connexion with the telegraph line to Tarcoola, in South Australia, the Postmaster-General will consider whether the line to Stonehenge should not be constructed under similar conditions.

BONUS ON COFFEE.

Mr. BAMFORD asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, upon notice—

Whether it is his intention to take any steps in the direction of giving effect to the petition of the Cairns Coffee Growers' Association with reference to giving a bonus on coffee grown within the Commonwealth?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

The Government do not propose to add to the list of bonuses to be proposed this session, but will consider the general question of bonuses later on.

INTER-STATE REMITTANCES.

Mr. MAHON asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. What are the total charges for 1901 and 1902 respectively made by banking institutions as exchange on inter-State remittances?
2. Has any exchange been paid during those years on remittances from or to Australia, and, if so, how much?

3. Has the Auditor-General submitted any scheme whereby in future this outlay may be saved to the Treasury?

4. If not, will the Treasurer, as intimated by him in Committee of Supply on 30th September last, formulate a proposal by which a saving may be effected?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—This information is not within the knowledge of my Department. I should have to send to all the States Departments, and get the returns picked out from the various contingency votes.

Mr. MAHON.—I mean the money paid by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—As I say, in order to get the information, I should have to send to the Departments in the various States.

Mr. MAHON.—Surely the Treasurer knows what he has paid?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—No, because it has been the habit to pay exchanges out of the vote for contingencies—there is no specific vote. If the honorable member thinks the information he desires is absolutely necessary, and persists with his inquiry, I shall offer no opposition if he moves for a return. But if he would tell me exactly what he wants, I may be able to get the information in a simpler form. The answers to the honorable member's other questions are as follow:—

3. No.

4. With regard to Inter-State exchanges, a large number of transactions is now dealt with by the Treasury by means of the Inter-State Cash Adjustment Account. It is intended during the ensuing financial year to settle the money order transactions between the States by means of the same account, and the Money Order Account will be used in each State as much as possible, in order to reduce the amount of internal exchange. Whenever a large remittance is made to London, the Treasurer asks the different States Treasurers if they can conveniently provide the money there.

I can assure the honorable member that the Government do all they possibly can to save exchanges, but we have to deal with receipts and expenditure amounting to £24,000,000, and must pay a certain amount of exchange for the work. I do all that I can to keep the amount as low as possible.

DUTY ON RUBBER BOOTS.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, upon notice—

Under what authority have the Customs officers of Tasmania this year levied a duty of 25 per cent. and 2½ per cent. prime upon rubber boots made specially and used for mining, whereas these boots are exempted from duty under the Tariff in force, and were recently so regarded by the Customs authorities of Tasmania?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows :—

Because the boots are wading boots, viz., boots permitting dry wading above the knee, dutiable on the market value, with 10 per cent. added at 25 per cent. The duty was simply calculated the usual way.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN INCREMENTS.

Mr. POYNTON asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

Why have the annual increments not been paid for the current year to South Australian Federal officers who are entitled to the same by virtue of section 60 of the Public Service Act?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—This is a matter more within the purview of the Department for Home Affairs; but the answer to the honorable member's question is as follows :—

Mr. McLachlan explains that in certain cases the increments of South Australian officers have not been paid, pending a decision of the Attorney-General. In these cases, if the increments were granted, the effect would be to place the officer in a higher class, e.g.—Increments have been allowed in cases where the salary, plus the increment, would not exceed £184, £185 being the minimum of the fourth class.

It would not be wise to do anything until the classification takes place; it might have the effect of removing an officer from one class to another. If the honorable member has any particular cases in his mind, and will bring them under notice, they will be investigated.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE PROPOSALS.

Mr. McDONALD asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact that the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth caused the following message relating to the subject of preferential trade to be cabled to England :—

“Federal and all State Governments approve Chamberlain's proposal. Only extreme section free-traders oppose. Immense majority assured when put before the country. Personally consider preferential Tariffs indispensable foundation of Empire unity.”

2. If so, on what grounds, or by what authority, did the Attorney-General express the approval of the Federal and State Governments of Mr. Chamberlain's proposals?

3. Is it a fact that at least one State Premier repudiates the right of the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth to pledge the Government of his State in terms of this cable message?

4. In view of the emphatic manner in which the Federal and State Governments are thus pledged to the approval of Mr. Chamberlain's proposals, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to give Parliament an early opportunity of considering those proposals?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In the temporary absence of the Prime Minister, I have to say that the answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. Yes; in reply to a question telegraphed by the British Australasian, a newspaper published in London.

2. The Prime Minister had some days previously expressed to Reuter's Agency, who had telegraphed it to the London press, the approval of the Federal Government of a system of preferential trade. In Mr. Deakin's opinion, based on newspaper reports, and his own knowledge, the States Governments were favourable.

3 and 4. Such a statement appears in the press, but no attempt was made, or could be made, to “pledge” the Government of any State; nor could Mr. Deakin's telegram possibly be read as conveying anything more than his own view. If time permits during this session, Ministers will make proposals on the subject, but they do not anticipate obtaining an opportunity of doing so until after the general election.

JUDICIARY BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from 17th June, vide page 1063):

Clause 31—

In addition to the matters in respect whereof original jurisdiction is conferred on the High Court by the Constitution, the Court shall have original jurisdiction in respect of all matters—

- (a) arising under the Constitution, or involving its interpretation;
- (b) arising under any laws made by the Parliament;
- (c) relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different States.

Provided that, with respect to matters which are by the laws of the Commonwealth required to be instituted in courts of summary jurisdiction or other courts of inferior jurisdiction, the original jurisdiction of the High Court shall not be exercised except by way of removal of the matter from the court in which it is pending into the High Court and thereafter hearing and determining it in the High Court.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—When the Committee had this proposal under consideration last night, I was endeavouring to point out what my position was in regard to the measure introduced last year. I had gone so far as to express my approval of the establishment of some sort of High Court as being necessary for the completion of the Constitution, and to safeguard both it and the rights of States and of citizens under it; and I was proceeding to say that now we have come to the consideration of this clause, we have reached the parting of the ways. It seems to me that if we adopt all that the framers of the Bill propose, those of us who think it highly desirable that there shall be a High Court, will run the risk of seeing our end frustrated; because an attempt is being made to establish a High Court which will be greater than the Constitution requires, and more extensive than the people are prepared to accept. Honorable members discussed the clause last evening very much as if they were debating the second reading again, but I think there was no help for that, because the whole fate of the measure depends upon the decision which we come to in regard to the clause. If it is struck out the whole Bill will have to be re-cast. That being so, it is almost impossible for honorable members to confine their remarks within the limits of discussion allowed in Committee. The clause confers upon the High Court a wider original jurisdiction than is provided for in the Constitution, but I understand, from the speeches which I have heard, that as time goes on it will not be found much wider and that the cost of the court will therefore not be limited to the £23,000 mentioned by the Attorney-General, or even to £30,000, but will run into very much higher figures. For that reason I shall oppose this and the succeeding clauses. While I oppose it for one reason, other honorable members will oppose it for other reasons, but each must defend his own reasons, and therefore I desire to occupy the time of the Committee for a few minutes in explaining my position in regard to the clause, and generally towards the provisions of the Bill. It was my original opinion that it would probably be unnecessary to establish a High Court, but I was convinced of the necessity for its establishment after I heard the very able addresses of the Attorney-General, the Prime Minister, and the honorable and learned member for Indi. It seems to me that the splendid train of reasoning followed by those three speakers—who, I hope, will be the forerunners of a long line of statesmen who will protect the Constitution, and see its provisions carried into effect—should convince everyone that the establishment of a High Court is absolutely necessary, as the crown of the Constitution, and to protect it, and the rights of States and individuals under it. Personally,

I am fully convinced that a High Court of some kind must be established, and to my mind the fact that its establishment will cost money does not weaken the position of those who support it. If its establishment is necessary under the Constitution, we have not to consider the question of cost. The Commonwealth would have saved money if the framers of the Constitution had conferred upon the States Legislatures the right to nominate representatives to this and to the other Chamber, but I am convinced that no one contemplated the saving of the £50,000 or £60,000 which we shall have to spend upon the Federal elections every few years by the adoption of such an arrangement. For the same reason we cannot question on the score of cost the establishment of a High Court of some sort to perform the equally important, if not more important, work of interpreting the Constitution, and preserving the rights of States and individuals under it. There has been a great deal of clamour in regard to this measure outside, but when it is said that those of us who support the measure are indulging in extravagance, I, for one, reply that I am prepared to meet my constituents at any time to defend my action in supporting the proposal to establish this necessary body. Furthermore, I feel convinced that if the States had not federated, the time would shortly have come, and would probably have come as early as now, when they would have created a Court of Appeal for Australia. I recall several discussions upon that question, notably in the old Federal Council at Hobart; and I have been informed by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, that a Bill was drafted in Victoria for the establishment of such an Appeal Court. Everything pointed to the fact that sooner or later some sort of Appeal Court for Australia would be established, and the cost of such a court would not have been less than the cost of the High Court which I am prepared to see established under the Constitution. I intend to vote for a Court of five Judges for reasons which I will give later on. I do not think that if an Appeal Court for the whole of Australia had been established prior to federation, fewer than five Judges would have been appointed. My idea, when the Bill was brought before Parliament last session, was that we might have in the first instance an interim arrangement, under which the Chief Justices of the Supreme Courts of the States would perform the necessary duties for a time ; but, as I stated last night, that idea has been exploded, partly because of the period which has elapsed since the Bill was introduced—which makes it too late to think of anything but a permanent arrangement—but chiefly because of the precise and definite wording of the Constitution, which does not contemplate in any line of it that Parliament should have power to adopt any temporary expedient in this matter. The Constitution lays it down very definitely that Parliament shall create a High Court whose Judges shall be appointed for life, subject to their good behaviour. No provision is made for the creation of a temporary court. Therefore, whatever Judges are appointed will be appointed for life, and there will be no getting rid of them except on the vote of both Houses, on the ground of misbehaviour or failing abilities. But apart from the effect of the Constitution, it seems to me that there would be no more wisdom in selecting the Chief Justices of the six States to form a Bench, than in selecting the six tallest or six shortest Justices in the States Courts. It is notorious, though I am not speaking of the present state of affairs, that in the history of the Judicial Bench of Australia, as well as elsewhere, the best men have not always been the Chief Justices. Much depends in the creation of the High Court upon the personnel of the gentlemen who are first appointed to occupy positions upon the Federal Bench—its future success, the confidence of the nation, and the gradual development of a Judiciary which in course of time will gain full power to finally determine every legal question which may arise in Australia, will be greatly influenced by the character of the first appointments. I regret that the power which was asked for in the draft Constitution Bill, to confine appeals in certain cases to the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction, was not given in its entirety. I do not sympathize with the views of those who have spoken highly of the Privy Council. The Privy Council, like many other institutions, is a time-honoured body, but it no longer meets the exigencies of the Empire, and much less the needs and necessities of Australia. It is an accidental thing, and quite out of touch with our conditions. I believe that there are fifteen members of that court, and that its quorum is four, so that it may happen that four of its weakest men are called upon to decide cases of the greatest weight and moment. Where questions of commercial and ordinary law are in dispute, I think they can be settled by the Privy Council as well as by an Australian Court, but in purely Australian cases, and especially in constitutional cases, the members of the Privy Council would be less fitted to deal with disputes than the best men we could select in Australia. If the Ministry appoint to the High Court as Judges men who are selected for the excellence of their intellect and abilities, five will not be too many, and we shall have a court which, as time goes on, will get more and more appeal work under the provision of the Constitution which gives this Parliament the right to limit appeals in certain cases to the Privy Council, and because it will command the increasing confidence of the nation. I cannot see any advantage in perpetuating the right of appeal to the Privy Council. Indeed, in constitutional cases, there is very grave danger in having to appeal to that body. Our Constitution should be interpreted by an Australian Court. In this way we shall get definite decisions upon several doubtful points, and probably, as has been the case in the United States, the decisions of the court will in effect amend the Constitution to meet the popular will in several particulars in regard to which it is not worth the trouble and expense of going through the forms of amendment provided for in the Constitution. If we did not create the High Court, but took our interpretation of the Constitution from the States Courts, with the right of appeal to the Privy Council, we should run the greatest danger. That body has in many instances interpreted the Canadian Constitution, but I think it is notorious amongst legal men that the judgments given were almost invariably those of the late Lord Watson, who for twenty years made the provisions of that Constitution his especial study. In giving these decisions he apparently had the approval of every member of the Privy Council, simply because he above all the others, had made the subject his special study. I do not think we could depend upon anybody to take a similar interest in our Constitution. Lord Watson probably performed very great service to Canada in devoting his time almost exclusively to the work of interpreting its Constitution. Owing to the fact that the Privy Council has now on its records many decisions with regard to the Canadian Constitution, we should, in the event of our applying for an interpretation of our Constitution, run the risk of having certain decisions in Canadian cases read into our Constitution, which is not upon exactly the same lines as of that of Canada. Our Constitution is sui generis. It does not follow Canadian lines, and differs from the United States and Swiss Constitutions. It is a Constitution of our own making, and consequently it ought to be interpreted by Judges of our own creation—by men who have grown up amongst us, and who are permeated with Australian ideas. I think we can find all the necessary Judges amongst ourselves. We do not require to restrict our choice to Judges of the States Courts, or to men of eminence in public life, but if we choose the best men available in the Commonwealth wherever they may be, we shall create a Court which will grow more and more into the confidence of the people, and which will be able to safely direct us upon all matters affecting the interpretation of our Constitution and our laws. That is the ideal which I desire to work up to. It has been very eloquently and lucidly set forth by the supporters of the Bill, and I shall do all I can to realize it. When we come to consider the Bill, we find that its framers, actuated by a desire to erect a strong Court of five Judges which would command respect, have gone further than is necessary in order to afford full reason for their appointment. I go the length of saying that if there were no work to be done by the Judges at present, we should still appoint them. A very old friend of mine used to pay £20 per annum to a doctor to attend upon his rather large family, but he did not require the services of the doctor from year's end to year's end. He did not complain, because he regarded the absence of sickness as an excellent state of affairs. Similarly, if we have five Judges and they have nothing to do, we ought to congratulate ourselves upon that fact. So long, however, as we have no High Court, and no means of settling our own disputes, we may expect an increase of litigation. If five Judges are appointed, with the limited duties to which I would confine them, they will not cost the Commonwealth more than about £20,000 per annum. Unfortunately, they will cost us that sum as soon as we create the Court, but I do not think that the outlay will be any greater in twenty years hence, when they will have much more work to do, and will be much more necessary for the protection of our growing interests. I am satisfied that such a Court is required, and that we cannot do with less than five Judges. If we appoint only three Judges, we may save £5,000 or £6,000 per annum, but we shall have an emasculated Court that will not command the same respect as a Bench of five Judges. We should frequently be compelled to accept the decision of two Judges out of three, and we could not feel satisfied with such a Court having the final word upon important subjects. In the United States they started their Supreme Court with six Judges, and that Court had not the same extensive functions that we propose to confer upon our High Court. Their duties were confined to the interpretation of the Constitution and to cases arising under the Constitution or between States or parties in different States. When that Court was appointed the United States were not in as good a position as is Australia to-day. Their population in the last decade of the 18th century was about 1,000,000 less than ours at the present time. They had no large cities like Melbourne, Sydney, or Brisbane, because Philadelphia, the largest centre in those days, had a population of only 42,520, New York came next with a population of 33,131, and there was no other city in the Union at the time the Federation was started that had a population of more than 20,000. They had a number of small towns scattered throughout the Union. The famous Boston, their intellectual centre, had only 13,000; Charleston had a population of a little more, and Baltimore only 14,503. While the United States had far less population than we have, the extent of her trade and commerce was relatively still smaller than ours; because, as the world progresses, all communities have relatively more trade and commerce than was the case with similar populations in days gone by. The American Union, knowing full well the necessity for the Supreme Court, appointed six Judges, although, as I have stated, the functions of the Court were limited to the decision of Constitutional questions. I do not know why they appointed six Judges, because it seems to me that it is desirable to have an odd number, and therefore I favour the appointment of five Judges.

When I am asked what these Judges are to do, I do not think it is necessary to do more than point to the Constitution. Where is the necessity for creating work by granting extended original jurisdiction? Is it not plainly apparent that it has been feared by the framers of the Bill that there would not be sufficient work for five Judges, unless some extra jurisdiction were given to them? I think it is singularly unfortunate that this view was taken. All true lovers of the Constitution, with a patriotic desire to see the Federation progress, would have willingly supported the appointment of five Judges, if for no other purpose than that set forth under the Constitution, and I regret that the Bill has been hampered by other provisions which, to my mind, rather mar its effect. I intend to vote for the striking out of the clause now under discussion, but I shall support the appointment of five Judges. There is another reason why we should have five Judges. If only three Judges are appointed to constitute the High Court at the commencement of its career, the inevitable increase in the work of the Court in the near future will soon necessitate an increase in the number of its members. But in the meantime serious constitutional questions may have come before the Supreme Courts of the States for their decision, or may have been warmly discussed in the Federal Parliament and in the press of the Commonwealth, and the selection of the additional Judges for the High Court will inevitably be influenced by their known or suspected opinions on the questions under discussion in the political arena, or in the Supreme Courts of the States. An illustration of such an influence in the selection of additional Judges is found in the history of the United States of America, in connexion with the long controversy upon the question of the power of Congress to issue paper money. In consequence of the quarrel between Congress and President Johnson, an Act was passed by Congress to prevent the President filling up any vacancies that might occur on the Bench of the Supreme Court until the number of the Judges fell below seven. Towards the close of the President's term of office the number of the Judges of the Supreme Court had become reduced from ten to seven, and at the time at which the Court consisted of only seven Judges the question of the power of Congress to issue paper money came before the Court for decision in the case of Hepburn v. Griswold. The Court, by a bare majority of four Judges against three, decided that the issue of paper money by Congress was illegal. Shortly afterwards General Grant was elected President, and the Act of Congress, which prohibited the appointment of additional Judges, was repealed. The new President immediately appointed two new Judges, who were known, or believed to be, of the opinion that Congress had the power to issue paper money. One of them, Mr. Justice Strong, had previously delivered a judgment in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in support of the legality of such money; and two years after the two new Judges were appointed, the same question came again before the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases known as "The Legal Tender Cases," and judgment was given in favour of the legality of the paper money issued by Congress, by a majority of five Judges out of the total number of nine which then constituted the Court. These historical events clearly demonstrate the desirability of appointing a sufficient number of Judges of the High Court of Australia at the commencement of its career, in order to prevent a prospective increase of work being converted into an excuse for increasing the number of Judges for political purposes at a subsequent time. If we start with five Judges we shall probably find them sufficient for a very long time. If the only argument against the appointment of that number is based upon the expense involved, I would rather face the consequences in that direction at once than risk the necessity of strengthening the Bench later on under conditions such as I have indicated. I feel that I must support the Bill, but as some of its provisions are unnecessarily wide, I shall endeavour to modify them. I am satisfied that if we agree to this clause we shall confer on the High Court a wider original jurisdiction than it is necessary to clothe it with, that five Judges will not be sufficient to transact its business, and that the estimated expenditure of £30,000 per annum will prove utterly inadequate. If we invest this tribunal with original jurisdiction, in connexion with matrimonial and bankruptcy matters, fifteen Judges would not be able to do the work. But if we confine the functions of the Court to appellate jurisdiction, the interpretation of the Constitution, and the primary jurisdiction conferred under the Constitution, I think that the expense of its maintenance will be about £20,000 a year. Although I am sorry that it may cost that sum now, I would vote for it if it cost £40,000 per annum. At the same time I do not think it will cost more than £20,000 per annum, even after ten or twelve years have elapsed.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—As this clause involves the defining of the functions of the High Court, it was calculated to call forth the opinion of the legal talent in this Chamber. In the course of the debate which has taken place upon this measure, some very able and instructive addresses have been delivered from both sides. The Attorney-General gave us a very able exposition of its principles, and his position was forcibly supported by the honorable and learned member for Indi and the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. Equally able speeches were made against the Bill by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and the honorable and learned member for Corinella, whilst the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has delivered addresses both for and against the Bill. But the speech which appealed to me most was that delivered by the honorable member for North Sydney. It contained a good deal of hard-headed, Scotch common sense. Before committing themselves to the proposals of the Government, honorable members would do well to carefully peruse that address. There is no doubt that provision is made in the Constitution for the establishment of a High Court, and other tribunals of a more or less judicial character. But Federation has been in existence for more than two years, and until now the Government have never betrayed undue anxiety to carry that provision into effect, and I fail to see that the Constitution has suffered irreparable damage in the absence of these legal machinery measures. Personally, I do not think there is any urgent need for the establishment of a High Court, and in my judgment it would be wise to defer its creation until such a tribunal becomes absolutely necessary. If we commit the Commonwealth to the establishment of a Court of this character, we cannot expect it to do anything like justice to the people, unless we are prepared to sanction the expenditure of a considerable sum of money. Matters have proceeded satisfactorily enough in the absence of this tribunal, and the public have not exhibited any strong anxiety for its creation. In view of the wide difference of opinion which exists, both in this Chamber and outside of it, the Government would be acting wisely in withdrawing the measure and allowing honorable members to deal with more urgent legislation. When the need becomes apparent, I shall be quite prepared to sanction the establishment of a High Court, but I shall want to see such a tribunal erected as will reflect credit upon the Commonwealth. I cannot, however, go all the way with the Government in their desire to establish a Court that will practically run counter to the States Courts, and duplicate the work in that respect. I think that the honorable member for North Sydney stated the position accurately when he declared that we must not lose sight of the fact that in our Federal legislation we are dealing with the same people as are affected by State legislation. We are not providing for an entirely new order of affairs. I should like to see the High Court, when it is created, work as far as possible in harmony with the States Courts. Indeed, I think it should be supplementary to those courts, and form a court of appeal from their decisions. I do not hold with those who believe that there must necessarily be antagonism between the States and the Federal judicial systems, and that the Judges of the States Courts, in dealing with Federal matters, would regard them from a parochial stand-point. I believe that they are quite competent to deal with such matters. I am in favour of making the High Court so completely a part of the States Courts that I am averse to conferring upon that tribunal the original jurisdiction proposed under this Bill. I believe that the best talent upon the States Courts should be drawn on from the outset to constitute the High Court. In that way we should bring the Federal and the States Courts into harmony, and the greater the harmony that exists the better it will be for the people. We must not forget that the States have established and maintained at considerable cost the courts which are already in existence. The Federal Government, in my opinion, should use those courts in the way I have indicated. No injustice could result to the Commonwealth from the adoption of such a procedure. On the contrary, if we clothe the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction, to enable them to deal with all Federal matters, we shall effect great savings. If afterwards our experience shows that there is sufficient work to warrant the creation of a High Court as a court of appeal, we can enact the necessary legislation, thus providing for our needs as they arise. We must always remember that the cost of the Federal, as well as the State administration, is borne by the one people. I have in my hand a return prepared by Senator Zeal which shows the amount of money that is annually expended by the various States upon their judiciaries. From this document I find that the salaries of the Judges throughout the Commonwealth total £66,900; the expenses in connexion with them, £35,989. The District Court Judges draw £22,000; the law officers, £118,431; the sheriffs, £51,062; the Masters in Equity, £16,342; the Stipendiary Magistrates, £63,920; whilst the petty sessions cost £128,024; miscellaneous expenditure is responsible for £68,638; making a total of £571,306. That amount does not include the cost of providing police protection, but simply covers the courts of justice and the paraphernalia immediately connected therewith. That total is distributed over the States as follows:—New South Wales, £255,994; Victoria, £135,701; Queensland, £75,906; South Australia, £27,840; Western Australia, £57,142; and Tasmania, £18,723. Senator Zeal compares this expenditure with that which takes place in the sister Commonwealth of Canada. He says that, compared with Canada, the extravagance of this Commonwealth is remarkable. In the Dominion the annual cost of the judiciary and police combined is £474,221, or £97,085 less than the cost of the judiciary of the Commonwealth.

MR. CONROY.—The cost of our judiciary does not include the cost of the police.

MR. BROWN.—That is so, whereas in Canada the maintenance of the police is included in the sum I have mentioned. I am informed that the judiciary of Canada amply supplies all wants; and, if that be so, we ought to be satisfied with more reasonable proposals than those submitted by the Government. The States have incurred great expense in establishing the present judiciary, and the machinery at our disposal ought to be utilized as far as possible; certainly we should not duplicate the tribunals in the way proposed by the Bill. There are many other directions in which money can be usefully expended on good government for the benefit of the Commonwealth; and all that is necessary at present is to clothe the States Courts with the necessary Federal jurisdiction. If there is need for a High Court of Appeal let such a Court be established, but, in our present circumstances, there is no necessity for a duplication of jurisdiction. It has been urged that the proposal of the Government will cheapen law within the Commonwealth; but in my opinion the man who can solve the problem of how to lessen the cost of litigation in this community will be a genius. I am glad to say that I have had no personal experience of law courts; but from what I can see he is a wise man who keeps out of litigation. In nine cases out of ten the parties on both sides are the losers, the only persons who seem to reap a rich harvest being the legal gentlemen employed; and that experience will, I am afraid, be repeated in the Federal High Court. It must be remembered that a Federal tribunal sitting in Sydney, Melbourne, or Adelaide will only constitute a part of the High Court, and the probabilities are that in many cases the decisions will form the subject of appeal to what will be known as the Full Court. The honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley, claims to have had special experience of the High Court in another Commonwealth, but the conditions there are very dissimilar to our own; at any rate, I do not think we shall see such a free use of the revolver as the honorable member seemed to indicate in the High Court of which he spoke. If it were possible under the Constitution to establish a purely Australian High Court, in the sense in which the word "Australian" is ordinarily used, there might be some reason for agreeing to a proposal in that direction; but the decisions of the proposed Court, with the exception of those relating to the interpretation of the Constitution, and cases originating in the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction, may be taken to the Privy Council. While our needs are not very pressing, I do not think we need fear following the example of Canada so far as questions affecting the interpretation of the Constitution are concerned; and I shall endeavour to give Federal jurisdiction to the States Courts, with the High Court as a court of appeal. I do not see any need for the original jurisdiction proposed to be given to the High Court, nor am I of opinion that so large a number of Judges as proposed ought to be appointed. We ought to start with the lesser number, and when the need becomes evident appoint more Judges. I strongly protest against what appears to be the policy of the Government in establishing an ornamental judiciary, an Inter-State Commission, and other expensive bodies. If these bodies be established, and an appeal is made for legislation in other directions of more vital importance to the community, such as the establishment of Courts of Arbitration and Conciliation, the reply will be made that our resources have been exhausted; and, therefore, I shall support the amendment which I understand has been moved to eliminate from the Bill the clauses which give original jurisdiction to the High Court.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I have been very pleased to find, during the course of this debate, that we have in this Chamber a number of lawyers, who, although they would derive personal advantage from the setting up of the High Court proposed by the Government, are patriotic enough to remember the interests of the general public, and therefore hesitate about committing the country to the large expenditure which the proposal would entail. It is a very difficult thing for any of us to say what the cost of the proposed High Court would be, but in a matter of this kind we must rely greatly upon the opinions expressed by the legal members of the Committee, and after listening to the very able speeches delivered by members of the legal profession, I have come to the conclusion that the proposal should not be adopted. Of course, we are all of opinion that the public should be given the right to proceed, if they think fit, against the Federal Government. I know that difficulties have arisen in the past, and I was one of those who complained of the delay on the part of the Government in not providing for some court—not an expensive court such as is now proposed—which would be given jurisdiction to hear cases brought against the Federation. When, towards the close of last session, the Attorney-General submitted a short Bill to enable the public to bring suits against the Federation, an attempt was made to amend it so as to extend the jurisdiction, and I believe that if that amendment had been carried it would have been to the advantage of all concerned, though it might have been inconvenient for the Government. But while, as I have said, difficulties have arisen, I think that they could be met for the present by extending the jurisdiction of the States Courts pending the establishment of a High Court. Those of us who voted against the Bill did so, not because we are opposed to the establishment of a High Court as a court of appeal, with the original jurisdiction provided for in the Constitution, but because we object to the expenditure which a High Court, established on the lines proposed, would entail.

Mr. SAWERS.—In voting against the Bill the honorable member voted against the principle contained in it. The question of expense is a matter to be dealt with in Committee.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There is a very great difference between a court such as many of us would like to see established and that proposed by the Government. My honorable friend will have an opportunity of justifying his vote before the country, but no one ever thought that the Government would propose to establish such a court as is provided for in the Bill. What does the proposal of the Government mean? They propose to go much further than the Constitution contemplates. The Constitution provides for an appeal to the High Court in certain cases, and for a certain limited original jurisdiction, but it does not take away the right of appeal to the Privy Council, which some people think would often be better than an appeal to the High Court, because the Privy Council is far removed from all local jealousies. That view is taken by many prominent lawyers. But the Government propose to go much further than is contemplated by the Constitution, and to place under the jurisdiction of the High Court many matters which are not specifically referred to it.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The Government can give to the High Court only the jurisdiction provided for by the Constitution.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am aware that the Constitution allows this jurisdiction to be given to the High Court; but it does not require it to be given. The Government propose to go beyond what is contemplated by the Constitution, and they provide for the establishment of a Court with such a wide jurisdiction that it would practically be necessary to set up a number of Courts in each of the States, although a much less expensive arrangement could be made to meet the needs of the public. I am very strongly opposed to the Government proposal, because of the expense which it will involve, and because I know how necessary it is that we should be careful not to increase the burdens of the people more than we can help. If the clause is not struck out, instead of five Judges being able to do the work which will be required of the Court, at least fifteen Judges will be necessary. I have risen to enter my protest against this attempt on the part of the Government to increase the expenditure of the Commonwealth. I feel sure that they are asking us to embark upon an undertaking which will involve us in an expense which they themselves do not anticipate, whereas a simple and inexpensive court might be created which would meet all the requirements of litigants, and would safeguard the interests of the Commonwealth, the States, and the people.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I have listened with some interest to the discussion upon this important proposal. I did not intend to join in the debate, because to my mind the question is one upon which legal minds should best advise us, but, having listened to the speeches which have been delivered by the legal members of the Committee, I find them so contradictory—as lawyers often are—that I feel in great danger of being led astray altogether. I have, therefore, endeavoured to sift the arguments on both sides, and I find that, while some are afraid that the proposed High Court will have so much work that three times the number of Judges proposed will be unable to cope with it, others oppose the Bill, because they believe that the Court will not have any work to do. It will be a good thing for Australia when the Courts have no work. I believe that instead of our having to increase the number of Judges in the future, the work of the Courts will decrease, because the people will trouble the lawyers less and less as they become more intelligent. So far as I can understand, it is generally admitted by honorable members on both sides that the Constitution demands the establishment of the High Court, but they say that the present time is not opportune. Pursuing their line of argument still further, we find that the whole question resolves itself into one of saving a few pounds. It is hinted that public opinion generally is in accord with that opinion which seems to be manufactured in the city of Melbourne. Some one has said that public opinion is opposed to an increase in the expenditure of the Commonwealth, and the poor unfortunate taxpayer has been dragged into the matter in much the same way that the poor widow used to be pathetically presented to us during the Tariff debate. Honorable members know perfectly well that the taxpayer will not benefit to the extent of one farthing if we refrain from establishing the High Court, and that, on the other hand, he will not pay one farthing more if we carry out the Government proposal. There are considerations of much more importance than those connected with expense. I have listened carefully in order to ascertain how long honorable and learned members consider it necessary for us to wait before establishing the High Court, and I gather that most of them hold the view that we should not be able to get along without it for any great length of time. I cannot help thinking that the mixing up of the time limit with the question of spending a few pounds and the so-called expressions of public opinion will lead to a confusion of ideas. The half-dozen men who have been expressing their views before public meetings in Melbourne, in such a way as to exhibit their utter ignorance, do not represent public opinion, nor do those irresponsible persons who write letters to the newspapers occupy any representative position. If these gentlemen who make so much of the cry for economy desire to represent the real trend of public opinion, why do they not quote the resolutions of the Political Labour Council or of the Trades and Labour Council—bodies which represent perhaps 60,000 or 70,000 electors? They should not quote the ideas of a few men who, like the three tailors of Tooley-street, think they can run the country. Even some of the opponents of the measure admit that only a year or two can elapse before we shall have to create the High Court, which, according to the Constitution, we should bring into existence without delay. I believe that the Government proposals are being opposed by an interested press, because the Federal Parliament has shown itself too democratic for some people who do not like the work which it has done, and who, therefore, would like to prevent it from passing further legislation. The opposition which has come from this quarter has made me feel the more satisfied to cast my vote in favour of the measure. I do not regard a few men in Melbourne, or the editor of a newspaper, who writes articles to order, as representing public opinion. There are principles more important than money, and there are some things which money cannot buy, and I shall vote for the establishment of the High Court because I fear that something disastrous to the future of the Commonwealth may happen if we leave the interpretation of our Constitution to those who cannot know much about our aspirations, conditions, ideas, or sentiments. I am not prepared to run the risk of submitting the interpretation of our Constitution to the Privy Council, which may lay down a precedent binding upon us for all time. It appears very much as if some honorable members were willing to sacrifice the interests of the people of the Commonwealth for the sake of a few thousands of pounds. In considering a matter of this kind, those who object to give effect to the clearly expressed wish of the people, because of the small expense that may be involved, are taking the very lowest possible ground. The people of Victoria who are now clamouring against the carrying out of the provisions of the Constitution, were those who were the most anxious to have federation accomplished. Some of us in New South Wales voted against the Constitution, but now that it has been adopted we are prepared to throw our weight in with the majority in order to see that its provisions are faithfully fulfilled. If the people of Victoria voted in ignorance of the cost of federation, they will now learn a lesson which should prove of use to them in the future. Have those honorable members who are objecting to the establishment of the High Court on the ground of expense considered that if we throw the whole of the Federal work upon the States Courts we shall be expected to pay for it? Is there not a strong tendency on the part of the States Governments to require the Federal authorities to pay for services rendered by their officials to the Commonwealth? If they adopt a similar attitude with regard to the Courts, where will be the saving? We should not for the sake of a few pounds abstain from carrying out the expressed will of the people as embodied in the Constitution approved by them. We know very well that there are a number of cases awaiting the decision of the High Court, and there is every prospect of many others of great importance arising in the near future. We shall be called upon to consider a proposal for the establishment of an Arbitration Court, and if that tribunal is created, we shall very probably have to call upon the High Court to define its jurisdiction. It may not suit the purposes of the Employers Federation to have the High Court and the Arbitration Court established, but it will suit the people who desire to see more peaceable methods adopted for settling trade disputes. Although we have had a great deal of assistance from the States, I do not think our experience enables us to say that we can get along very well without having our own departments under direct Federal control, and this applies with as much force to the Judiciary as to any other Department. I shall support the Government proposal for the appointment of the five Judges, and I am also in favour of conferring upon them original jurisdiction. I hope honorable members will very earnestly consider the serious effects that may follow any postponement of the appointment of the High Court. It is true that the Constitution adopted by the people provided for the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council, but because we have not been able to secure all we want there is no reason why we should not obtain all we can. I think we should establish a High Court, if only for the purpose of interpreting our Constitution.

Mr. A. PATERSON (Capricornia).—I do not intend to prolong the agony by indulging in a second reading speech under cover of this clause. Upon the motion for the second reading of the Bill, after a fair fight, we have been handsomely beaten, and we have taken our gruel like men. I strongly object, however, to taking another dose of gruel, and that is the position which I occupy at present. Oliver Wendell Holmes says it is a special virtue in a sporting man when he is in luck to crow gently, and when he is beaten to own up, pay up, and shut up. Fortunately, we have another chance upon the present occasion. The Government have successfully "bullocked" through the second reading of the Bill, and now find themselves in an "angel" of a fix to provide work for the Judges. What is the expedient which they propose to adopt in this connexion? It is nothing more or less than an attempt to divert the legal business of the country from its natural channels to the High Court. They wish to dam back the current of litigation until it rises to the altitude of the High Court. I think that the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne showed very clearly the absurdity of passing the doors of the States Courts in order to take litigation to the higher Court. I am thoroughly of his opinion that it is a stupid thing to do. I cannot see any object in adopting that expedient, unless it be to provide new billets and new officials under the Government. If the Government intend to force litigants into the High Court, why do they not go a step further and issue coupons to all suitors before that tribunal entitling them to a pound of tea weekly, for the term of their natural lives. The proposal is utterly ridiculous. Merchants and business people do not usually adopt such practices, nor do large corporations. Can honorable members imagine the Harbor Trust saying to the people that they have found the straight cut to Port Philip which has been made at an enormous expense is of very little use to them and that they proposed to construct a new canal by way of Bacchus Marsh or Warrenheip to the Bay. Such a proposal would resemble the methods of the Government in connexion with this Bill. It is altogether beyond a joke. As the Government carried the second reading of the Bill simply upon the contention that the establishment of the High Court was mandatory under the Constitution—a contention with which I thoroughly agreed—I do not think that we ought to give them one ounce more than the Constitution directs. What does the Constitution say? Section 75 refers to five matters upon which the High Court is to have original jurisdiction. It says—

The High Court shall have original jurisdiction, &c.

That is mandatory. But in section 76 the words used are —

The Parliament may make laws, &c.

Those words are optional. The same remark is applicable to sections 77 and 78. All these provisions show that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to confer original jurisdiction upon the High Court in the five matters mentioned in section 75, but in no others. Surely it is absurd to talk of investing the High Court with further power before it has even been constituted. Honorable members will recollect a scene in the "Merchant of Venice," in which Portia says—

Then take thy bond, take thou thy pound of flesh;

But, in the cutting it, if thou dost shed
One drop of Christian blood, thy lands and goods
Are, by the laws of Venice, confiscated Unto the State of Venice.

That is exactly the position which I assume in regard to this matter. I would concede to the Government all that is mandatory under the Constitution, but not a penny-weight more.

Mr. WILKS.—Does the honorable member mean to insinuate that the Government are Shylocks?

Mr. A. PATERSON.—No; and I have the highest respect for Jews. I think they are the noblest race God ever made. Honorable members have recently heard a good deal about that mysterious modern disease which has troubled all the world, called appendicitis. It cannot be cured by medicine. It can be removed only by the knife—by cutting the appendix off. I regard this clause as the appendix of the Bill, and will not be satisfied until it is removed. Under this provision we have to find some work for the Judges. We cannot pay them high salaries for doing nothing, and as a way out of the difficulty I would recommend that we form the High Court into a Court of Arches. A Court of Arches is used for the purpose of debating spiritual causes. It may be said that we have no established church, and that no ecclesiastical disputes will arise, but I am sure that the Attorney-General and the Prime Minister are ingenious enough to find something to connect cases under, say, Customs administration with spiritual causes. Some mention has been made of the opposition to this clause having been prompted by party motives. I am quite sure that the Attorney-General will acquit me of being influenced in this matter by any such motives. My vote upon the measure will be cast in the direction which I conceive to be best in the public interest, and no blandishments will affect me. I simply desire to see justice done.

Mr. SAWERS (New England).—As I was absent from the House during the second-reading debate upon this Bill, I desire to say that I am quite in sympathy with those who are in opposition to the clause under discussion. At the same time, I cannot avoid expressing my amazement that the second reading of the measure should have been imperilled. If ever there was a question which I thought would receive the almost unanimous approval of Parliament it was the proposal to establish a High Court. The statement which was made by the honorable member for Macquarie, that honorable members were justified in opposing the second reading of the Bill, simply because they are in antagonism to some of its details, is one which I never expected to emanate from any one possessed of parliamentary experience. I have always understood that the vote upon the second reading of any measure simply determines whether its introduction is necessary. It is left to honorable members to arrange the details of Bills in Committee. I should have no sense of parliamentary duty if I had voted against the second reading of the Bill simply because I was opposed to this clause.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The honorable member is very young in politics.

Mr. SAWERS.—I hope that I shall always remain young. Upon a question of this kind I was quite prepared to trust the legal members of this House. But I find that they are absolutely opposed to each other. For example, the Attorney-General is opposed to the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and the honorable and learned member for Indi to the honorable and learned member for Bendigo. Similarly, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne entertains one view and the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs another. When we find the legal members of the House so diametrically opposed to each other, the ordinary layman is forced to bring his own common sense to bear. I think that every one will admit that the establishment of a High Court is obligatory under the Constitution. The obligation to establish a High Court is even stronger than the obligation to establish a Federal capital; yet the honorable members for New South Wales will use very different arguments in regard to the latter matter. What will these honorable members say when they hear Victorian members observe—"Yes, we admit the obligation to establish a Federal capital, but there is no hurry." In the Constitution a contract was entered into by the various States for the establishment of a High Court, and even if only one State asked that such a Court should be provided, and the other five States were against the proposal, the request would have to be granted. The citizens of Australia voted for the Constitution in which the promise of a High Court was embodied; and if such a Court is not established, they will feel that they have been falsely dealt with. The question before us now is that of the restriction of the jurisdiction of the High Court. I listened with great attention to the speech of the Attorney-General, and one argument of his struck me very forcibly. That argument was that there would be Federal Judges throughout Australia, and that a litigant in any part would have the choice of the Court to which he preferred to go—the State Court or a Federal Court. But if that should prove to be the case, it will not be a question of three or five Judges, but a question of eight or nine Judges, in order to deal with the enormous amount of work which will be provided throughout this great continent. I shrink, as other honorable members shrink, from adding unnecessary burdens on the people, and I give my full assent to such restriction of the powers of the Court as will be carried out by the rejection of this clause. It had been my intention to vote for sub-clause (a), and reject the other sub-clauses; but as the Attorney-General has already carried the rejection of sub-clause (c), I am debarred by the rules of the House from taking that step. I call the attention of the Attorney-General, however, to sub-clause (a), which refers to questions arising under the Constitution or involving its interpretation. I hope that the Attorney-General, if the Committee do reject this proposal, will be able to tell us that the Bill will not be passed without its being specified that the Federal Court alone shall have the power to interpret the Constitution.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—On appeal, certainly.

Mr. SAWERS.—I am not satisfied with that, because I would allow no State Court to interpret the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unless we pass sub-clause (a) the High Court will not be able to deal with such cases except on appeal. Sub-clause (a) must be passed to begin with, and then a further sub-clause added, if we wish to make the jurisdiction exclusive. All that sub-clause (a) does is to allow the Judges of the High Court to deal with questions arising out of the Constitution or its interpretation.

Mr. SAWERS.—The Attorney-General has cut a plank from underneath his feet by securing the rejection of sub-clause (c). Had we allowed that sub-clause to remain until the end of the discussion, I should have been ready to move that sub-clauses (b) (c) and (d) be rejected, while retaining sub-clause (a). Of course, the Attorney-General may recommit the Bill before it is finally dealt with, and embody in it sub-clause (a). There will be appeals, no doubt, but, as I say, I should not give the States Courts the right to interpret the Constitution. I think the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was an excellent one if, as it seems, the motive for objecting to this clause is to curtail the work of the Federal Judges, and to keep their number down to three at the start. It is quite manifest that the members of an Appeal Court of three Judges cannot travel all over Australia to hear all sorts of appeals. If a litigant goes before a single State Judge, and is not satisfied with the judgment, he ought to be permitted to appeal to the State Full Court, which will sit in the same building and decide the matter in a very short time, instead of keeping him waiting, perhaps, for months. We often seem to forget that we are not dealing with a single State, but with a vast continent, and that it is impossible for the people to go to this Appeal Court on minor cases from all parts of Australia. My object is to keep the number of Judges as low as possible, though at the same time I should be prepared to vote for any number which is deemed necessary. I can only hope, however, that the Government will see their way to be content with three Judges until it is proved that more are absolutely indispensable.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—After several days of discussion not much more remains to be said, and I had not intended to speak but for the inquiry of the honorable member for Dalley as to what was the matter with the labour corner. So far as I am concerned, I am wholly and solely with the Government on this Bill, simply because everybody who is opposed to me in the political world is against it. I listened with great interest to the speech of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, on the irrigation question, and it would appear that there is a desire in Victoria to stop the water from flowing to South Australia. I mention this in order that I may illustrate my argument by saying that the political opponents to whom I refer are much in the same position as the people of Victoria; and when they want to "stop the water from running" I cannot help thinking that there is something "crooked" in the business. We have heard a great deal about economy, and the honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley, has, in figurative language, shown why economy is preached here. That honorable member, in a story about an American telegraph master and a dog, put the position very neatly: ever since the tail of the economical dog has been squeezed in Collins-street, that animal has been barking in this House.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! The honorable member must not apply an illustration of that kind.

Mr. PAGE.—I maintain that the people of Australia have not spoken against the Bill. The editor of the Argus and the editor of the Age are not the public of Australia, nor are the members of the Employers' Federation, or the Citizens' "deformed" League; they are the friends of only a section of the community. Yesterday morning I heard two gentlemen in the street talking about the High Court Bill, and one of them said—"The Bill is cooked: Meudell has spoken." I do not know who Meudell is; but, from all I hear, his figures are in a terrible muddle. What did the honorable members who are opposing this Bill on the score of economy do when it was proposed to give a salary of £10,000 per annum to the Governor-General? They voted for the proposal "as solid as a brick wall."

Mr. WILKS.—Not all of them.

Mr. PAGE.—Only four or five honorable members stood out against the proposal. That money had to come out of exactly the same pockets as the money for the High Court, and I can tell the New South Wales members that the little crowd on the Government cross benches will treat the capital site proposals in the same way that they are treating this Bill.

Mr. CONROY.—Surely the honorable member does not propose that we should sell our ideas.

Mr. PAGE.—Your ideas? Where are they? They are like the four cardinal points of heaven—"all over the shop." I have heard talk about an "unholy alliance" with the labour party, but what about the "unholy alliance" between the Opposition and the Government "rats"?

The CHAIRMAN.—I must ask the honorable member not to apply such a term to any honorable members.

Mr. PAGE.—I am not talking about any individual member, but about honorable members politically. The same arguments now being used against the Bill were used against federation; but I read in one of the speeches of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo—a speech which I read with greater interest than I have felt in the utterance of any other public man—that we were to have purity, not only in politics, but in a Federal High Court. Every one who voted for the Federal Constitution knew that a High Court formed a part of it, and it is no use their now saying that they "did not know it was loaded." It was for the people to accept or reject the Constitution, and I for one took the advice then given by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and voted for federation. If we are to have the Constitution interpreted, let it be interpreted by our own High Court; and whether that High Court be large or small, depends on the will of the Committee. To talk about the necessity of saving £30,000 is to draw a red herring across the trail, because when the Estimates come before us honorable members will be ready to vote away millions of pounds in a night. The fact is that a large number of people outside are beginning to howl, and I am sorry that the majority of the howlers are free-traders. Since they cannot prod the House on the Tariff question, they are beginning to use something else.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—What about the Age?

Mr. PAGE.—We have the Age and the Argus together. That is another unholy alliance. It has been said that the price which the labour party are to receive for their support of this measure is the Arbitration Bill. But had the labour party anything to do with the framing of the Constitution, which makes the establishment of a High Court necessary? I think it is a very lucky thing from the point of view of many that there were no labour members in the Convention.

But we are bound to carry out the provisions of the Constitution, and I shall always be ready to support the Government in any action of which I have expressed my approval before my constituents. I should be a cur if I refused to give a helping hand to the erection of the machinery which is to give my constituents what they want. Undoubtedly an Arbitration Court will be established soon. That is as certain as it is that the sun melts snow. If there is to be an appeal from the decisions of that Court, who is to decide the question? I think that such an appeal should lie only to the High Court, and for these reasons, and for many others which I have not stated, I intend to help the Government over the ditch on this occasion.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I do not think the honorable member for Maranoa quite understands the question which we are debating. What the Committee are considering is whether we should give to the High Court the original jurisdiction provided for by this clause. One reason for not doing so is that which has been stated by many honorable members, that five Judges would not be enough for the work of a court with such an extensive jurisdiction. At the very least, from fifteen to twenty would be required, and to make the Court accessible to the great mass of the people, we should need nearly 100. I can understand honorable members taking the view that it is better to have five than to have three Judges on the Bench of an Appellate Court; that is a question on which there might easily be a difference of opinion, though I consider that three Justices would be sufficient. But we, who oppose the clause, do so because it confers such a wide jurisdiction upon the High Court, that five Judges would not be enough for the work to be done. That view is taken by a great many other legal members of the Committee besides myself. Furthermore, we know that to bring justice in the matters referred to the Court within the reach of the masses of the people, we should have to appoint many more inferior Judges, because it is of no use to establish a court, unless it is accessible to the poorer classes of the community. If the expense of appealing to a Court is so great that many persons cannot afford to appeal to it, justice is absolutely denied to them. But where is the expense to the Commonwealth to end? Surely we are entitled to ask that question.

Mr. SPENCE.—If the work has to be done, it must be paid for.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes; but it can continue to be done by the States Courts. But if jurisdiction in Federal matters is not given to the inferior States Courts, we shall have to appoint inferior Federal Courts to bring justice within reach of the people. One of the reasons for Judges going on circuit, is to make the Courts accessible to the people, although the arrangement is a very expensive one. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo has shown that in Victoria it costs £11,000 a year for one Judge alone. But if the Court sat only in Melbourne, the expense of bringing witnesses here from other parts of the State would be so great that litigants could not afford to bring their cases before it. What we object to is this: The Ministry, seeing that the work of a Federal Appeal Court could not be much, have given to that Court a wide original jurisdiction, and to satisfactorily exercise that jurisdiction a great many more Judges would be required than the number provided for. Of course, if the Constitution is mandatory on the point, we must obey it; but I say that it is not. Section 71 provides that the judicial powers of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, but if the framers of the Constitution—many of whom were lawyers—had wished to make the provision mandatory, they would have said “A Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, shall be created, and the judicial power shall be vested in it.” All that the Constitution says is that when the Federal Court is created the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in it. If we create only an appellate court, we shall avoid the necessity of doubling our legal machinery, and thus of creating unnecessary expense. If the clause stands, no one can say where the expense will end. We propose to strictly limit the jurisdiction of the High Court in the first instance. Then after two or three years, Parliament can, if it thinks the experience which has been gained warrants it in doing so, extend the jurisdiction of the Court, and appoint additional Judges. I hope that the clause will be omitted.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Attorney-General).—I shall not detain the Committee very long, but it is my duty to point out for the benefit of those who have not been present during the whole of the discussion, that the intention of the clause is not to confer upon the High Court exclusively, as some believe, the extra original jurisdiction with which it deals; it simply permits the High Court to deal, both as a court of original jurisdiction and as a court of appeal, with the particular classes of subjects mentioned in it. That is the whole substance of the clause.

Mr. GLYNN.—What about clause 40?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are not now dealing with clause 40. We must consider that clause on its merits.

Mr. GLYNN.—The two must be taken as a whole.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; but clause 40 has no relation to this clause, although this clause, if it is passed, will have relation to clause 40. Obviously the Committee is against me in this matter, and the honorable member for New England was correct in stating that, by moving the omission of paragraph (c), I have prevented the consideration of the most important paragraph in the clause, though not that under which the greatest amount of business would arise. If the High Court is entitled to exercise original jurisdiction of any kind, it is entitled to deal as a court of first instance with cases arising under the Constitution or involving its interpretation. A strong argument can be presented in favour of the retention of each of these paragraphs, and undoubtedly the strongest argument can be advanced in favour of the retention of that to which I refer, and I think that a number of those who are opposed to the clause will, on further consideration, see reasons for reinstating it.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Will the Attorney-General cite a case which would come under it?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Cases cannot be enumerated by any other classification than that in the clause. A question affecting the Constitution may arise in any class of civil cases. All that the clause does is, not to coerce, but merely to throw the door of the High Court open to litigants who desire to enter it as a court of first instance before going to it, if they go to it again, as a court of appeal.

Mr. GLYNN.—Would it not weaken the High Court as a court of appeal, to allow one of its Judges to decide a matter, sitting as a court of first instance?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not think so. If one Judge sat as a court of first instance, we should still have two to sit as a court of appeal, supposing three Judges are appointed, or four, supposing five judges are appointed. But as I realize that the Committee is against me, I propose to allow the clause to be struck out on the voices, and later on to re-introduce paragraph (a), when I earnestly trust that favorable consideration will be given to the proposal to vest in the High Court an original jurisdiction in regard to cases arising under the Constitution, or involving its interpretation.

Clause negatived.

Clauses 32 and 33 agreed to.

Clause 34 (Mandamus — Prohibition — Ouster of office).

Amendment (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the following new paragraph be added—
“(c) Of habeas corpus.”

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I think that some of the paragraphs require explanation. I should like to know why it is necessary to insert paragraph (b), which enables the High Court to make orders, or direct the issue of writs requiring any court, not being the Supreme Court of a State, to abstain from the exercise of any pretended or asserted Federal jurisdiction. The “asserted” jurisdiction may belong to the Courts, and the word “pretended” is an extraordinary one to use in regard to jurisdiction. Why not use the words “any jurisdiction with which it is not invested,” or “any jurisdiction which it does not possess?”

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have followed the terms used in the American Act, but I will consider the phraseology.

Mr. GLYNN.—I understand this clause gives power to the Court to issue a mandamus to an officer of the Commonwealth. Is that the reason why the honorable the Attorney-General, in the amendment in another clause of which he has given notice, does not include such a provision?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I should like the Attorney-General to say to whom the writs of habeas corpus are to be directed. The paragraphs at present in the clause indicate very clearly to whom the other writs are to be directed. Is it to be inferred that the High Court will be able to interfere with the jurisdiction of States Courts under State laws, or will their power be restricted to cases in which a man is arrested under the Federal law?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The writs will relate only to matters of Federal jurisdiction, because the High Court cannot interfere in matters of States jurisdiction.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—It is very confusing for honorable members to be called upon to consider these clauses, in view of the elimination of clause 31. We cannot know how far it will be necessary, under the altered circumstances, to limit or extend the powers now provided for in the Bill, and it would be well for the Attorney-General to withdraw the Bill for the present, and have it re-drafted.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall, if necessary, re-commit any provisions which may not be in accordance with amendments made in other parts of the Bill.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—In regard to paragraph (b), I believe that the Supreme Court of the United States has power to issue a prohibition directed against a State Court. In the United States, however, the States Courts have no Federal jurisdiction, and there is no appeal from their decision, so that, if the Supreme Court could not intervene by way of prohibition, there would be no means of correcting the wrongful exercise of jurisdiction. We, however, have the Privy Council to which we can appeal from the decisions of all the States Courts, and I believe the Privy Council has always refused to issue a prohibition directed against a Colonial Court on the ground that the remedy lies by way of appeal. Therefore, I think, that paragraph (b) has been wrongly inserted.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The provision was inserted for greater security.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 35 agreed to.

Clause 36—

The appellate jurisdiction of the High Court with respect to judgments of the Supreme Court of a State, or of any other court of a State from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lay to the King in Council, shall extend to the following judgments and to no others, namely:

(a) Every judgment, whether final or interlocutory, which—

1. is given or pronounced for or in respect of any sum or matter at issue amounting to or of the value of £300; or

2. involves directly or indirectly any claim, demand, or question, to or respecting any property or any civil right amounting to or of the value of £300; or

3. affects the status of any person under the laws relating to aliens, marriage, divorce, bankruptcy, or insolvency;

but so that an appeal shall not be brought in the case of an interlocutory judgment except by leave of the High Court:

(b) Any judgment, whether final or interlocutory, and whether in a civil or criminal matter, with respect to which the High Court thinks fit to give special leave to appeal:

including any such judgment which has been given or made before the commencement of this Act, and as to which:—

1. leave to appeal to the King in Council might at the commencement of this Act be granted by the Court appealed from; or

2. leave to appeal to the King in Council has before the commencement of this Act been granted by the Court appealed from, and up to the commencement of this Act the conditions of appeal have been complied with within the periods limited; or

3. a petition for special leave to appeal to the King in Council has been lodged and is pending at the commencement of this Act.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—This is a comprehensive clause, regarding which the Attorney-General might give us some explanation. I understand that even existing appeals are affected.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Existing appeals will be affected if they have not been actually set down for hearing by the Privy Council. This is the chief of the clauses which confer appellate jurisdiction, and honorable members will find in paragraphs (a) and (b) two matters well worthy of their consideration. Whereas the appealable amount in every State except Tasmania is £500, we have lowered the required sum to £300. In sub-paragraph 3 of paragraph (a) we have introduced the power of appeal even when £300 is not involved, provided that the status of a person is in question, under the laws which this Parliament has the power to make relating to aliens, marriage, divorce, bankruptcy, or insolvency. Then in the latter part of the clause, honorable members will find a provision which will enable appeals that are now pending to the King in Council, and which have not yet been listed, to be taken to the High Court. This would not deprive the parties of the right of appeal to the Privy Council, but might enable us in some cases, in which the Commonwealth is a party, to take them before the High Court if necessary. It would also give the other parties a similar option.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the latter portion of the clause apply to paragraphs (a) and (b)?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; although I believe it applies nominally only to paragraph (a).

Mr. McCAY.—As a matter of grammar it might be interpreted as applying to (b) only.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will look into the matter.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I am not quite sure that this clause does not contain a provision that is ultra vires of our powers. In section 73 of the Constitution there is a provision that the High Court shall have jurisdiction, "with such exceptions, and subject to such regulations as the Parliament prescribes, to hear appeals." It also provides—

But no exception or regulation prescribed by the Parliament shall prevent the High Court from hearing and determining any appeal from the Supreme Court of a State in any matter in which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lies from such Supreme Court to the Queen in Council.

In other words, while the Parliament may prescribe regulations and exceptions regarding any appellate jurisdiction that it confers upon the High Court, it has no power in relation to appeals which, at the establishment of the Commonwealth, lay from the Supreme Courts to the Privy Council. The honorable gentleman proposes to insert a provision which declares that there shall be no appeal where the amount involved is not more than £300.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Is not a limitation of £500 imposed by the various States in regard to appeals to the Privy Council?

Mr. GLYNN.—I cannot recall the conditions which obtain in all the States, but I know that they are not similar. My point, however, is that we cannot prescribe any limitation. It is for the States to do that. In effect this clause declares that there shall be no appeal to the High Court in cases in which the amount involved is less than £300.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It is fixed by an Order in Council.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes; and with an Order in Council we have nothing to do. If there is a prescription in an Order in Council which is applicable to a particular

State, that is the State law, with which we cannot interfere.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Why not?

Mr. GLYNN.—Because we have no power to do so. We are asked to insert a provision which amounts to a limitation, although it is affirmatively expressed. Does not the affirmation of any proposition include the negation of its opposite? We have no right to insert any such limitation in this clause.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The point raised by the honorable and learned member for South Australia is one of interest. As the author of this particular clause, I am impressed with any reading which he may have to offer, but to me its words seem to impose only one restriction upon this Parliament—a restriction against the insertion of any restriction. We do not impose any restriction, but we find that one has been imposed under an Order in Council. That restriction is that the amount involved must not be less than £500. We do not propose to increase that restriction but to decrease it. As I understand the Constitution, we cannot increase the restriction imposed so as to make it more difficult to appeal from the Supreme Court of a State to the High Court than it was, at the time of the passing of this Bill, to appeal from the Supreme Court of a State to the Queen in Council. As long as we remove restrictions, instead of imposing them, it seems to me that we are acting within the powers conferred by section 73 of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I understand that clause 35 which has been passed relates merely to appeals from Justices of the High Court, and from the Supreme Courts as courts of first instance. But I apprehend that the clause under discussion is meant to apply to appeals in matters of Federal jurisdiction or otherwise?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Then the object of this clause is to define the limitations of the power of appeal—whether in Federal matters or not—from the decision of the Supreme Court of a State. May I therefore ask the Attorney-General if he has considered whether this provision confers upon the High Court—as it ought—a clear right to hear appeals from the Full Court of a State? It declares—

The appellate jurisdiction of the High Court with respect to judgments of the Supreme Court of a State, or of any other court of a State, from which, at the establishment of the Commonwealth, an appeal lay to the Queen in Council, shall extend, &c.

It was certainly the intention of the framers of the Constitution to give the High Court the right to hear ordinary appeals from the Full Court. In our ordinary practice a Judge of the Supreme Court first decides any case which comes before him. Then if a litigant is dissatisfied he appeals to the Full Court. If defeated there, he can, at present, appeal to the Privy Council. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was to give the High Court the right to deal with those cases which would otherwise have gone to the Privy Council. I apprehend that the Attorney-General has no idea of robbing the Full Court of its right to deal with appeals in the first instance; and I merely wish him to consider whether under this clause he has secured to the High Court a right to deal with appeals from the Full Courts. The Supreme Court of a State has been taken to mean only one Judge.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It may mean one or more.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In framing section 73 of the Constitution the Judiciary Committee intended to cover, by the general words which are there used, an appeal not merely from a Judge in the first instance, but from the Full Court. I agree that technically the Supreme Court is the Full Court.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I think that the point which has been raised by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne is a very important one, but it is not within our power to take away from the Supreme Courts, however they may be constituted, the right of appeal to the High Court. Amongst the appellate powers conferred upon the High Court by sub-section (2) of section 73 of the Constitution is the power to hear appeals from the Supreme Court of any State. It does not matter whether the Court is composed of one Judge only, or two or three Judges: it is the judgment of the Supreme Court. There may be internal arrangements, according to the State laws, as to how the Supreme Court jurisdiction shall be exercised. If a litigant obtains a judgment from the Supreme Court of a State irrespective of whether that tribunal consists of one Judge or six Judges, it seems to me that such judgment clearly comes within the scope of section 73 of the Constitution. Nothing we can do can derogate from that.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But for the sake of clearness, I think that when we speak of appeals from the Supreme Court we ought to say "Full Court."

Mr. ISAACS.—Clause 36 does not purport to give any appellate jurisdiction. It assumes that appellate jurisdiction is conferred by the Constitution. It then proceeds to exercise restrictive powers, and to say that the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court with respect to the judgments of the Supreme Courts—plainly referring, it seems to me, to the jurisdiction already existing under the Constitution—shall extend to certain judgments and to no other. That is an exercise, not of enabling powers, but of the restrictive powers conferred by the Constitution. Therefore, it seems to me that the words "Supreme Court of a State" must be interpreted to mean what they undoubtedly mean in section 73 of the Constitution.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I would ask the Attorney-General if this provision does not infringe the provisions of section 73 of the Constitution?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It merely enlarges the power of appeal from the Supreme Courts of the States to the High Court.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—There is one point to which I should like to call the attention of the Attorney-General. It is contained in sub-clause (a), and it may require considering from the aspect indicated by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn. The concluding lines of sub-clause (a) are—

... but so that an appeal shall not be brought in the case of an interlocutory judgment except by leave of the High Court.

That may mean that, even although the Supreme Court of a State granted leave to appeal upon an interlocutory judgment, it would not lie. There is a provision in the Order in Council, which existed at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, by which the Supreme Court may grant leave to appeal from an interlocutory judgment, and I am afraid that these words might be read as taking that power away.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am inclined to think, in the light of the illustration just given, that we may possibly have transgressed here, and I shall reconsider the matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 37 and 38 agreed to.

Clause 39—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be exercised by Federal Courts, or by Courts of the States which are by the law of the Commonwealth invested with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Unless this clause is modified, I think it will absolutely confer original jurisdiction on the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. It is only a general declaration to bring the whole judicial power of the Commonwealth conferred by the Constitution into effect in this measure.

Mr. GLYNN.—Quite so; and that is why I say that the clause ought to be modified. The principle of the drafting of this Bill may be very good, but it is very puzzling, because we confer powers, and then proceed to limit and cross-limit them. We must watch a clause like this, because it is very general, and unless one understands the subsequent limitation, we are puzzled to know to what extent powers are conferred. This clause confers all the powers, original and appellate, on all the Federal Courts; but there is only one court under the Bill, namely, the High Court, though others may be created subsequently.

Mr. ISAACS.—This clause is only declaratory of the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is all.

Mr. GLYNN.—Then why is the clause put in, seeing there is only one Court in the Bill, the High Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—But hereafter other courts may be created by Act of Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN.—What the Constitution declares is that judicial power shall be vested in the Federal Supreme Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—And in such other Federal Courts as may be created.

Mr. GLYNN.—But there are no other Federal Courts, so the High Court must be meant. Does the clause include original as well as appellate jurisdiction? I merely draw attention to this matter so that by this clause we may not be giving that original jurisdiction which, by a previous decision, we have taken away.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The clause does not confer any further powers.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I desire to call attention to the words "shall be exercised by Federal Courts." I do not know what other courts are referred to, because at the present time there is only the High Court created by the Constitution, and no others are proposed in the Bill. The word "which" may refer to the Federal Courts as well as to the Courts of the States; and I see no meaning in the clause, nor necessity for it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member should look at section 71 of the Constitution.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But we are not creating other courts, and so far as the judicial power vested in the High Court is concerned, it is vested by the Constitution, and this Bill adds nothing to it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The clause is simply declaratory.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Then what is the use of dragging in the expression "Federal Courts," when there are no other courts in existence? The clause is confusing and unnecessary.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—It seems to me that a High Court, when constituted, can exercise original jurisdiction without any declaration in this Bill. If this Bill, as an Act, comes before a court, especially before the High Court, for interpretation, the Judge, in the absence of the words "be it declared," or any sign of its being declaratory, will ask what is the meaning of the words. Judges, as we know, try to give a meaning to everything in an Act, but even they fail sometimes. Clause 31 is at present out of the Bill, and if the Bill be finally passed without it, the Judge may say—"Here is a clause not vesting jurisdiction, but declaring that the Court should exercise the judicial power of the Commonwealth, which includes the optional original jurisdiction under section 76." This clause would have been in entire harmony with clause 31.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is no occasion for the words in the clause.

Mr. McCAY.—And I am afraid that the words may be interpreted as having the meaning of clause 31.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is not possible.

Mr. McCAY.—Section 71, leaving out irrelevant words, provides that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the High Court and in such other courts as are invested with Federal jurisdiction. Section 75 of the Constitution provides that in certain matters the High Court shall have original jurisdiction, while section 76 says that Parliament may make laws conferring original jurisdiction on the High Court. It is even possible to interpret clause 39 as a declaration that Parliament is conferring original jurisdiction which must be exercised by some body, namely, the Federal Court, created in pursuance of the Constitution. I do not say that we, who know what is intended, would interpret the clause in that way, but there is no knowing how it may be interpreted by those whom the Attorney-General knows from frequent experience take no notice of what is said in debates when they are construing an Act. At the best, the clause is a purely declaratory statement which has no validity, and at the worst, it is an enacting clause which may produce results we little anticipate at the present moment. As prudent men, it is not desirable for us to leave dubious words in the Bill under such circumstances.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I thoroughly agree with the arguments advanced by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Section 71 of the Constitution is clear, and if it is merely wished to give the powers therein contemplated, we should use the words of the section. But there is no necessity to do so, because the provision is already in the Constitution, and will be observed. There is no doubt that this clause might raise very serious debate as to whether the powers conferred on the courts in sections 75 and 76, not only as to original jurisdiction, but as to additional original jurisdiction, would not be vested in the Court. If the clause is merely in conformity with section 71 of the Constitution, there is no necessity for it; on the other hand, it may open up a wide door of doubt—so wide that, considering we have already secured the exclusion of clause 31, it should not be allowed to remain. If the clause be removed, no dispute can arise, and if it includes what is contemplated in sections 75 and 76 of the Constitution, or there is any likelihood of its doing so, it ought not to remain.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I do not think we ought to strike out the clause until the Attorney-General has had time to consider it with reference to the striking out of clause 31. It may be that there are reasons which we do not know at present for the retention of this clause. I agree with the honorable and learned member for Werriwa that the clause is either unnecessary or dangerous, but at the same time I suggest that if the Attorney-General will undertake to recommit it, the purpose will be answered.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am much obliged to honorable and learned members for the assistance they are giving me in this connexion. I only too readily welcome any suggestions, because it is impossible in a measure so vast and intricate as this to avoid some risks, which are certainly greatly diminished by the assistance which honorable and learned members can lend. It does not appear to be possible that the danger apprehended by the honorable and learned member for Corinella can arise, because in section 76 of the Constitution the optional jurisdiction we have the power to confer is named and defined. The only optional jurisdiction we can confer is that in the four sub-sections, and I do not think it can be contended that either any one or all of them together can be taken to be conferred on the High Court simply by a general declaratory clause of this kind.

Mr. McCAY.—Why not?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The object with which the clause was inserted was simply to make it clear that the Bill went as far as the Constitution—that whatever the Constitution conferred would be conferred by this measure. The High Court is created on the one side, and the Federal jurisdiction of the States Courts on the other. The clause meant to imply that, so far as they are concerned, it conveys the whole judicial power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Would it not be better to use the words, “until other Federal Courts are established”?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will consider that point.

Mr. McCAY.—The matters referred to in section 76 of the Constitution are within the judicial power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, when they are specially conferred, but not until then.

Mr. McCAY.—Could it not be provided that those general words are to be limited by the subject-matter to which they relate—the powers the Constitution gives them?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I recognise the assistance I have received, and will postpone the clause in order to reconsider it.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—Is it intended by the clause to also confer criminal jurisdiction?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not directly; only by association with other Acts.

Mr. ISAACS.—Clause 39 does not confer any jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; it confers judicial power, but not jurisdiction.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The remaining clauses dealing with criminal matters deal mostly with questions of criminal procedure, and I want to know if the Attorney-General would at a later stage give his opinion as to whether the Constitution confers criminal jurisdiction, or whether it will be necessary to invest the courts with that power only as each Act is passed.

Clause postponed.

Clause 40—

The jurisdiction of Federal Courts shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the several Courts of the States in the following matters:—

- (a) Matters arising under any treaty;
- (b) Matters affecting consuls, or other representatives of other countries, in respect of any act done by them in their capacity as such consuls or representatives;
- (c) Suits between States, or between persons suing or being sued on behalf of different States, or between a State and a person suing or being sued on behalf of another State;
- (d) Suits by the Commonwealth, or any person suing on behalf of the Commonwealth, against a State, or any person being sued on behalf of a State;
- (e) Suits against the Commonwealth;
- (f) Matters in which an order or writ is sought to be obtained against an officer of the Commonwealth in respect of some act done or omitted to be done by him in the execution of his duty.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I have tabled an amendment on this clause, to which I should like to direct the attention of the Committee. Of course I tabled it on the assumption that clause 31 was to be carried as it stood in the Bill, and I shall bear in mind that it has been dropped. The object of clause 40, as it stands, is to prevent the States Supreme Courts from dealing with matters which, by the Constitution, pertain to the original jurisdiction of the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Nearly all; not quite all.

Mr. HIGGINS.—With some modifications perhaps. The clause practically excludes the Supreme Courts of the States from dealing, for instance, with matters arising under any treaty, or a matter in which the Commonwealth is a party. Suppose an ordinary action against the Commonwealth by a public servant. There would, if this clause be passed, be no right for a Supreme Court to entertain it even if it were only an action to recover arrears of salary.

I wish to give the Supreme Courts of the States original jurisdiction not only in those matters which are referred to in the expunged clause 31—matters “arising under the Constitution or involving its interpretation,” or “arising under any laws made by the Parliament,” or “relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different States”—but also as to those matters as to which original jurisdiction is conferred on the High Court by the Constitution. Technically, I think there is no objection to there being, as to the matters referred to in section 75 of the Constitution, concurrent jurisdiction in the States Supreme Courts and the High Court. It is a mere question of expediency. I intend my amendment to have the effect of allowing litigants to have access by way of original jurisdiction to the court that is nearest to them in point of place or in point of time—whichever they think will give them the speediest redress. I had some experience four or five years ago as chairman of a Royal Commission for the reform of legal procedure.

Mr. McCAY.—Which has not been reformed.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It has in some respects. If I did not succeed in other matters, I succeeded in learning a lot; and one thing I learned was that there is nothing more important than to secure to people who are aggrieved quick remedies near at hand. It is with that view that I suggest that original jurisdiction should be given to the States Supreme Courts, even though ultimately perhaps the case would have to come before the High Court in one form or another if there be an appeal. Suppose, for instance, a case arising under the bankruptcy laws which we are to make, or a commercial case concerning an ordinary bill of exchange, or a case as to the custody of an infant where there is nothing more than family relations involved.

Mr. MAHON.—Why not give the County Courts jurisdiction?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I rather think that I should go as far as that; but I want if I can to prevent mixing up two issues at the same time. The present Bill reserves to the High Court jurisdiction in matters affected by section 75 of the Constitution. The High Court will consist of five Judges at most. The States Supreme Courts have 27 Judges. The States Judges, being more numerous, will be more accessible to people than the High Court will be for original purposes. There will be more of them to do the work; they are confined to a limited area; and therefore they will be able to deal more readily with applications that are made. It is in that view that I ask the Attorney-General to consider whether it is not well to confer as wide jurisdiction as possible upon the Supreme Courts of the States.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In cases such as the honorable and learned member mentions—bankruptcy cases, and so on—there is nothing to prevent those being considered by the States Courts.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I admit that the Bill provides in clause 41, with great limitations, power for the States Courts to consider those matters which I have mentioned—such matters as bankruptcy cases and bills of exchange cases. But in order to make the scheme dovetail, I have to refer to the whole subject covered by the amendment. I shall, of course, afterwards ask the Attorney-General to consider matters under clause 41. I think he might simplify clauses 40 and 41, which are hard to follow, by giving the States Supreme Courts original jurisdiction in the matters which now appear in clause 31, and also in those matters which are referred to as exclusive in clause 40.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The whole of them?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think so. I do not see any objection. For instance, why on earth should not suits against the Commonwealth be tried in the States Supreme Courts? It must be remembered that if at any time the States Supreme Courts should fail in dignity and strength, there is full power in this Bill to withdraw jurisdiction. The matter is not irremediable. Looking at the present condition of things throughout Australia, the courts being fairly well administered, I cannot see any harm in allowing the Supreme Courts of the States to entertain a suit against the Commonwealth or by the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No Australian State permits itself to be sued except in its own courts, and the Commonwealth is asked to submit to courts which are not its own.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But is not that objection rather technical? The Government of England would not allow itself to be sued in France; but we are speaking of Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The New South Wales Government would not allow itself to be sued in a Victorian Court.

Mr. HIGGINS. — We are speaking now of a federated Australia, and I do not see that any harm can be done. There is really no practical difficulty in the matter. If the Attorney-General is so wedded to a theory that he is to close his eyes to the existence of the States, and the State Attorney-General is to close his eyes to the existence of the Federation, I have nothing to say. I am quite sure that he simply desires to get a practical Bill—a Bill which will meet the needs of the people as nearly as he can, which will involve no extra expense, and which will leave to the High Court the original jurisdiction which has been given by the Constitution. The Committee has deprived the High Court of original jurisdiction as to the most numerous class of matters which may arise under Federal laws. But as it has not been given to the High Court it must be given to the Supreme Courts of the States. I consider that clause 41 is too restricted. I think that, having regard to what has been done to-night in regard to clause 31 we must extend clause 41. I would suggest that in place of clauses 40 and 41, we should have one clause. With that object in view, I move—

That all the words down to paragraph (a) be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the following words:—"The Supreme Court, in each of the States, shall have original jurisdiction in the following matters:—"

That is to say, in the matters which are mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (f) of clause 40.

Mr. ISAACS.—Subject to an appeal to the High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That will appear in another clause.

Mr. ISAACS.—It ought to be very distinctly stated in that clause.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If my honorable and learned friend will look at clause 41, he will see that it is provided for. With regard to appeals to the High Court we could have a separate clause.

Mr. McCAY.—Has the honorable and learned member considered whether paragraph (c) would confer upon Victoria the right to sue New South Wales in the Victorian Supreme Court?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I see no objection.

Mr. McCAY.—That is the one case where I do see a doubt.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I admit there may be a doubt. But I would treat the State as any defendant is treated. You would have to find out where he is, and sue him prima facie where he is. The ordinary rule as between jurisdictions is that you follow your defendant. We might fairly say that if a State Court is to entertain a suit against a State Government it must be in the State in which that State Government has jurisdiction. That is the only matter as to which I feel any doubt. At the end of the clause I propose to add the following words:—

- "(g) arising under the Constitution, or involving its interpretation;
- (h) arising under any laws made by Parliament;
- (i) of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;
- (j) relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different States."

There will be no objection to striking out admiralty and maritime jurisdiction if it is thought that it is already conferred, but I included the paragraph in order to exhaust the matter. It will be seen that I am not proposing to deprive the High Court of any jurisdiction which it has; to shear it of its dignity, importance, or value, such as it has. I should like to see the courts accessible to the people. I should like to see that a man injured in Adelaide is able to bring his action in Adelaide right off, without having to wait until the High Court shall come there, or without having to go to Bombala. The expense of dragging lawyers and witnesses about is a tremendous one. In our Commission report we went so far, even within the narrow limits of Victoria, as to recommend the diminution of the number of assize towns in order to avoid the expense of dragging witnesses and Judges about here and there. I think it is a good principle to follow. If you have a court with sufficient weight, by all means utilize it for the purpose of all the jurisdiction for which it can possibly be utilized. I should suggest, therefore, that as clause 31 has been omitted, there are still stronger reasons for adopting my proposal.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—It may be regarded as presumption, if not profanation, for a layman to intervene in this discussion. But when the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne spoke of the desirability of giving the Supreme Courts of the States concurrent jurisdiction with the High Court, it occurred to me that, as there is no one here to put in a word for the junior Bar I should do so. If the Supreme Court of a State is to have concurrent jurisdiction, I do not see why the county courts should not also have concurrent jurisdiction in the smaller matters mentioned by the honorable and learned member? Why should not the average police court lawyer also have a chance under the Bill; why should not the police courts have concurrent jurisdiction in small matters? Supposing that a man wishes to recover 40 shillings from the Commonwealth, why should he be required to go to the Supreme Court of the State to do so? Is there any reason why he should not be entitled to go to any petty debts court and sue for the debt there? I regret my inability to follow the intricate reasoning of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. But I heard him state, in a very emphatic way, that if the second reading of the Bill were carried, he would do his best to make the High Court the strongest Court in Australia. Will it make the High Court the strongest Court in Australia to give the other courts the same jurisdiction, and to lessen the business with which in the ordinary course it would deal? This new attitude does not seem to be quite consistent with the assurance of his second-reading speech.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It will not in the least weaken the High Court; it will simply bring convenience to the public.

Mr. MAHON.—In that case, why does not the honorable and learned member propose in his amendment to give jurisdiction to the county courts, small debts courts, and police courts?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I desire to deal with one question at a time. I admit that there is a great deal of force in saying that we ought in small matters to give jurisdiction to the police courts.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member will see that that is partly provided for in clause 41.

Mr. MAHON.—I am glad to hear that it is, because I feel that if we are to give the fullest facilities to the public, we ought to give concurrent jurisdiction to the courts all round. I should like, as a layman, to feel that I thoroughly understood the tortuous arguments of the legal members of the House.

Mr. ISAACS.—Do not say that.

Mr. MAHON.—Well, their reasoning is highly technical at any rate, and partakes of the atmosphere of courts, which I suppose agrees as slightly with other honorable members as with me. Except when absolutely necessary I have avoided courts of law, and am therefore not so familiar with legal forms as is desirable in those who have the privilege of making the laws which these courts interpret. And, speaking frankly, much as I appreciate the great talents and high character of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, I cannot wholly appreciate his attitude towards this measure. He belongs to a party, if I may be permitted to say so without offence, that desires to exclude every English commodity from this country; but apparently there is one thing that he is unwilling to exclude from it. We are to have everything Australian, with the solitary exception of Australian law. We are to have a branch stream of the great river of British justice coursing through the plains of Australia. That was the honorable and learned member's contention. In some respects the honorable and learned member recalls a famous countryman of his who advised his fellows to burn everything that came from England except its coals. He seems to me a trifle less consistent than Dean Swift, because, although he rejects everything else, he is still willing that Australia should go to Britain for finality in law. That may be a very good principle. I do not say that it is not; but it seems to me that if we can obtain good law from England we should be able to secure other good things from the same country.

Mr. McCAY.—Preferential trade, for example.

Mr. MAHON.—Doubtless when that matter comes up for consideration the honorable and learned member for Corinella will take the stand usually adopted, and see that the interests of Castlemaine are not overlooked.

Mr. McCAY.—Is that a fair taunt? Is it not rather small?

Mr. MAHON.—Possibly it is; I will not dispute that the honorable and learned member is an authority. I have not risen to throw any light upon this problem from a legal point of view; but I shall not vote for the amendment in default of evidence that it would be a benefit to the people, or unless the honorable and learned member is prepared to extend it so as to give jurisdiction to the smaller courts. If that were done, people in poor circumstances who desired to obtain redress might secure it at the least possible expense.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I desire to point out to the honorable member for Coolgardie that there are certain matters which, under the Constitution, are inseparably vested in the High Court, but in regard to which the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne contends the High Court should not have exclusive jurisdiction. He urged that in the ordinary course of legal business they might also be dealt with by the States Courts.

Mr. HIGGINS. — I must confess that I limited my proposal to the Supreme Courts of the States, but I have no objection to extending it to the other Courts.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—The honorable and learned member suggests that the States Courts generally should exercise this concurrent jurisdiction. There are certain matters now proposed to be vested exclusively in the High Court, which I think might fairly be left to the various Courts of the States having jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—To what matter does the honorable and learned member refer?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—To the suits against the Commonwealth mentioned in paragraph (e); cases against the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Perhaps that might be done.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—An action against the Commonwealth might be dealt with either in the Supreme Court or the County Court.

Mr. ISAACS.—Would the honorable and learned member include the suits named in paragraph (d)?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I think that paragraph refers to suits brought by the Commonwealth against a State.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; surely the honorable and learned member would not include them in his proposal.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I think that those cases should be dealt with exclusively by the High Court, and that the matters referred to in paragraph (f) might also be exclusively vested in the High Court.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Would the honorable and learned member allow treaty matters to be dealt with as proposed?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not think so. We are not under any obligation to provide that they shall be dealt with exclusively by the High Court. They do not arise under the Federal laws or under the Constitution. Hitherto, if any cases of the kind have occurred, they have been dealt with by the Supreme Courts of the States. They would not arise perhaps once in 100 years.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not know that there have been any, but if a case of the kind arose it would affect Federal interests and obligations.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—What about extradition treaties?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—They are expressly provided for. There is no occasion for vesting matters affecting consuls exclusively in the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Only in their representative capacity.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I find that according to Curtis, page 9, States Courts in the United States of America are now at liberty to undertake suits to which consuls are parties.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Does that power refer to actions against them in their private, or in their representative capacity?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It refers to any suits affecting consuls.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The power was first extended to cover all suits against consuls. In order to meet that we have limited the power to cases affecting them in their representative character.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It was first thought, in the United States, that the power to hear any matter affecting a consul in his official capacity should be confined to a Federal Court. That provision, however, has been reversed of late years, and consuls can now be sued in the States Courts. I think that in all the matters dealt with in paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) there ought to be concurrent, and not exclusive, jurisdiction.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—The question which has been raised as to the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and to which reference has been made by the honorable member for Coolgardie, shows how difficult and how dangerous it is for the Committee to proceed with this measure, in view of the fact that clause 31 has been eliminated. We really do not know where we shall land ourselves. If we are to have only an appellate court, it is perfectly clear that we must have something of the kind proposed by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. If we omitted paragraph (1) of clause 41, and the first three words in paragraph (2), as suggested by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, we should confer sufficient power on the smaller Courts. I think the amendment should be carried; but we should not strike out paragraph (c) of clause 40, as suggested by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The suggestion made by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo is that we should retain some exclusive jurisdiction. The question raised by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne is whether there shall be any exclusive jurisdiction in the High Court.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable and learned member's contention is practically that there should be no exclusive jurisdiction in the High Court. Where we have power to give original jurisdiction, we are, in effect, vesting it in the Supreme Courts of the States and are making the High Court practically only an Appeal Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member is going beyond that.

Mr. CONROY.—We are in this position: that, having struck out clause 31, we must give this jurisdiction to the Supreme Courts. Otherwise it will not be vested in any court, because we have decided that it shall not be vested in the High Court. I submit that, as the Government agreed to the omission of clause 31, they should withdraw the measure, and have it re-drafted in accordance with the opinion of the Committee. This is a very big matter, and I think that before going further we should determine how many Judges are to form the High Court. Why did we decide to refuse to give this original jurisdiction if we did not intend to vest it in the Supreme Courts? It must be vested either in the Federal Court or in the States Courts. We determined that it should not be given to the High Court, because it would create more work than a court of five Judges could perform. But I am willing to go even further than the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and to confer a certain amount of Federal jurisdiction upon the inferior courts.

Mr. MCCAY.—Within the limit of their present jurisdiction. The honorable and learned member would not allow a justice of the peace to decide a suit between States?

Mr. CONROY.—Of course, within limits similar to those which confine their present jurisdiction. I think that suits between States might be left wholly to the High Court, but if Federal jurisdiction is not given in some degree to the inferior courts, injustice will be done to a good many people. At the present time, the Postmaster-General can be sued for negligence only under the Claims against the Commonwealth Act, which ceases to have effect directly this Bill becomes law. But supposing the Bill was law, and a man wished to bring an action against the Postmaster-General. Take the case of a line repairer, who thought that he had been unjustly deprived of a couple of weeks' earnings—an amount representing £4 or £5. Why should such a suitor be compelled to bring his case before a Supreme Court, where the writ would cost almost as much? It would be absurd to ask him to do so. I trust, therefore, that provision will be made under which the inferior States Courts can entertain such cases.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I think that the honorable and learned member for Werriwa has slightly confused two different matters. The amendment has no relation to clause 31, which contained the proposal of the Government to confer additional original jurisdiction upon the High Court. Clause 40 does not relate to additional jurisdiction at all. It deals only with the compulsory jurisdiction provided for by the Constitution, and only with a portion of that jurisdiction. Therefore, there is nothing in common between the clauses, and the amendment has nothing to do with clause 31. What the Committee refused to do, in striking out clause 31, was to give the High Court more than the compulsory original jurisdiction of the Constitution. Clause 40 provides that part of that compulsory jurisdiction shall be confined to the High Court.

Mr. CONROY.—But when we decided to omit clause 31 we practically dealt also with clause 3, and were limiting the work to be done by the High Court with the intention of limiting the number of the Judges to be appointed to that court.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not quite follow the honorable and learned member. I should like now to point out what I think should be done with clause 40. I agree very largely with what has been said by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and I am therefore compelled to vote against the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, because I think that some matters at all events should be exclusive in the High Court, and if there is only one matter exclusive in the High Court we must vote against that amendment. The proposal which I understand the honorable and learned member for Bendigo to make is that the clause in effect should provide that the Federal High Court should have exclusive jurisdiction of suits dealt with in paragraphs (c), (d), and (f). I think there is great reason for each of these, and I should feel disposed to support that proposal. It would be anomalous, I think, to allow a State Court to summon to its bar another State. I think it would interfere with what we may fairly call the relative independence of the States. Then, in suits of the Commonwealth against the States the same principle applies.

Mr. McCAY.—Surely, as regards paragraph (d), the Commonwealth has its choice as plaintiff, and it cannot hurt the Commonwealth to give jurisdiction to a State Court?

Mr. ISAACS.—I think it would be wrong to make a distinction in that case, and allow the Commonwealth to summon before the bar of any one State any other State, because the honorable and learned member will see that there is no distinction here. Why should the Commonwealth sue the State of South Australia before a Victorian State Court?

Mr. McCAY.—I agree with the honorable and learned member there. I was thinking of matters brought before the courts of the State concerned.

Mr. ISAACS.—There must be exclusive jurisdiction to some extent. I do not think it is easy to clearly draw the line of distinction. Besides, I do not think there would be much use in giving the optional power, because the Commonwealth would always go to its own court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Would its own Court be partial?

Mr. ISAACS.—I think not; I think it would be perfectly independent and impartial, but I see nothing to be gained by drawing the distinction even if we could overcome the difficulty. With regard to paragraph (f), dealing with mandatory orders to officers of the Commonwealth to do something in the execution of their duty, it seems to me more appropriate that the Commonwealth Court should be the tribunal to command the execution of a duty by a Commonwealth officer under a Commonwealth law. I can see, of course, that there could be an order by a State Court, but I think there is a very great deal to be said for reserving matters dealt with in that paragraph to the Commonwealth Court. However, I do not feel so strongly upon that paragraph as upon paragraphs (c) and (d).

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think those are most important.

Mr. ISAACS.—I think the other ought to be dealt with in the same way.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is no occasion to fight about the matters dealt with in paragraph (d). If we leave exclusive jurisdiction in matters dealt with in paragraph (c) it will be quite enough.

Mr. ISAACS.—I think there should be exclusive jurisdiction with respect to paragraphs (c) and (d), and also paragraph (f), though I do not feel so strongly about paragraph (f).

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—When the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was speaking upon this clause, I interjected to ask him how he regarded paragraph (c). I understand that the honorable and learned member is now sufficiently persuaded that there should be exclusive jurisdiction in respect to matters dealt with in paragraph (c).

Mr. HIGGINS.—I thought that at the time I admitted that was the only case.

Mr. McCAY.—I think that as regards paragraph (c) those matters ought to be reserved for the Commonwealth Courts. There would be endless difficulties arising if two States had a suit, and it could be heard in a State Court of either. It would be still more extraordinary if it could be heard in the court of a third State. As regards paragraph (d), I really see no reason for giving exclusive jurisdiction to the High Court. In the cases dealt with in that paragraph, the Commonwealth is plaintiff, and the Commonwealth may be just as anxious to get a speedy decision as a State would be in the converse case, and it may be just as unable to proceed in the High Court, under the limitations of time and space, as it would be in the alternative proceedings. There can be no harm done if the Commonwealth is permitted to proceed in a State Court.

Mr. ISAACS.—I understood the honorable and learned member to say that there should be some limitation with respect to paragraph (d)?

Mr. McCAY.—That is so. I would limit paragraph (d) to the extent that if the Commonwealth proceeds in a State Court against a State, it must proceed in the court of that State against which it is proceeding. I would not, for instance, allow the Commonwealth to sue Queensland in a State Court of New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY.—That can be settled by the procedure clauses.

Mr. McCAY.—Under paragraph (e) a suit against the Commonwealth by a State, I think, would have to be brought in the Supreme Court of the State.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Under paragraph (e) a suit against the Commonwealth by a State would have to be brought either in the High Court, or in a court of the State concerned, and not in the court of some other State.

Mr. McCAY.—If we allow concurrent jurisdiction to the Supreme Courts, under paragraph (e), I do not see any reason why we should not allow concurrent jurisdiction under paragraph (f). I see substantial reasons why jurisdiction under paragraph (f) should be prompt and speedy. There are many cases in which it will be much more desirable to get a mandamus if you are entitled to it, at once, than it would be to be able to bring a suit for damages for the recovery of money in another way. There is a case sub judice across the Murray at the present time, in which the one ground of complaint has been that of excessive delay, and similar delays might arise if the High Court alone had jurisdiction under this paragraph. I think we can safely trust the Supreme Courts of the States not to give a mandamus against a Commonwealth officer merely because it is a Commonwealth officer who has been proceeded against for the order. Therefore, I think that first of all matters under paragraph (c) should be exclusive—

Mr. CONROY.—And under paragraph (a)?

Mr. McCAY.—Matters under paragraphs (a) and (b) will, I think, be somewhat like black swans used to be before Australia supplied so large a stock of them.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Suppose an offender was wanted, and his extradition was sought for under the Extradition Act, would not that come under paragraph (a)?

Mr. McCAY.—I am not prepared to say whether it would or not at the present moment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not think it would I think it would be under the Act.

Mr. McCAY.—Even if it is, I do not think that any harm would be done by making the jurisdiction in this case concurrent.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There would be, if the matter came under a treaty, and not under an Act. We should be brought into relations with foreign powers.

Mr. McCAY.—Surely we can trust the Supreme Courts in all the States to deal with such matters.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is not a question of trusting them; it is a Federal responsibility outside of the States or their courts.

Mr. McCAY.—If that argument be carried to its conclusion it would be against any Federal matters being dealt with by States Courts, which is going very much further even than the Attorney-General's Bill goes. I should personally be prepared to vote to give concurrent jurisdiction except in respect to paragraph (c), and limiting (d) (e) and (f), so that a suit shall be brought in the State concerned. That of course could be dealt with in the procedure clauses. The Attorney-General has been very obliging for some little time past, and perhaps he can see his way to accept these proposals.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—I suggest to the Attorney-General that he should abandon paragraphs (e) and (f) also. In view of the apparent intention to cut down the number of Judges, it will be necessary for us to afford some opportunities to private individuals for bringing such suits before the States Supreme Courts. With regard to paragraph (e), a good many of the suits will relate to matters of negligence, and will be brought by private individuals against the Commonwealth. In cases of very great importance the Commonwealth might be able to insist upon their removal to the High Court under clause 45. I should like to see the jurisdiction of the States Courts extended to the matters referred to in paragraph (f), because by striking out clause 31 we have prevented actions arising under the laws made by the Commonwealth from being brought in the High Court as a court of first instance. As the Bill stands, officers acting under the statutes we pass regulating trade or commerce may do, or refuse to do, certain acts, and thus give rise to actions for damages, which must be brought in the States Courts. If, however, it is desired to compel an officer to do an act which he has abstained from doing, it will be necessary to bring the matter before the High Court if paragraph (f) stands. The peculiar position is this—that if a suitor wanted to secure damages he would have to go before the State Court, whereas if a mandamus were required, an application would have to be made to the High Court. It would be absolutely impossible for a suitor to bring alternative claims for damages, or a mandamus in a State Supreme Court. I can only conceive of matters arising under treaties in connexion with extradition cases, which are regulated by the various State and Imperial Acts. If we wish to regulate extradition matters, we shall have to pass a Federal Act, and as we have declined to give the High Court original jurisdiction in matters arising under laws made by this Parliament, we shall have to rely upon the States Courts. However, these matters are not likely to prove of any great importance.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I always recognise that there is force in the view that the High Court alone should deal with matters arising between State and State. Speaking for myself, I should be quite prepared to trust the States Supreme Courts in such cases. For instance, I should be content to leave the Supreme Court of New South Wales to decide a matter in which Victoria and New South Wales were in conflict, because I do not think there would be any practical danger. But if we have a High Court it will be as well to restrict these matters, if anything, to its jurisdiction. I should not, therefore, object to alter my amendment by retaining the words at the opening of clause 40 and paragraph (c). I do not think that anything would be gained by allowing the rest of the clause to stand. Paragraph (d) relates to suits by the Commonwealth against a State, or any person being sued on behalf of the State, and as the Commonwealth has its own choice it can bring the matter before the High Court if it deems it expedient. There are cases, however, in which it might be convenient for the Commonwealth to have the matter determined by the Supreme Court of a State, and I do not think we should be injured by the excision of the provision. If the words which I suggest are retained in the clause, I propose to add later on the words indicated in the amendment, of which I have given notice. In the meantime, I desire leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I suggest to the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne that it would be better to test the whole question of vesting the States Courts with jurisdiction under clause 41, because this clause really deals only with exclusive jurisdiction. If the honorable and learned member will consent to do that, perhaps the Attorney-General will consider another point. It seems to be assumed that clause 41 itself confers original jurisdiction, but I do not think it does. It only follows clause 39, which provides that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be exercised by Federal Courts or by the courts of the States, which are by the law of the Commonwealth invested with Federal jurisdiction. That is to say, by laws which are to be subsequently passed. Clause 41 then provides that the investment of jurisdiction is to be subject to certain limits as to locality, subject-matter, or otherwise; therefore it appears to me that clause 41 confers no jurisdiction. I think that under this clause we should prescribe the limits of exclusive jurisdiction, and then, by an addition to clause 41, invest with general jurisdiction the several courts of the States. It is almost impossible to define the courts that are not Supreme Courts, and I suggest that between this and the next discussion of the Bill, the matter of defining the subordinate courts may be considered.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I understand that some remarks which I previously made have been taken by the honorable and learned member for Corinella as casting some reflection on him. I had no intention of doing anything of the kind, and I desire to withdraw any remarks to which the honorable and learned member may take exception.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall have pleasure in considering the suggestions made by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, as to the possibility of distinguishing between the various courts of the States. I am gratified that the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has seen his way to withdraw his amendment, which would have deprived the High Court of all exclusive jurisdiction. But there are still other portions of the clause which ought to be preserved. Provision might be made, for instance, for the High Court to hear suits against the Commonwealth, if brought by a State. Such an amendment might prove acceptable to the honorable and learned member, the generally admitted desire being that suits between State and State should be tried in the High Court. It would be a proper thing if suits by the Commonwealth against the State also were tried in the High Court, and thus comprise a class of cases for which that court is peculiarly suitable. I shall also have one or two considerations to offer—although the cases are much less numerous and important—as to the wisdom of retaining sub-clauses (a) and (b). The latter relates only to consuls in their representative capacity, and the former, if necessary, could be so amended as to clearly relate to cases under treaty, and not arising from any Acts passed in consequence of a treaty.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Have we power to make treaties?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; but a treaty made by the mother country is binding on this Federation, either by adoption, as is the case occasionally with commercial treaties, or by the simple will of the Imperial Government, and if, under the circumstances, a case should arise directly under a treaty, surely as the Federal Government is the only Government responsible and answerable to the mother country, and through the mother country to any foreign power, such a case would be a proper one for the High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Surely the Federal Judiciary must be absolutely independent of the Federal Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That does not make it of importance which court decides the case.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The same argument might apply to the Federal Parliament or to its Executive, when contrasted with those of the States; and yet, as a matter of fact, special duties in regard to external affairs are cast on this Parliament, and through Parliament on the Executive. That is only logical; but, however that may be, the honorable and learned member will confess that this is more a point of theory than of practice. I wish to have an opportunity of carefully considering the suggestions made, and also of looking a little ahead into the next clause, which, now that clause 31 has been omitted, raises a great number of difficult problems. The alterations proposed will require to be supplemented or replaced by others, and, under the circumstances, I propose to agree to a request just made, not to proceed further this evening.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—When does the Attorney-General propose to again deal with the Bill?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I propose to deal with it next Tuesday.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN-AUSTRALIAN MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. SPEAKER reported the receipt of the following message:—

Message No. 4.

Mr. SPEAKER,

The Senate has this day agreed to the following resolutions:—

(1) That the Senate approves of an extension, for a period of two years, of the arrangements entered into on the 5th day of June, 1899, and the 10th day of August, 1899, by the Governments of New South Wales and Queensland respectively, for the carriage of mails between Australia, Fiji, and Canada by the steamers of the Canadian-Australian Royal Mail Line, upon the following terms:—

(a) That the amount of subsidy payable by the Commonwealth be increased by a sum of £6,363 12s. 9d., being the Commonwealth proportion of a total increase of £16,000.

(b) That provision be made for the efficiency of the vessels employed in such service.

(2) That this resolution be communicated by message to the House of Representatives.

R. C. BAKER,
President.

The Senate,
Melbourne, 18th June, 1903.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH: ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have to inform honorable members that, at ten minutes past three o'clock to-morrow, His Excellency the Governor-General will receive the address in reply to his opening speech passed by this House.

House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 19 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

NEW TARIFF GUIDE.

Mr. A. PATERSON.—Is it the intention of the Government to issue copies of the new Tariff guide to Members of Parliament?

Mr. KINGSTON.—It is intended to send one copy to each member who desires it. We have not thought it necessary to send copies round to every one without application.

DUTY ON WORKS OF ART.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I wish to know from the Minister for Trade and Customs whether any decision has yet been arrived at with reference to the charging of duty upon the statue of the late Sir Thomas Elder, which was recently imported into South Australia?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes; it has been decided that the statue is a work of art, and, as such, it must under the Tariff be admitted free of duty.

UNIFORM WHARFAGE RATES.

Mr. HARTNOLL asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

Whether it is his intention to compel Marine Boards and Harbor Trusts to levy within their jurisdiction uniform wharfage rates, so that free-trade between the States of the Commonwealth may become a reality?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

Wharfage rates devised to interfere with Inter-State free-trade are unconstitutional and cannot be permitted. At the same time, wharfage rates which are not so devised, but are simply fair charges for the services rendered, are not open to objection. The value of wharfage services differs at various ports. Special attention will be given to any particular case which is brought under the notice of the Government. The passing of the Inter-State Commission Bill will facilitate dealing with matters of this sort, as the commission is charged by the Constitution with the duty of executing the provisions of the Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

TELEGRAPHIC DELAYS.

Mr. KIRWAN asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the Melbourne Argus of Thursday last, that a telegraphic press message took twenty hours in transit between Perth and Melbourne; and if he is aware that these interruptions are of frequent occurrence, and cause considerable inconvenience to the commercial classes and press of Western Australia and the other States?

2. Whether, as the additional line now in course of erection is on the same poles as the existing line, any benefit will accrue, in view of the fact that in the opinion of experts the interruptions are due to the proximity of the present line to the sea?

3. What are the charges to the public proposed to be made by the Eastern Extension Company for sending messages by cable between Western Australia and Adelaide?

4. Whether the Government will not make without delay the land telegraphic connexion as near perfection as possible, so as to prevent the public having to pay high cable rates?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The attention of the Postmaster-General has been called to the statement in the Melbourne Argus referred to. He is not aware how the delay was caused, but a full inquiry is being made in all the States through which the telegram was transmitted. With respect to the frequency of interruptions, the Deputy Postmaster-General of Western Australia has reported as follows:—“Twenty-one days during the year the old coast line worked badly, and business was subject to delay, due principally to leakage caused by bad weather, and distributed over various sections: two total interruptions occurred between Esperance and Israelite—one caused by gale blowing down poles, and the other by bush fires. Inland line, via Coolgardie, working badly—once between Balladonia and Eucla, and twice between Eucla and Eyre, caused by storms; once between Coolgardie and Norseman, caused by pole falling; and once through cross with local line.”

2. In the opinion of the Deputy Postmaster-General of South Australia, who is an admitted expert, the additional line to Yardea on existing poles will be a distinct benefit as it will enable the Department to cope with the business.

3. The charges proposed by the company for the use of its cable are—for ordinary telegrams, 3d. per word; for Government telegrams, 1½d. per word; and for press telegrams, 1d. per word.

4. The Government proposes to provide a sum of £20,000 for the erection of an additional wire on the line from Perth to Eucla via Coolgardie, and this will be proceeded with as soon as the money is available. It is fully anticipated that this, together with the additional line via Yardea, will provide for the additional business which has accrued from the great reduction of the telegraph rate between Western Australia and the other States of the Commonwealth.

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. KIRWAN (for Mr. MAHON) asked the Minister for Home Affairs, upon notice—

1. When the final report may be expected from the engineers who are inquiring into the construction of the Port Augusta-Kalgoorlie railway?

2. Will the Minister urge the engineers to expedite their final report, so that it may be received in time to permit the question as to the construction of this railway being considered by this House during the present session?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have not received an answer to the question which the honorable member has just asked. I may state, however, that the Minister for Home Affairs informed me that the report in question may be expected very shortly, and that he is doing all that is in reason to have it expedited.

COMMONWEALTH COINAGE.

Debate resumed from 12th June (vide page 908), on motion by Mr. G. B. EDWARDS—

That the report of the Select Committee on Commonwealth Coinage brought up, and ordered by this House to be printed, on 4th April, 1902, be now adopted;

upon which Sir GEORGE TURNER had moved, by way of amendment—

That all the words after "that," line 1, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words—"in the opinion of this House any change to decimal coinage by Australia should, in order to confer in any great measure the benefits expected from it, be preceded by its adoption in the United Kingdom, and if possible be accompanied by the metric system of weights and measures. That in view of the fact that the time has not, in the judgment of the Government of the United Kingdom, arrived for the substitution of the decimal system for the existing coinage, it would not at present be advisable to initiate the system in the Commonwealth."

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—In resuming this debate, I cannot let pass the opportunity of complimenting the Chairman of the Coinage Committee on the very full, able, and effective speech which he delivered last Friday in support of the recommendations of the committee. In some parts of it he rose even to eloquence, and a man who can be eloquent upon the subject of decimals could, I think, extract a poem from the differential calculus. I shall not do him the injustice of endeavouring to amplify the historical and practical treatment which he gave to the subject. The chief object of my remarks is to reply to the objections raised to the report by the Treasurer. The right honorable gentleman stated that he was afraid that the committee came to their finding, not so much on the evidence submitted to them, as under the influence of enthusiasm imparted by the chairman. Although there are differences of opinion in the evidence, and it is not as extensive as the efforts of the committee to obtain expressions of opinion from witnesses justified, the great majority of those examined testified to the value of a decimal system as compared with the present system. The differences of opinion were more as to the kind of decimal system which should be adopted, and the time when it should be brought into operation. But the evidence published with the report by no means covers the whole of the information which we had before us. We were able to refer to the valuable reports based upon inquiries by committees of the House of Commons and commissions appointed by the British Government, and were able to read evidence given on the subject by men of the highest position in the commercial and financial world at home. We were guided in our recommendations by that evidence as well as by the evidence given before the committee, and concluded, as all but one of those committees and commissions did, that, not only would the decimal system of coinage be superior to our present system, but that it is desirable that it shall be brought into operation at the earliest convenient moment. The enthusiasm of the chairman could have had no effect upon the opinions of the members of the English boards of inquiry, and yet we find one of them declaring that—

In conclusion, your committee, having well weighed the comparative merits of the existing system of coinage and the decimal system, and the obstacles which must necessarily be met with in passing from one system to another—

And in Great Britain these obstacles are of the greatest magnitude as compared with those which we have to face here—desire to repeat their decided opinion of the superior advantages of the decimal system, and to record their conviction that the obstacles referred to are not of such a nature as to create any doubt of the expediency of introducing that system, so soon as the requisite appropriation shall have been made for the purpose, by means of cautious but decisive action on the part of the Government.

Subsequently to that recommendation being made, a resolution was carried in the House of Commons to the effect that the issue of two-shilling pieces had proved eminently successful and satisfactory. That was the first step towards decimalization, but a second resolution was carried without opposition, affirming that a further extension of the system would be of public advantage. It is quite true that the latest British Committee, while acknowledging the value of the decimal system as compared with the present system, did not, on the ground of expediency, advocate its being brought into operation. The Treasurer will find, as I have already stated, that in the evidence brought before the Commonwealth Committee, most of the differences of opinion expressed are not as to the value of the decimal system, but as to the kind of decimal system which should be adopted, and as to the time when it should be brought into operation. It was the committee's business, seeing that there were those differences of opinion, to come to a conclusion, upon the evidence given before them, and upon the other sources of information available to them, both as to which would be the best decimal system to adopt, and as to when would be a desirable time to bring it into operation. That they have done. The quotations which the Treasurer made from the evidence of various witnesses, giving opinions differing from the recommendations of the committee, express chiefly differences of opinion upon matters of detail coming under those two heads. But it must be remembered that we in Australia are in an infinitely better position than are the people of Great Britain to introduce a system of this kind. Our population is small as compared with that of Great Britain, and our trading relations are infinitely less. I am perfectly certain, from the reports which I have read, that the people of Great Britain regard it as a great pity that advantage was not taken of the opportunity to introduce the decimal system at an earlier stage in the history of the nation, when their population was nearer the level of our own, when their trade was smaller, and when the consequent disturbance of business would have been less. But we cannot, by postponing this alteration, put the question altogether aside, and we must remember that the difficulties in the way of any alteration will not decrease. As our population grows, and our interchange of commodities with other countries increases, the difficulties will increase. I am therefore satisfied that it would be the truest wisdom not to postpone matters, but to face the question at once. I can quite understand that the Treasurer, in looking through the report, was seeking the line of least resistance, and he must have chuckled when he discovered the opportunity which was given to him by the evidence of several of the witnesses in favour of the postponement of any action on our part until something is done in respect to the matter by Great Britain. The committee were of opinion that if there was any likelihood of Great Britain taking action in the near future, it would be wise to defer moving in the matter here; but inquiries made from the Secretary of State for the Colonies elicited the reply that the difficulties in England were too great to allow of the proposed reform being considered at present. The committee then had to consider whether, in view of this, we should postpone the improvement of our system until a uniform change could be made throughout the Empire. We had every indication of the direction in which Great Britain would go when she did decide to decimalize her coinage, and we felt that we could proceed on these lines, and that a change could be effected now with far less disturbance than in the future. The Treasurer raised a number of objections to the decimalization of our coinage. First of all he said that the people had not asked for it, and that therefore it was not the duty of the Government to undertake it. I think that the right honorable gentleman forgot one of the functions of government. Have not Governments very properly introduced many measures for which the people have not asked? Have they not frequently taken action which has been repugnant, for a time at least, to the great majority of the people? Did the people ever ask for the change that was made in the Calendar? Did they not object to the change, and clamour for the days which they supposed they had lost? Did the people of Australia ever ask that the standard time should be made uniform in certain of the States? That reform was never asked for, but it was effected because it was thought that it would be of advantage to the people. Did the people ever ask for a great deal of our sanitary legislation? Did they not sometimes offer to it a passive, if not an active, resistance? Was vaccination ever approved of by the bulk of the people before it was adopted? No. It was urged by a few who had studied the question that it was a desirable thing, and the Government thought the matter so important that they determined to introduce it for the good of the people, even in the face of strong objection. The Government has something more to do than merely to carry out the expressed will of the people. I can understand a Government not wishing to do more than that, because so long as it is content with that it may rest assured of a majority, and as long as it has a majority it can live. But it is required of Government that it should introduce any change which it considers to be for the general advantage, even though a large number of the people may not appreciate it. The Treasurer objected to the decimalization of coinage because of the practical difficulties which he said no nation had ever faced, except in order to replace a mixed and debased currency. But some nations with no more mixed or debased standards than our own have undertaken to effect changes. The French Government faced the decimalization of its weights and measures when their system was no more diverse and no more objectionable than is ours. Further than that, if the mixed and debased character of the coinage compelled some nations to effect a reform, it has to be remembered that the intrusion of foreign money which led to the mixing and debasing of the coinage increased the difficulty attendant upon the adoption of a new system. When the people still had access to the coinage which had previously debased their system, it could not be expected that the decimalization of the national coinage would take effect quickly and thoroughly. It might be fully relied upon that for years afterwards the mixed coinage would continue in use, and that the difficulties of effecting the change would be increased thereby. Yet in spite of this knowledge the French Government faced the task, and accomplished a very desirable reform. Australia is so situated that she is not tempted to use coinage other than her own. She is an Island State, cut off from other parts of the world, and so long as we can get a good coinage for ourselves we are not tempted to use outside money. This very fact should operate in favour of simplicity in making the change here. The reform could be brought about promptly and effectively, and we should not have to wait for years in order to completely shut out intruding coins. We should remember that, as compared with older countries, the superior education of our people, and their aptitude and alertness, offers security for their ability to adapt themselves to a system of decimal coinage with very little disturbance. They have been able to carry on their affairs with some of the most debased standards that were ever adopted by any nation. In the early days of New South Wales rum was the standard of currency, and under that extraordinary system the people managed to live and conduct their business. You will find so many gallons of rum mentioned in the title deeds of property in Sydney, as the consideration which passed upon their transfer. The chaplain and other officers of a British regiment in New South Wales actually received their salaries in the form of certificates for rum. I do not mean to say that they actually consumed the rum, but the certificates for rum were the money standard of the time, and the values of other articles were reckoned upon them. It was the medium of exchange. At another period, Mexican, Spanish, or Eastern dollars were the standard of currency, and for convenience the dollars were cut into chunks to represent smaller coins. Even under this system the people managed to appreciate values and conduct their interchanges. Then we know that in some parts of Australia, hides, sheep, or bushels of corn, have at different times been the standard of exchange amongst the people. Now we have the British coinage, which is undoubtedly a good example of the mixed duodecimal system. Just as the people managed under the rough and ready methods I have described to conduct their affairs with satisfaction to themselves, so have they been able to adapt themselves to our present coinage, and to be satisfied with it. That, however, does not establish the fact that there is no better system than the British. I am supported by the strongest evidence when I declare that the decimal system is superior to our own. It is in this direction that the countries of the world are moving to-day, and it is also in this direction that Great Britain will in the future, more or less remote, have to move. The Treasurer considered that it would be necessary to run two systems concurrently, owing to the inability of the people to adapt themselves to the decimal system. He thinks that the old would stand side by side with the new. I have already referred to the readiness of our people to adapt themselves to new circumstances, and I am confident that there would be no necessity for running concurrent systems. Many of our people move into countries where the decimal system of coinage is established, such as the United States and Canada, and within one week are quite as well able to conduct their affairs in decimal coinage as under the English system to which they have been previously accustomed. The decimal system is more simple than our own, and the relative values of the coins can soon be understood and appreciated by even the least educated of men. The Treasurer has stated that he has nothing to say against the excellencies of the decimal system, to which he is himself favorably disposed, but he has discounted that statement by saying that, after all, it has evident disadvantages. He quoted some remarks of witnesses to the effect that suitability for calculation did not necessarily mean suitability for payment. I quite admit that; but the Treasurer did not go on to prove the unsuitability of the decimal system for payment. I propose to show him by figures that, upon this point, the system proposed by the committee is, if anything, superior to that now in existence. For instance, if, under the present system, you take the number of coins necessary to make up every sum from one farthing to sixpence—that is, one farthing, one halfpenny, three-farthings, one penny, and so so—you will find that you can make 24 different amounts, and that you will require 61 coins to do so. Now, under the proposed system, between 1 cent and 25 cents—25 cents being equal to our sixpence—you can make, not 24, but 25 separate payments, and you can make them with 60 coins, or one coin less. If you take from 6½d. to 1s. under the present system there would be 24 separate sums, and it would take 84 coins to make them up, whereas under the proposed system there would be 25 separate sums, and to make them up would require 85 coins, or one coin more. Under the present system, between 1s. 0½d. and 2s., which is equivalent to 100 cents, 48 sums can be made up, and to make them up 192 coins would be required, whereas under the proposed system there would be 50 separate sums, to make up which 194 coins would be required, or two coins more. What is the total of these? If you take from ¼d. to 2s.—which latter is the unit of the proposed system—under the present system 96 separate sums could be made up, and it would take 337 coins to do that, whilst under the proposed system you could make up 100 separate sums, and to do so would require 339 coins, or two coins more.

Mr. McCAY.—Has the honorable member worked out any calculation based upon the substitution of the halfpenny for the farthing, because a farthing is rather an academic basis to adopt?

Mr. THOMSON.—I will allude to that matter presently, and show the effect of dropping the cent as we now drop the farthing. Had my calculation been made in that way, it would have told more against the present system. The figures which I have given show that you can make up four more sums under the new system than under the present system of currency, and that you require only two additional coins to do it, so that you get a greater subdivision with practically the same number of coins. The report of the committee states that if it is deemed desirable to do so, the 1-cent piece can be omitted. It follows then that we should have to coin a 3-cent piece to allow of the making up of certain sums. That would be a desirable addition to the coinage if we omitted the 1-cent piece. By omitting the farthing, as we do at present, from our issue, we could not make up odd farthings or three farthings; and we should reduce the sums that we could make up by almost a half. But under the proposed system by dropping the cent, and substituting a 3-cent piece—

Mr. McCAY.—If you have a 3-cent piece you ought also to calculate upon a 3-farthing piece.

Mr. THOMSON.—I am quite content to go to any length that the honorable and learned member may wish, so satisfied am I of the superiority of the decimal system. But if you have the 3-cent piece you can make up all the 100 separate sums between that coin and 2s. except one. I admit that if you issue a 3-farthing piece, you could do likewise as regards the 96 possible sums. But even in that case there is no superiority in our present system. Not merely therefore as a method of calculation are the decimals infinitely superior, but as a means of exchange or of purchase they provide fully all the facilities provided by our present system.

Mr. McCAY.—Has the honorable member considered the question in its relation to our present system of weights and measures?

Mr. THOMSON.—That is rather a separate subject, but I admit at once that the decimalization of weights and measures—if that is what the honorable and learned member means—would provide even very much greater facilities for interchange than the decimal system of coinage. The coinage is only one item in the decimalization of weights, measures, and values, and although our system of weights and measures is duodecimal and mixed—just as our coinage is duodecimal and mixed—that does not give us any facilities for calculating, whilst decimal money can be used as a means of calculation with the present mixed and chaotic system of weights and measures far more effectively than with our present system of coinage.

Mr. McCAY.—I was referring to the disadvantage of adopting the decimal coinage system without the decimalization of the metric system.

Mr. THOMSON.—I will allude to that matter later on. The Treasurer got hold of a piece of evidence by some witness who said that pounds, shillings, and pence are easily added up. It is true that they are just as easily added as are decimals, but you must effect a division at every column besides doing the addition. Even if the single columns are as easily added as are the decimals, does the Treasurer say that you can divide and multiply with anything like the ease that you can under the decimal system? There is no comparison between the two methods. You have to perform divisions even in the addition of pounds, shillings, and pence. In attempting to multiply pounds, shillings, pence, and farthings, there is an enormous risk of inaccuracy occurring under the present system, as compared with the simplicity of similar operations under the decimal system. Then the Treasurer stated that you cannot express one-seventh in decimals except in recurring fractions, which go on through all eternity. I should not like to provide as an occupation for the Treasurer's eternity in the working out of recurring decimals. As a matter of fact, there is no practical occasion to carry out recurrent decimals to any length. Under our present system of coinage, you cannot express one-seventh of a shilling, and whilst it is true that under the decimal system you cannot express one-seventh in figures without using the recurring decimal, in ordinary calculations there is no need to carry out those decimals to more than two places. In minute calculation the recurrence of the decimal enables you to carry it on till you get practical accuracy, no matter how fine the calculation may be.

Mr. McCAY.—We can get absolute accuracy with a vulgar fraction.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes, because in practice we use less subdivision, but if we want to get absolute fineness we must favour the use of the decimal. Even the authorities at the Mint stated that they work out all their calculations by decimals, and subsequently convert those decimals into the present currency.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Insurance offices do the same thing.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes, and banks also; they have discovered the superiority of the system.

Mr. McCAY.—Its superior simplicity, but not its superior accuracy.

Mr. THOMSON.—The honorable and learned member is right and wrong in that statement. One can go to the length of a ten-millionth part under the decimal system if he chooses to do so. Surely that is accurate enough for most things. It is true that he can make use of a vulgar fraction by putting the figure 1 above 10,000,000, but by so doing he is really making use of the decimal notation. In simple fractions, we jump from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{3}$. Let honorable members look at the range between these two sums. In a simple fraction these sums are nearest to each other, because 2 follows 3 in our notation. Between these two ranges we can express in decimals sixteen or seventeen different subdivisions. Of course, we could get much nearer than that if we compounded the fractions. We could have 4-9ths for example, and so on. But what does that mean? That we have then to multiply and divide. We have to enter into two calculations and that is a complication we would avoid under the decimal system, whilst under that system we can get a finer subdivision more easily than can be obtained by the use of vulgar fractions.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member is referring to calculations only, and not to payments.

Mr. THOMSON.—I have given instances as to payments. I have shown that in all the payments which can be made up to 2s., we require under the present system—by the use of which we can make up only 96 separate sums—337 coins, whereas under the decimal system—by the use of which we can make up 100 separate sums, or four extra sums—we require only 339 coins, or two coins more. Then the Treasurer objected that the adoption of the decimal system by Australia before its adoption by Great Britain would cause great difficulty in transforming British money into our money. I do not know how the Treasurer arrives at that conclusion. I am not by any means a lightning calculator, but I would undertake to transform without pen or pencil any sum of English money into the new decimal coinage.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—But the honorable member, unlike the ordinary man in the street, has the experience and education necessary to enable him to do what he says, but the great mass of the people are not in that position. I have been practising myself, and it took me some time to effect the transformation. I like the old style better.

Mr. THOMSON.—The objection is only imaginary, as is shown by the fact that the Treasurer admits that there is no difficulty about the calculation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not say there is no difficulty. My trouble is that I generally get the decimal point in the wrong place.

Mr. THOMSON.—A little practice would soon cause that difficulty to disappear. At any rate, the system of transforming the coinage is so simple that the Treasurer, or any other honorable member, can apply it without pen or pencil. It merely means that ten has to be added to the number of pounds, and the shillings divided by two, in order to get the number of florins; then there is something less than two shillings remaining, which, when reduced to farthings, gives you the 24th. In that way the transformation is effected easily and instantly. As to the "man in the street," surely our educational system is accomplishing something. I guarantee that some of the boys in our public schools could do the calculation much more rapidly and effectively than the Treasurer or myself. The point, however, is that the "ordinary man in the street" is not called upon to transform the coinage; it is only those who have to deal with exchanges who have to do it, and it can be done with the utmost simplicity. All the "ordinary man in the street" has to do is to make himself acquainted with the new coins, the whole of which are the same as the old coins excepting those below sixpence. The coins below sixpence, excepting the two and two-fifths coin are so close, being within 4 per cent. of the penny, halfpenny, or farthing, that "the man in the street" will not find any practical difficulty. Even as to systems which vary more from our own system, because they do not contain the coins above sixpence—such as the system of the United States or the Canadian system—there is no difficulty to an Australian in arriving at a full appreciation of the relative value of the coins within a week after landing in the countries where they prevail.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Within an hour.

Mr. THOMSON.—The evidence which the committee had from witnesses who had been brought up under the British system and had latterly lived under the decimal system, was the strongest in favour of the latter, each witness declaring that he would not dream of desiring to return to our mixed coinage. Another objection raised by the Treasurer was that the threepenny bit would disappear—that this measure of our religion and our charity would not be available, to the injury, possibly, of religion and charity. It might be desirable, from that point of view, to have no silver coin under sixpence; but I point out to the Treasurer that the threepenny bit, if it is of such importance and value, need not disappear. It could be minted as a coin of convenience, in the same way as is proposed in regard to many of the other coins under the decimal system. We might coin a 12½ cent. piece, or, if the Treasurer wishes to abolish the half, a 12 cent. piece, which would practically take the place of the threepenny piece. I do not think there is much in the objection raised on this score by the Treasurer, but, if there were, I have indicated a means of getting over the difficulty. The Treasurer seemed to favour the American dollar and the retention of our penny, though I do not know whether he has given much attention to the point.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I did not say I was in favour of that course being followed, but suggested that it would prove the simpler, seeing that we cannot get rid of our sovereign.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Treasurer did not say absolutely that he was in favour of the American dollar and the retention of our penny, but he seemed inclined to regard such a step with approval. The Select Committee went very closely into this matter. Amongst some of the members of the committee there was a predilection in favour of the American dollar, but it was found that the British sovereign is too closely interwoven with the affairs of the United Kingdom—that it is the coin of our records and our statistics—and that, even in countries beyond the British Isles, it has become an important standard of value. That being so, the committee arrived at the conclusion that, unless there was the strongest possible reasons, it would be unwise to depart from the sovereign as a standard, especially when we may anticipate that the direction which a decimalization of the coinage would take in Great Britain would probably be that indicated very emphatically by the reports of all the select committees which have considered the question there, and also by the coinage of the two-shilling piece, avowedly as a first move towards a reform such as is now submitted for the approval of the House. These facts became so evident, and the disturbance of the coinage would be so much less when the 1s., which has a very strong position, and the 6d. are retained, as also are the 10s. piece and the £1, that the select committee were first forced to the conclusion that the better course was to adopt the British sovereign as a basis. I believe that if the American coinage had to be constructed to-day, there would be a smaller unit than the dollar, which, as a coin of convenience, is too large to be suitable. In Canada, where the dollar is adopted nominally, that coin is actually never minted, but only the half-dollar, which is about equivalent to the two-shilling piece. It is most desirable that a unit of coinage should be one that will go into circulation. Then there is a great probability that some other countries adopting the decimal system will recognise the supremacy of the British sovereign, and make it the standard of value. We have been told by the honorable member for South Sydney that in Peru and Ecuador, of which the select committee knew nothing at the time their report was issued, the British sovereign has been adopted as the standard and re-organized as currency. That is evidence of the trend of future decimalization, and of the strength of the position that the British sovereign has acquired, partly by its size, weight, and suitability as a coin, but, more than all, by its containing a full 20s. worth of gold without any deduction for minting charges.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—The sovereign is still used in Canada.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is so. Canada was really compelled to adopt the American system, because there not being, as here, a sea-border, the intrusion of the American coinage could not be prevented. Had Canada not adopted the American system, there would for all time have been a mixed coinage in the Dominion, because it would have been impossible to prevent an influx of coins from over her border. That was the adoption of a coinage system by compulsion of circumstances. We have to face the further fact that there have been attempts to establish an international coinage, which would be of immense advantage to the peoples of the world. Coinage reform, such as I have indicated, would reduce the dead-weight which is felt by producers and consumers in the interchange and handling of products, although people in their ordinary daily avocations may not know of the disadvantages which they at present suffer. A reformed coinage would, as regards account, reduce the labour in the handling of products and the distribution of supplies, and therefore decimalization and unification of the world's coinage is not merely a sentimental but a practical proposal, which, if accomplished, would, or ought to, do much for the peoples of the world, whether producers or consumers. The trend of a world's coinage will, the committee think, be towards the adoption of a unit between the American dollar, with its clumsiness and difficulty in handling and circulation, and the smaller units of Europe, such as the franc and mark. The circumstances and conditions of the European peoples are gradually becoming more uniform. At one time only the very small coins were used by a great number of people on the continent; but as wages rise, these very small coins are being displaced. Under the circumstances the select committee consider that the two-shilling piece would form a compromise between the two great systems of the world at the present time, and that a movement for a world's coinage would probably be in that direction. Then there is the question of Great Britain being allowed to act first, and of decimalization of the weights and measures ever preceding, or taking place concurrently with the adoption of the decimal system. The difficulties in the way of Great Britain acting are much greater than those we have to face here, and whilst I believe that circumstances will force Great Britain not perhaps into the adoption of a decimal coinage, but into the adoption of a decimal system of weights and measures, and that it must then accompany the adoption of that system with a decimalization of the coinage, I see no reason why, with the uncertainty as to the time when it will act, we should not move in the direction in which it is sure to move, and on the lines which, so far as we can possibly see, it is likely to adopt.

Mr. WATSON.—Is it worth our while to make a disturbance in regard to the coinage without the compensations which come from the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures?

Mr. THOMSON.—I agree with the honorable member this far: that the most important thing is the decimalization of the weights and measures; but we cannot move in that direction very well without Great Britain, for the reason that it does not merely affect the weights of our potatoes, corn, and so on, as those we can ourselves decimalize to some extent. If we adopt a decimal system of coinage without Great Britain we ought to adopt the cental instead of the bushel.

Mr. WATSON.—We have done that in the Customs Tariff Act.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes. If we did that it would be a great assistance when we had the decimal system of coinage. The two would interwork, and much of the calculation would be simply done by shifting a dot backwards and forwards. We can do that much, and we ought to do it; it is of such importance that the sooner it is done the better. But the metric system of measurements will extend far beyond such questions as that. Great Britain to-day is, in my opinion, losing millions per year, and her workpeople are losing a great amount of work, owing to the non-adoption of the metric system. Her gauges, templates, moulds, patterns, screws, machines, are all different from those of the nations that have the metric system. The number of the peoples who have adopted the metric system is increasing from year to year.

Mr. WATSON.—And a large proportion of the consumers of Great Britain's products use the metric system.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes. Once a country that Great Britain supplies, or has been supplying largely, introduces machinery founded on metric measurements or screws, or a variety of articles in the making of which you require very exact measurements, the chance of Great Britain competing for those things in that market is gone. They become the standards, as they have a right to do, because they are more suitable and more easily worked. For instance, take the erection of a milling plant for any purpose. The speeds and powers are calculated with the greatest ease when all the parts have been gauged to a decimal system of measurement. All that calculation, which is a very difficult thing with our system, is simplified so much that any one having the parts of a machine on that system once, will not have British parts. Those parts cannot be replaced or repaired, except by parts based on a similar measurement. Therefore the users have to go to the producers who work under the metric system. It will be asked, Why does not Great Britain adopt both systems? It is because of the enormous expense of the machinery. It would cost England millions upon millions to change her system of weights and measures, because of the expense of altering the immense machines they have turning out certain gauges to machines that would turn out other gauges.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It will cost her more if she does not.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes; it is costing her more now if you take the loss per annum. That fact must begin to impress itself upon the people of Great Britain. Of course British people are conservative. Very often they have an admiration for old things because they are old, and they do not like facing, as the Americans are prepared to face, a destruction of valuable and very effective plants for other plants, in order to clear out their great works and put in other machinery to produce articles under a new system. That feeling, I believe, will go. The only question is, when will it go? When it does go, I believe there will be a decimalization of British weights, measures, and money, and from the reports of the British committees and the evidence afforded by the adoption of the florin and the position of the sovereign I have not the slightest doubt that the decimal system which we propose now must ultimately be accepted by Great Britain.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Every Chamber of Commerce in Great Britain has declared in favour of the system.

Mr. THOMSON.—Yes; the declarations of British Chambers of Commerce have been in favour of its adoption. In that connexion I desire to point out a fact to the Treasurer. We took every step to get evidence that was possible. We sent out a schedule of very embracing questions to the Chambers of Commerce, and to many other institutions, such as the stock exchanges and trades-halls in the different States.

Mr. BAMPFORD.—That is where you would get reliable information.

Mr. THOMSON.—We did not get much reliable information, because we did not get any practically from trades-halls. We sent out a schedule to parties who might be expected to regard this subject from different points of view. We got very little information in return, and the great strength of our report lies in the evidence which we had available in the statements made before British commissions and committees by some of the most able men on such questions in the Empire. A great many of those to whom we applied are quite well acquainted with the decimal system and conduct a large part of their operations under it, and is it not clear that there is no opposition or objection to its introduction, otherwise there would have been a very active effort to bring opposing evidence before the committee? Most persons seemed to entertain this feeling—"Well, we can work along as we are. We are accustomed to the present system; we have our staffs and so on. We admit that there would be some saving with the new system, and whilst we shall not oppose its adoption, we shall not bother ourselves about working in that direction." That is pretty well the situation as evidenced by the results of our very wide-spread efforts to obtain witnesses. Another objection which the Treasurer had to this proposal was the abandonment of the penny and half-penny. We do not propose to abandon those coins. We only propose to vary their value to the extent of 4 per cent. The same coins would do as tokens; they are not intrinsically worth anything like a penny or a half-penny. We were faced with this difficulty, that if we adopted the

2s. unit we had to make the penny token either a coin worth 1½d., or a coin worth 4 per cent. less than 1d. We did not consider, that in the interests of the public, it was right to give the penny token the value of 1½d. Of course, in the matter of wages, it could make no difference, because they could be calculated to an exactitude under the decimal system by cents. But in services or articles purchased for a penny or half-penny there must be one of two things done. In a great many cases the quantity of the article, or the extent of the service, could be varied to suit, if need be, that difference of 4 per cent.

Mr. MAUGER.—How would the newspapers manage? They would knock off a column.

Mr. THOMSON.—My honorable friend as a member of the committee knows that we discussed that question.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—One witness suggested that they should take one column off.

Mr. THOMSON.—They could do it in that way if they wished, but I do not think that they would be so wanting in enterprise as to do that. There are a few cases such as postage stamps, newspapers, and so on, where the quantity of the article or character of the service practically could not be varied.

Mr. WATSON.—Probably the newspapers would charge five cents.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No; the whole history of newspapers and postage stamps is in the direction of cheapening the price.

Mr. THOMSON.—What the newspapers would do—because some of them would be enterprising enough to do it, if all did not wish to do so—would be to charge the coin which would be equivalent to the present penny, and put up with the loss of 4 per cent. I do not think that eventually it would be a loss even to them.

Mr. MAUGER.—They would not do it without a struggle.

Mr. HUME COOK.—They do not make their profits out of the sale of the paper.

Mr. THOMSON.—They reduced the price of the paper, first from 3d. to 2d., and then from 2d. to 1d. I am certain that there is not going to be a retrograde increase of prices. Then we come to the question of stamps. This system provides a fuller subdivision than the old system does. We can issue a 4-cent stamp, a 5-cent stamp, and a 6-cent stamp. It might be that by issuing a stamp at 96-100d., or 4 per cent. less than a penny, there would be a loss of 4 per cent., but the people individually would benefit to the same extent that the revenue loses. But with the increase of the postal business, any loss so occasioned would soon disappear. With reference to the Customs Tariff, the question has been raised as to the effect of the proposed change upon penny and half-penny duties. They could be adjusted so that the returns from the Tariff would be exactly the same as they are now. Some duties could be reduced to four cents, or three cents, others increased to five cents, and so on. There would be in the total no loss whatever. There would simply be an adjustment. I think I have answered the objections of the Treasurer as well as I am able, and I will now briefly refer to the findings of the committee so far as I have not touched them. They are practically these: We recommend the adoption of a decimal coinage, and suggest a certain system. Then we recommend that the adoption should be an early one, and should precede action by Great Britain or with respect to the metric system of weights and measures.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The honorable member would not allow the old and the new systems to run together, surely?

Mr. THOMSON.—If we adopted the decimal system, we should remove the existing coins as early as possible. We could not do it in a day, but within a reasonable period those coins should be withdrawn. The Treasurer agrees with the proposals of the committee with regard to coining silver and copper, as he finds that there would be an advantage from adopting them. Of course, there would have to be a mint mark upon our coins to distinguish them. It would be desirable in that case to, as early as possible, have the present British minted coins withdrawn.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Except the sovereign.

Mr. THOMSON.—I am only alluding to silver and copper coins. The committee also recommend that we should not coin our own gold so long as we use the British sovereign. There is really no profit attaching to the coinage of gold. The British Government are very particular, even though they lose by the coinage of sovereigns, in requiring that they shall be able to guarantee their soundness and value by conducting the coinage under their own officers. There would be some profit by having one mint instead of three—that is to say, there would be a profit by removing our mints to the Federal capital; but, on the other hand, the facilities afforded to the miners for the disposal of their gold would be diminished. They would have to pay the cost of carriage, and if the mint were in the Federal capital, a considerable amount of gold produced in Australia would be sent to England instead of being coined here.

Mr. WATSON.—The miners would be at the mercy of the gold buyers.

Mr. THOMSON.—We should seek to give the gold buyers additional advantages. I do not think it would be wise to remove the existing mints. As to the coinage of our own silver and copper, the Treasurer, as he has told us, was, previous to the appointment of the committee, and is now, in strong agreement with our finding, that to establish a mint for this purpose would be undesirable. The amount of silver and copper coinage we require would not pay for the expenditure. We can get our silver and copper coinage from the Imperial mint, as Canada does, paying a slight percentage for the actual oversight. That percentage would not be anything like so great as our expenditure would be if we attempted to coin our own silver and copper. I need not dwell upon that point, except to say that the Treasurer practically agrees with the committee with regard to it.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Would not the coining of our own silver apply in the same way to the silver miner as the coining of our gold does to the gold miner?

Mr. THOMSON.—It would apply to a much smaller extent, because the quantity of silver which we produce in Australia is large as compared with the very small quantity we require as coinage. We coin sovereigns not only for our own needs—but even principally for our own needs—but much more largely for the needs of other portions of the world. A very large quantity of the gold which is coined here goes out of Australia, and is afterwards simply melted down into metal. The small quantity of silver we should require to coin for our own needs would have no influence whatever upon the value received by the mining companies for the silver they produce.

Mr. WATSON.—There is more gold than silver secured by individual miners in Australia.

Mr. THOMSON.—Oh, yes; silver mining is principally conducted by large companies which can make their own arrangements in other parts of the world, and there are not the intermediate parties between the silver producer and the coining that there are in the case of gold production. I think it unnecessary to state further reasons than I have done for the superiority of the decimal system recommended by the committee. The difference can be shown in a word. If honorable members were to attempt to find out how many twelfths of a foot there were in the table of this House, and had to do it with a rule which was measured to tenths of an inch, they would have a parallel to the difficulties which prevail under our present system. Under our system you are trying, by a notation which is in tenths, to calculate in a system of coinage which is in twentieths and twelfths and other relations. The proper course is to adopt a system of monetary notation the principle of which is progression by tenths. The advantage of so doing is manifest. As to the saving in our schools, I do not think, personally, that there would be a large saving simply by the adoption of decimal coinage; but the saving would be enormous by the adoption of decimal weights and measures as well as decimal coinage. It would be an enormous saving of labour to the children. They would get that grasp of arithmetic which at present, even after they have gone through our schools, and have earned high positions in their arithmetical classes, they lack. They do not understand what is the foundation of the system, or the notation of the system, and they cannot see a co-relation between the arithmetical notation and our existing notations of coinage and weights and measures. Indeed, there is no co-relation. If the children had the opportunity of learning a system of weights and measures and of values founded upon the same basis as the notation of arithmetic, they would at once see the whole principle, and would be saved the labour of having to learn all the relations of weights and measures and values that they do now, some of which are so complicated to their minds that it is a hard task to get them afterwards to make calculations correctly, even on Customs entries. We should have a simple system so interknit that we should save an enormous sum if only in the cost of handling and distributing the produce of the world. As to the recommendations of the committee respecting the particular form of the currency, I need not say more than has been said. With respect to the adoption of the system being determined upon as early as possible, I may say that, in my opinion, we cannot have a better time than the present for the purpose. I quite admit that the Treasurer as a member of a Ministry that has inaugurated several enormous changes that have had the effect of disturbing the people in different directions—sometimes, I am afraid, to their disadvantage—is not very ready to disturb them again, even to their advantage.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We find the British Chancellor of the Exchequer always taking up the same position.

Mr. THOMSON.—The difficulty is infinitely greater in Great Britain than it is here. If we had to consider ourselves alone, we could introduce the proposed system, and in three months the people would be perfectly settled down to the change, and would in no way find difficulties occurring under it. But in England it is quite a different matter. People there are not so educated as they are here. They have not had to adapt themselves to new and changed circumstances so constantly as we have had to do. They have not had within the life-time of one man, as we have had, a rum currency, and a dollar currency, and a bushel of corn currency. They have not had all these varying circumstances to adjust themselves to; and they have not the alertness of mind—I am not wishing in any way to derogate from their powers of mind—which people in a new country, who live under constantly changing conditions, have. If England had adopted the decimal system before her commerce had grown so great, she would to-day bless the fact of having done so. But she has now grown so large, her commerce is so great, her people have been so long accustomed to the old system, that it is very difficult for them to change. I believe it is an excusable thing for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, under the conditions prevailing in England, to hesitate—even although I believe he would be doing the best for the country by the adoption of the metric system of coinage and of weights and measures. But what is difficult in an old country is comparatively simple in a new one; and whilst I quite admit that the advice to wait is an argument for Great Britain, still it is merely the argument of delay that is always advanced in these matters. I believe that in this, as in other things, Australia could do much to expedite the consideration and adoption of the proposed system by Great Britain. If we can do anything to push forward what will be of value to the British people, that should prove an additional reason for our adoption of the system. As to wedding the metric system of weights and measures to the metric system of coinage before adopting the latter, I see no reason why what is part of the process of decimalization should not take place—seeing that it is an advantage—before we accomplish the whole scheme. Owing to the relation of our weights and measures, our machinery gauges, our textile widths and lengths, and so on, to those of Great Britain, we can only decimalize in that direction when she does so. But I see no reason why the decimalization of our coinage, which I admit is a lesser reform, should await the larger reform which we hope will follow, and which the success of this would assist. I, for one, see none of those great difficulties that the Treasurer sees in the adoption of a decimal system of coinage. After some consideration, and after some tendency to favour delay, I came to the same conclusion—not influenced by the enthusiasm of the chairman of the committee, as the Treasurer has said—that hard-headed men have come to in Great Britain. The members of several English committees, in spite of the difficulties there, and in spite of the greater importance of the change in its effects upon the people, came to the conclusion that the proposed system ought to be adopted by the British people. I have come to the same conclusion as did the House of Commons, which unanimously passed a resolution to the effect that the introduction of the florin had been a success, and that it should be followed up by a further decimalization of the British coinage. One of the British committees which found that, in spite of the difficulties which might surround the introduction of the decimal system in Great Britain, it was a matter which should be undertaken at the earliest possible moment was not a small one, nor was it unrepresentative or unintelligent. It comprised some of the hardest-headed business men in the British Empire, men of thought, education, learning, and position. The original members were Mr. William Brown, Mr. Cardwell, Mr. John Ball, Mr. Tufnell, Mr. Alderman Thompson, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Matthew Forster, Lord Stanley—afterwards the Earl of Derby, who was by no means an enthusiast—Mr. Moody, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. John Benjamin Smith, Sir William Clay, the Marquis of Chandos, Sir William Jolliffe, and Mr. Kinnaid. They found as our committee, and prior British committees appointed to deal with the subject, found. As a matter of fact, only one British Commission has reported against the reform. Even that commission admitted the advantages which would attend the change, but reported against its introduction at the time, solely on the ground of expediency. In common with these various bodies, the committee appointed by this House holds that this matter ought to be faced at once, and we have far greater reasons for arriving at that conclusion than had the committees in Great Britain. If our committee has erred at all, it has erred in good company. I have much pleasure in supporting the report of the committee, and the able arguments—which I have refrained, as far as possible, from repeating—put forward last Friday by the chairman, the honorable member for South Sydney.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—After the very able and exhaustive speeches that have been delivered by the honorable member for South Sydney, and the honorable member for North Sydney, I think it would be futile for me to attempt to traverse any of the ground over which they have gone. I have no intention of taking part in this debate. My only desire is to put a question to the Treasurer. It has been said that if the Commonwealth undertook the coinage of its own silver it would secure a profit, or seigniorage, amounting to at least £30,000 or £40,000 per annum. At the present time, when the desire for economy is so strong, and the “Kya-Brummagem” sentiment is so much in evidence, so great a saving would be of much value, and I would ask the Treasurer if he proposes to take any definite steps to secure it?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I have been endeavouring for years past to secure that saving. My negotiations on behalf of the Commonwealth commenced on the 1st of May, 1901.

Mr. BAMFORD.—May I take that as an answer to my question?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Certainly I shall do what I can in the matter.

Mr. BAMFORD.—To see that the coinage of our silver is taken over by the Commonwealth?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Not to have it coined here, but to have the minting done for us at cost price.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That would secure the profit for the Commonwealth.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I have to acknowledge the good services which the committee appointed, at the instance of the honorable member for South Sydney, has done in gathering together such a mass of evidence from representative people throughout the Commonwealth, and in preparing the very able report upon the subject which they have placed before us. I confess, however, that I am somewhat in a quandary as to the position which one should take up at the present time. While I thoroughly agree with the members of the committee, and with the very able speeches made by the honorable member for South Sydney, and the honorable member for North Sydney, in support of the decimal coinage system, I find myself confronted by a difficulty. That difficulty is that even the comparatively small change proposed by the committee—and I am glad to see that they have decided in favour of the adoption of the sovereign as a basis—would involve a considerable commercial disturbance. I fully recognise the force of the argument put forward by the chairman of the committee and others, that the change would involve the minimum disturbance possible under any alteration to a decimal system of coinage. That some disturbance would necessarily be involved must go without saying; but I cannot see that we should gain anything like a corresponding advantage by making this change in the absence of any attempt to introduce at the same time the metric system of weights and measures.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—One thing at a time.

Mr. WATSON.—One at a time is generally regarded as very good fishing. But I do not consider that it would be wise to have two distinct disturbances of trade in effecting what after all is only the one object. It seems to me that the convenience which would result to the people by the arrangement of our coinage upon a decimal basis would be comparatively small as compared with the great convenience, not to say the absolute necessity, of a reform in regard to our system of weights and measures. That is the most important aspect of this question, and therefore I do not feel disposed to say that the proposed change in our coinage system should be made immediately. So far as the decimal system generally as applied to weights and measures is concerned, there appears to be year by year an increasing body of public opinion in England in favour of its adoption. Comparatively speaking, it was only a short time ago that the present Prime Minister of England, while holding office in another capacity, declared that the existing system was an arbitrary, perverse, and utterly absurd one. He gave every evidence of his sympathy with the proposal that England should adopt the metric system of weights and measures. The request then preferred was supported by representatives of almost every class in the community; by representatives of those associated with commerce, with labour organizations, with the teaching institutions of Great Britain, and every other class from whom an expression of opinion would be of value. There seems to be, therefore, a growing feeling in favour of this change being made at a comparatively early date. That being so, instead of adopting the amendment moved by the Treasurer, which would appear to prevent an expression of opinion on the part of this House, we should give some expression of our own desire. We should rather take a course which would clearly define what are the desires of this House. The sooner the change is made the better it will be, not only for British commerce and industry, but also for Australian trade. I believe that a change to the metric system of weights and measures, accompanied by the adoption of the decimal system of coinage, would materially affect Great Britain eventually, if not immediately, and that with that development of Australian manufactures, which honorable members on all sides of the House agree is reasonably possible within the near future, the change would also affect us very largely in our trade relations with the outside world. This House should give expression to any feeling which it may entertain in favour of the general adoption of the decimal system, and I am prepared at once to go to that extent, in order if possible to encourage the British Government to take the matter in hand without delay.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The next motion on the notice-paper deals with the metric system.

Mr. WATSON.—Quite so; but the position taken up by those who advocate the adoption of the report is that they are prepared to accept a system of decimal coinage for the Commonwealth whether we have the metric system of weights and measures or not. I do not think it would be wise to make one change without the other. If we did so, we should only create additional disturbance. The convenience which would result from any new system of coinage would not in itself be commensurate with the degree of disturbance which it would necessarily involve; but we should be justified in accepting the risk of any disturbance to secure the application of the metric system to coinage and weights and measures. For these reasons, my inclination is to give a vote which will express an opinion in favour of the immediate adoption of the decimal system throughout the Empire.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I said that I had no objection to the addition of words to my amendment so as to urge upon the British Government the advisableness of taking the matter in hand.

Mr. WATSON.—That is what I desire shall be done. If the Treasurer will agree to alter his amendment so that it will give an expression of opinion in favour of the change being made, while intimating at the same time that we await the decision of the British Government before taking action, I shall be satisfied. I do not know whether the right honorable gentleman has thought of any alteration that would meet that position, or whether he holds that there should be an amendment of the amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—There should be an amendment of the amendment.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—What does the honorable member think of the suggestion that we should immediately secure the seigniorage on our silver?

Mr. WATSON.—I believe we are all agreed as to the justice and desirableness of obtaining for the Commonwealth whatever profit arises from the coinage of our silver and silver tokens.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—In order to secure that seigniorage it would be necessary to issue different coins.

Mr. WATSON.—Possibly so, but even if we issued different coins the same values could continue to attach to them. In my opinion, that would be a matter of easy arrangement. I propose to move—

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the word "any," line 3, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "a."

I shall put that forward only as a preliminary amendment. If it is agreed to, I shall move for a further amendment of the amendment so that it will read something like this—

In the opinion of this House a change to decimal coinage—desirable in Australia, but should be preceded by its adoption in the United Kingdom.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will find, if he looks at Standing Order 139, that it provides—

When it is proposed to leave out words in the main question, in order to insert or add others, no amendment to the words proposed to be inserted or added can be entertained until the question—that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the main question—has been determined.

So that, while the honorable member can now intimate that he proposes to move in a certain direction, the statement of his amendment and the opportunity of voting upon it must await the decision upon the question whether the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question.

Mr. WATSON.—I shall have an opportunity of moving the amendment later?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member may formally state his amendment now, and he will have an opportunity of moving it at the proper time.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I do not think that it is necessary to say very much in reply to the debate, which, although it has been short, has, I think, exhibited the fact that we have a general consensus of opinion of this House in favour of the adoption of a decimal system. The only objection which appears to lie against the adoption of the report of the committee has been forcibly expressed by the Treasurer, but I am inclined to think with the honorable member for North Sydney that that objection is largely accounted for, in the right honorable gentleman's case, by his well-known mental attitude of proceeding along the line of least resistance. I think that we are not looking at this question sufficiently from the Australian point of view. I can see no reason whatever against our taking this action, even though England does not take similar action. All the arguments used in support of the view of the question that we should delay until England has taken action seem to me to be perfectly groundless. There can be no disturbance of trade and commerce between Australia and Great Britain by reason only of our adoption of a currency slightly different to that used in England. As I pointed out originally, that difference exists in a very much greater degree at present in the relations between Canada and Great Britain, and yet nobody in Great Britain, and certainly nobody in Canada, has felt that difference to be any obstacle to trading operations between the two countries. There will be very little difficulty in expressing a value in the two moneys. The Commonwealth money, should the recommendations of this report be carried out, and the present currency of Great Britain, can be transferred at sight by any one, however well or ill educated he may be, with the exception of small sums at the right of the statement, that is, sums from 5½d. down to a farthing; and, in the most ordinary transactions of life, the difference that could exist between those sums in either currency would be so slight as to be hardly worth considering. I think we have exhibited in the Commonwealth in the first two years of our history too great a subserviency to use and wont. We will follow old systems, we will await the action of other countries, and we will look for precedents in all that we do. I know that it was one of the most striking features of early American history that, in all her people did, they had the courage to grasp their own problems, and to resolve them in their own way, to meet their own circumstances. But as soon as we propose anything in Australia in the direction of reform, we are met at once with the argument that it is not desirable that we should effect the reform, but that we should rather await the action of the mother country in that direction. When we look into this reform and its past history in the mother country, we find that although, in common with other reforms proposed, it has been supported by the ablest men and the most powerful representative bodies in the community, and although there is actually a majority of the members of the House of Commons in its favour, it cannot find expression in the legislative enactments of the country. Why? It is because there is always some other question which, in the political eye, assumes vaster proportions than this great reform, which I think is of more importance to the social and economic well-being of the people than many other reforms which might be mentioned. I adhere to my original statement that, if this reform were carried out in its entirety, it would mean over £1,000,000 per annum to the people of the Commonwealth—I mean if we secured the decimalization of the coinage, and followed that up by the decimalization of weights and measures. Against a reform of that magnitude I find that the strongest, and in fact the only objection offered, is that we should wait the action of England. I do not wish to labour the question; I feel little personal interest in it; but I do think that it is the first reform brought before us which can effect a large saving, and, having regard to the simplicity of its working in its various operations, it is one which should be more favorably entertained than I fear it is going to be by this House. The committee did not come to their conclusions solely upon the evidence accompanying the report, and to which the Treasurer has referred. Although I contend still that that evidence analyzed by the most perfectly judicial mind should give sufficient weight of support to carry this proposal into effect, I say that we were not bound by that. The committee have had one witness, as I have said, in the Library, and that witness was used to the fullest extent. I recollect that in the early days of the proceedings of the committee, my old friend, the late Mr. Piesse—and that gentleman and the late Mr. Groom, the only two members of this House whom, I am sorry to say, we have lost by death, were members of the committee—occupied morning after morning in the Library, and I occupied many days in the Public Library, hunting up all possible information upon this question. The honorable member for North Sydney also hunted up all the political reports and records of this movement, and it was those records, those works and opinions of the great master minds of the age upon the subject, which influenced the committee as much as, and probably more than, the evidence of the merchants of the Commonwealth, or the representatives of the many institutions from whom we sought information. I think the committee did all they possibly could to get to the bottom of the question, and they came to a unanimous conclusion. There was no dissentient voice upon the report, and it is, at any rate, entitled to the favorable consideration of this House. Of course, honorable members cannot always see these things from the same point of view; but I do believe that there is nothing whatever in the argument that we should await the action of England. We can take the action recommended by the committee without embarrassing England. If we do take it, we shall help England to carry out this reform. It is admitted that it is a great reform, and I repeat that in adopting it here we shall assist in the carrying out of the reform in England. Apart from that, there is no reason whatever why we should accompany this reform by a similar reform with respect to weights and measures, except that the decimalization of weights and measures is also a great and a desirable reform. It is possibly a more desirable reform than is the one proposed by the committee, but there is no reason why either the one or the other should not be undertaken by itself. The reform here proposed is the simpler of the two, can be more easily carried into effect, and its adoption will help the other reform. For that reason alone, if for no other, I think this House would do well to agree to the motion.

Question—That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the motion—put. The House divided.

METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney)

—I move—

1. That the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia is of opinion that the adoption of the decimal system of weights and measures, now in use in France and other countries of Europe, and commonly known as the metric system, is a most desirable national reform: that it would economize time and money in professional, trading, and mechanical operations; secure a far higher degree of national education without increased cost; and would avoid the impending danger of serious loss in the Empire's trade through the differences existing between our standards and those of a majority of the civilized nations of the world.

2. That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will cause the foregoing resolution to be forwarded to the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies for the information of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

3. That the foregoing resolutions be forwarded to the Senate, with a request for its concurrence therein.

I did not think that this motion would be so fortunately situated on the notice-paper as I now find it after the adoption of the report of the committee upon a Commonwealth coinage. It deals with the other, and the greater part of the reform which the committee recommend. Had they been empowered to inquire into the advisability of adopting the metric system, I feel sure they would have reported as strongly in favour of its adoption as they did in favour of the adoption of a system of decimal coinage. But, although the subject was not referred to them, it necessarily had to be considered by them to some extent, and they took upon themselves to recommend that Parliament should take the earliest opportunity of supporting any movement for the adoption of the metric system throughout the Empire. Consequently I felt justified in following up my motion for the adoption of the committee's report with the motion which I have just moved. It sums up, in the most condensed form in which I can put them, the great advantages of the metric system of weights and measures. Necessarily, in debating the motion which has just been disposed of, many references had to be made to those advantages, and as I do not wish to go over the ground already covered, I propose to confine my remarks now to the broad outlines of the case for the adoption of the system. I know that the subject received attention during the Premiers' Conference which was recently held in England, and that the conference came to the determination that it was desirable that action should be taken throughout the Empire to secure this reform. I understand further that the Prime Minister is desirous of obtaining resolutions from this Parliament which will assist to carry out the wishes of the members of the conference, and if what he proposes will coincide with my own views on the question, as I have every reason to believe it will, I shall have great pleasure in allowing, with the permission of the House, the substitution of his motion for that of which I have given notice, because I think it is right that in a matter of this sort he should act for the Commonwealth. But I do not think that a motion of this importance should be brought before the House without something being said in its favour. I do not wish to belabour the subject, but, although a great deal is glibly said about the advantages of the metric system, and, on the other hand, a great deal is spoken with equal glibness about the trouble and inconvenience which a change of system would occasion, I should like briefly, by placing some extracts before the House, to outline the great advantages of the system, its present position amongst the nations of the world, and the disadvantages, owing to the non-adoption of the system which it is imposing upon Great Britain in respect to her trade and commerce with other countries. The metric system is now in use by some 480,000,000 people, who comprise all the more highly civilized nations of the world, with the exception of England, America, and Russia. But Russia is almost on the eve of adopting the system, a change to it being now under consideration in that country, and the United States of America and Canada have been agitating for its adoption for some time past. Indeed, in the United States, they have gone so far as to compel its use for chemical and scientific records, and in connexion with the records and statistical information collected under their Customs administration, the weights are estimated, and the records are checked under that system. The adoption of the metric system has also been advocated in Great Britain for a considerable time past, as I showed honorable members when I spoke in favour of the adoption of a Commonwealth decimal coinage, and it has received the support of the most influential bodies in the Kingdom. It has the support of quite half the members of the British Parliament; it has been favorably referred to by one British Minister after another, and it is safe to affirm that the consensus of competent opinion throughout Great Britain is in favour of its adoption. Moreover, there is a common fear amongst the thoughtful people of that country that, if they do not adopt the metric system now, notwithstanding the friction and the expense which its adoption will cause, the expense and trouble of the change will become greater as time goes on, and, in the meanwhile, the retention of the present system will so affect British manufacture and trade that her people will lose countless millions of money. I should like to refer briefly to the outlines of the system. Although the metric system is attributed to the French, its adoption was first advocated by our own countryman, James Watt, the celebrated engineer. Prior to its advocacy in 1879 in France, James Watt published to the world his opinion that it was very desirable to adopt a metric system of weights and measures. He proposed to take the foot and decimalize it, to square it for the square measure, and to cube it for the liquid measure. In the latter case, he took the weight of a certain quantity of water in a given cube, at a certain temperature, weighing it with scientific exactitude, and adopting the result as the unit of weight. This idea of James Watt was exactly the same as that subsequently adopted by the reformers in France, the only difference being, that instead of adopting as a fixed standard some measure then existing in France or some other country, they had a Quixotic notion that it would be better to derive a standard from some great natural feature or great fact connected with the world's outline. They chose a quadrant of the earth's surface, scientifically measured it, and then adopted one ten-millionth part of that as their standard. Many opponents of the metric system have referred with considerable glee to the fact that, after measuring the earth's quadrant and adopting a unit based upon it as their standard, the French authorities subsequently found out that their measurements were not quite correct. As a matter of fact, it did not matter whether they took the earth's quadrant, or the orbit of Venus, or a bee's cell, or a second's swing of the pendulum. The metre was only the x in the problem, and everything else in the system must fall in with it. The metre is very little different from our own yard measure, and if a foot had been taken as a standard it would not have made any difference. If a foot had been the standard and had been followed out upon the metric system, the results would have been precisely the same. The system based upon the French standard has been adopted, as I previously stated, by 480,000,000 of people, and therefore it would be very desirable for the British nation to fall in with it. In our own system of weights and measures there are singular coincidences which assist calculations of certain kinds. But in the metric system you do not find a few isolated cases of this sort, but the whole system is a series of coincidences. Coincidence is the very basis of its origin; it is a train and tissue of coincidences from one end to the other. Some of these give remarkable assistance to scientific men in working out their calculations. Take water for instance, the standard of weight, a centimetre, the system being properly understood, gives the quantity and weight at the same time. It is not necessary to go through a series of calculations in order to solve the problem. Similarly, when the bulk of a particular liquid is ascertained, and is multiplied by its specific gravity, the weight can be at once determined. The whole system is full of coincidences from one end to the other. It has stood the test of time and experience, and provides every facility that is required. Statesman after statesman, merchant after merchant, and philosopher after philosopher, have expressed the opinion that our weights and measures system is a disgrace to our civilization. Everywhere it has been condemned as the haphazard growth of centuries, which, though perhaps primarily framed according to some connected system, has wandered away from original principles until there is no connexion between its various parts from one end to the other. Although the system has been condemned from time to time by able statesmen, who have had it in their power to bring about a reform, no alteration has ever been made. One of the rising statesmen of England, Mr. Arnold-Forster, who is now Secretary to the Navy, foresees that this reform must come about, and in a little book, from which I intend to quote, called the Coming of the Kilo-gram, he illustrates in a most lucid manner, for the information of the whole of the English people, what it will mean to their trade and commerce, how much can be said in its favour, and even against it, and why it is not adopted. Among the reasons which he gives why the system is not adopted is one which, I think, accounts for the whole difficulty. He says—

No Government ever does anything because it is right, or wise, or logical, or scientifically correct. Changes are made, not because they are wise, but because they are unavoidable. The pressure of public opinion, and the fact that it is more difficult and tiresome to refuse a reform than to grant it are now, in 99 cases out of 100, the prevailing motives which influence an over-worked and half-informed administration. What is true in regard to many other matters, is true in regard to the metric system. Till public opinion has been formed and expressed in a way which cannot be mistaken, no change will be made by British Ministers. Our system of government has advantages, but it is not conspicuous for its readiness to accept scientific opinion, or to take the lead in any intellectual or scientific movement. In such matters British Governments generally follow a very long way behind, as any one who is acquainted with the technical and scientific equipment of continental countries is perfectly well aware.

A few years ago a series of articles was published regarding, and a great deal of consideration was given to, what was called the "Made in Germany" question. We shall have to give greater and greater consideration to this question if we are determined not to follow the more scientific methods that have been adopted in France, Germany, and many other continental countries. Amongst these highly scientific systems, that of decimal weights and measures is probably one of the very highest. The ramifications of this system extend through every province of life, and every operation by which man earns his living, creates wealth, discovers scientific facts, or forms a philosophic thesis. In every operation the decimal system of weights and measures helps man to do what is required of him with less exertion and greater accuracy, and assists the nation to greater national wealth. The honorable member for North Sydney has pointed out some of the reasons which have actuated those who have pressed forward this reform in the interests of the manufactures of the old country. I have here a report of an address delivered by Professor Liversidge at the University of Sydney. That gentleman, who is a scientific man, when addressing his students quite recently referred to the metric system, and pointed out its great advantages, and also what it would mean if we adopted it. He said—

It must be borne in mind that to make the change to the metric system would involve a money loss of untold millions, both to England and to the United States of America, since nearly all the present machinery would have to be altered; to take a single case only, instanced by a writer in a recent review, to adapt yard-wide looms to produce metric widths would mean an immense outlay of money, and a great loss of time; but unless this change be made a still greater loss will eventually ensue. In both countries it is used, to a certain extent, by some manufacturers and by instrument makers. I need hardly say that it is used by chemists and physicists in all parts of the British Empire. It is quite an easy thing for small, new, and non-manufacturing countries to adopt the metric system; it merely means a change in the method of buying and selling, and it does not involve the alteration or replacement, at a stupendous cost, of the manufacturer's plant and machinery.

Undoubtedly one of the difficulties connected with the adoption of the system will be felt—more largely, perhaps, in the old country—in connexion with the abolition of machinery now in use, which will be rendered obsolete. We have, however, either to face this loss now, or to continue our present obsolete system, and face a still greater loss which will recur annually and go on for all time. Quite recently the Board of Trade issued circulars to the various consuls and vice-consuls in foreign parts, asking them for any suggestions they might be able to offer with regard to the improvement of trade facilities with Great Britain. Some of these reports are instructive, as showing what Englishmen in various parts of the world, occupying official positions, which compel them to take notice of what is going on, have thought of the wisdom of continuing our present system of obsolete weights and measures. We are told that in most Central and South American countries—

The metric system, while recognised officially, and used in Government offices and for Customs purposes (although even there it is not strictly enforced), is not used in the interior, where the original Spanish measures are retained. The existence of the two systems naturally give rise to confusion.

In Japan—

The metric system is used side by side with the old Japanese weights and measures, but its use appears to be almost confined to dealing with foreigners.

I have read two of the most adverse reports first, if only to show that in countries where we should expect to see the least desire to adopt this modern improvement they have at any rate the two systems, whilst in other countries we find that they have adopted the metric system solely. Mr. Vice-Consul Kerr reports that in Chili—

"The general opinion would appear to be that the use of this system for measures and money has always been attended with great success, and it undoubtedly possesses greater correctness than any other known system." The metric system was adopted in Mexico in 1862, but was not made compulsory until 1898, the delay being due to the persistency of the lower classes, mostly Indians, in using the old methods.

Regarding Argentina, Mr. F. S. Clarke states that there can be no doubt as to the satisfactory practical operation of the metric system, and he has observed no desire to return to the former system. From Brazil it is reported that the introduction of the new method appears to have been effected with perfect ease. It is considered to have greatly facilitated commercial transactions, and there is no desire to revert to former systems. Other extracts from the British Consular reports read as follows:—

(a) Milan, Italy, 28th October, 1894.—As an engineer of some twenty years' residence upon the continent, I have no hesitation whatever in stating that the present system of English weights and measures is detrimental to British commercial interests in countries like this, where the decimal and metrical system is in force. The sooner the decimal system is adopted by Great Britain the more advantageous for her commercial interests when trading with the continent in particular, as also to facilitate home calculations, especially in engineering departments, where excessive accuracy is an absolute necessity.

(b) Varna, 23rd October, 1894.—If the quotations and specifications in trade lists are made out in English standards of weights and measures, intending purchasers here generally throw them aside, and consult others which give the required information in metres, kilogrammes, &c.

I will now quote from another Consul's report, dated Rouen, 24th October, 1894, which reads—

Within the past sixteen years I have served as Her Majesty's Consul in three countries using the metric and decimal systems, and I have not unfrequently had occasion to observe the maze into which an English trade prospectus or circular, if drawn up only on the British system, throws a foreigner, accustomed from childhood to the perfect simplicity of the metric system.

I may add that Lord Cromer has, to some extent, introduced this system into Egypt, where it has been one of the factors that have contributed to his remarkably successful administration. As previously stated, I desire to confine my remarks to quotations from high authorities regarding the benefits to be derived from the adoption of the metric system, in order to place upon record the opinions of thoughtful minds upon the subject. Writing upon this matter, the Bulletin says—

To most people the metrical system is a mere abstruse fad—a struggling of school men after a useless mathematical accuracy which is of no practical interest or advantage to the multitude. In the common opinion, the man who wants to introduce it ranks with the person who wants to demonstrate that the world is flat and the person who believes in the literal rendering of revelations, and similar learned debris of the human species. Yet the man who succeeds in introducing that system in Australia will be probably the greatest benefactor this country has had up to date. He will remove such a load of useless misery from the shoulders of the rising generation as no Australian ever removed before—and not only from the shoulders of the generation that is rising now, but from those of hundreds of generations which will begin rising hereafter. He will get rid of a dull and cumbrous stupidity that has blocked the path of education for ages, and which has no single real advantage to show by way of counterbalance to its uselessness. The present system of weights and measures and money has only one alleged positive merit—its antiquity; and it has only one negative merit—that the adult community which makes the laws have got used to it in a sort of way, and finds it easier to let things slide than to make them better.

The weights and measures and money which Australia inherited from Britain are such a sample of the malice of inanimate objects as could only exist in a community which had let things grow up mostly by themselves for 1,000 years or more. It takes the average child a great part of its time from six to twelve months to learn them, whereas the metrical system can be learned in as many days. It takes years of wrestling with arithmetic to become decently familiar with them, even after they have been formally introduced to the mind.

The latter portion of the article reads thus—

Of course, it would be something of a burden on the 3,000,000 or so of adult Australians to learn a new system. But still they are only 3,000,000—and the unborn Australians, whose education it would greatly simplify, are 30, or 300, or any other number of millions.

We have to consider not merely the benefits which we shall derive from this system, if we succeed in persuading the Empire to adopt it, but those which we shall confer in futuro right down through the centuries. I have no doubt whatever that by the introduction of the decimal system of coinage and the decimalization of our weights and measures we should effect very large savings in the educational bill of the Commonwealth. It would further save the Empire from the great impending danger of loss of trade throughout the world consequent upon the use of standards which are different from those of other nations. Wherever we turn for information upon the subject, we are brought face to face with the fact that buyers of machinery in various parts of the world have come to the conclusion that unless that machinery is constructed according to the metric system they are placed at a disadvantage in obtaining it from England. Mr. Arnold-Forster, to whose book, The Coming of the Kilogram, I have already referred, summarizes the matter in a very popular and lucid way by giving the following testimony to the value of the metric system of weights and measures—

1. 450,000,000 people use it.

2. No nation having adopted the metric system has discarded it nor has it made any improvement on it.

The fact is that the system is ab initio so perfect that no improvement can be made upon it. He continues—

3. The Right Honorable A. J. Balfour, First Lord of the Treasury, remarked, on the 20th November, 1895, in his speech to the deputation of Chambers of Commerce—"There can be no doubt. I think, whatever, that the judgment of the whole civilized world, not excluding the countries which still adhere to the antiquated system under which we suffer, has long decided that the metric system is the only rational system."

4. A Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed in February, 1895—"To inquire whether any and what changes in the present system of weights and measures should be adopted." This committee, after making a most searching examination, recommended the following measures:—

- (a) That the metrical system of weights and measures be at once legalized for all purposes.
- (b) That after a lapse of two years the metrical system be rendered compulsory by Act of Parliament.
- (c) That the metrical system of weights and measures be taught in all public elementary schools, as a necessary and integral part of arithmetic, and that decimals be introduced at an earlier period of the school curriculum than is the case at present.

5. The following public bodies have passed resolutions in favour of the adoption of the metric system, viz.: 29 town councils, 18 trades councils, 29 school boards, 40 chambers of commerce, 45 public bodies and associations.

6. British Consuls in many parts of the world (in the interest of our enormous foreign trade) recommend the immediate adoption of the metric system.

7. It is the opinion of eminent men who have studied the subject, that by discarding the present system and adopting the metric system, one year would be saved in the education of every child.

8. It is an acknowledged fact that calculations in the metric system necessitate less than one-half the number of figures required by the present British system.

9. The metric system has been introduced into almost every civilized nation, and into many semi-barbarous countries without the slightest difficulty. Why then should any difficulty be apprehended in its introduction into our country?

In these extracts Mr. Arnold-Foster has, I think, ably summed up the advantages of this system, and of the reasons why it should be adopted by the Empire. I quite agree with many honorable members that it would be absolutely impossible for the Commonwealth to deal with such a vast reform unless acting in conjunction with the Empire; and to that end we cannot do better than to refer the subject in the form of an expression of our opinion, which would assist the advocates of the reform in the old country, to the Imperial Government. The system has been taught, not only in the schools of Great Britain, but in the schools of Australia. I have two little daughters who work problems in the metric system far more ably than I could, and I see that in various superior schools in Australia, the system is not only constantly taught, but problems in it are given as subjects for examination. In England the system has been prescribed for several of the forms in the board schools, and even younger boys and girls are taught it, those who enforce the teaching being of opinion that, as sooner or later the system must be adopted, it is necessary to instruct the rising youth. According to Professor Liversidge, the students at the Sydney University have been using the system for some years without difficulty, and find it greatly expedites their work. Seeing that the system has been introduced everywhere, and that there is such a body of opinion in favour of it, is there any reason why it should not be adopted? It seems, as I said before, that the adoption of the system in Great Britain is prevented only by those great questions which loom so large in the political eye, such as the Irish question and the South African question, which, important as they are, possibly mean less to the future welfare and prosperity of the Empire than the reform I am now advocating. I feel very proud to have succeeded this afternoon in getting the report of the Decimal Coinage Committee adopted, and proud also to have been in a position to introduce the present motion; but all that to me is nothing compared with the satisfaction which we, as a House, should feel in assisting the advocates of the reform in the old country to carry it into effect—to bring about that time when we shall approach very much nearer to what I consider was the highest and the purest ambition of the great Napoleon, who once said that he hoped to see one weight, one measure, one money, and one common law throughout the world. John Quincy Adams hoped to live to see that time when the metre adopted by the French would go right round the world in use, as it did in geographical extension. I desire to ask the leave of the committee to substitute for my motion a series of motions which the Prime Minister desires, and I feel rightly desires, should be adopted in order to carry out the undertaking that he entered into when he represented this Commonwealth at the recent conference of Prime Ministers in London. At that conference a resolution was passed as follows:—

That it is advisable to adopt the metric system of weights and measures for use within the Empire, and the Prime Ministers urge the Governments represented at this conference to give consideration to the question of its early adoption.

The Prime Minister, although I forestalled him, intended to introduce the motions which I now ask to be allowed to submit in lieu of that of which I originally gave notice. The motions I desire to submit are as follow :—

1. That in the opinion of this House it is desirable that the metric system of weights and measures should be adopted with the least possible delay for use within the Empire.

2. That the most convenient method of obtaining the object stated in resolution 1 is the passage of a law by the Imperial Parliament rendering the use of the metric system compulsory for the United Kingdom and for all parts of the Empire, whose legislatures have expressed, or may thereafter express their willingness to adopt that system.

3. That these resolutions be communicated by address to His Excellency the Governor-General for transmission to the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

4. That the foregoing resolutions be forwarded to the Senate by message with a request for its concurrence therein.

Question amended accordingly.

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—I have much pleasure in seconding the motion. As I intimated the other day in seconding the adoption of the report of the Select Committee on Decimal Coinage, I think that both that system and the one now under consideration should be the subject of one reform.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—I desire to make a few observations with the object of furthering the end which the honorable member for South Sydney has in view—for the furtherance of which end, indeed, my resolutions, which the honorable member has now submitted, were originally drafted. I may say that it was my intention to seek an opportunity to propose those resolutions during the present session, and I drafted them with that object before the honorable member for South Sydney had, and very properly, given notice of his motion. The object which I have in view in seeking the adoption of the resolutions in the form I have suggested, and which the honorable member has acquiesced in, is that the matter may be brought before the Imperial Government and Parliament in the most concrete and practical form possible, and in order to further the adoption of the system throughout the Empire. It will be obvious that the application of the system to one portion of the Empire like Australia might, of itself, rather impede than facilitate the commercial operations it is desired to make simpler and more general. But if the reform spreads from the centre of the Empire, and if the Parliament of the United Kingdom first legislates in a manner which can be adopted by all parts of the Empire, then the facilitating of commercial transactions becomes co-extensive with its adoption in the Empire, not to speak of the enormous benefits which will result, in the terms of the honorable member's own motion, in dealing with other countries. The honorable member asked us to affirm that the adoption of the system would——economize time and money in professional trading and mechanical operations, secure a far higher degree of national education without increased cost, and would avoid the impending danger of serious loss in the Empire's trade through the differences existing between our standards and those of a majority of the civilized nations of the world.

The honorable member for South Sydney has referred to the resolution passed at the conference of Prime Ministers last year, and there is no necessity for me now to repeat its terms. It would be as well, however, to mention what was the attitude of the Secretary of State, as representing the British Government at the conference. The Secretary of State was opposed to the original suggestion that there should be an adoption, so far as it could be made in any way of effect by the conference, of the system of decimal coinage. If I may mention the matter, it does appear that the Imperial Government, if at all in favour of the adoption of the decimal system, is at any rate not in favour of it at present, or until the metric system can be first adopted. The adoption of the metric system would, therefore, of itself advance a stage further the adoption of the decimal coinage system. It is clear to my mind, however, from what took place at the conference, that if our end is to be secured within a reasonable time, the adoption of the metric system must precede the adoption of decimal coinage, unless, indeed, by some great good fortune the adoption of the two reforms can be made concurrent. The prime object, therefore, is the passage of legislation in the United Kingdom for the adoption of the metric system throughout the Empire, and that is the practical object of the motion which the honorable member has so kindly accepted at my request. It will be seen that the second resolution deals with the compulsory adoption of the system. The experience of authorities on the subject, and the results of inquiries by select committees, and by other methods, have shown that the mere legalization of the system would no more affect the reform than would a similar legalization of the decimal coinage system. The select committee of the House of Commons on weight and measures, whose report the honorable member quoted, recommended in 1895—

That the metrical system of weights and measures be at once legalized for all purposes.

They were not blind to the fact that this would not be sufficient, and they therefore proposed—

That after a lapse of two years the metrical system be rendered compulsory by Act of Parliament.

The difficulties in the way of both these systems are not in their application after they have once obtained general use, but in the period of transition from the use of the old system to the use of the new one. A remark or two will make it clear what are the difficulties during the period of transition, and how adverse the ordinary citizen will be to make the effort which is involved in that transition, unless there is some legislative authority which may turn his mind in that direction. The metric system is based upon the assumed length of the direct distance from the Equator to the North Pole. The ten-millionth part of this distance was adopted in 1795 by the French Government as the unit of length and called a metre. All other measurements are derived from this unit. The unit of capacity is the cube of a tenth part of a metre, and is called a litre. The unit of weight is the weight of a litre of water at a certain temperature, and is called a kilogramme. The unit of land measurement is a hectare, which equals 10,000 square metres. If that is not enough to show the initial difficulties, let me give the equivalents under our present system of weights and measures. A metre is equal to 39·37 inches, a litre to 1·76 pints, a kilogramme to 2·2 lbs. avoirdupois, and a hectare to 2·47 acres. It is obvious that, in attempting to carry out that change, the difficulties which beset the initial calculations for the purpose are more than the ordinary adult population would care to face, and it is therefore that stress has been laid by those who have inquired into the subject on the teaching of both the new systems in all public and elementary schools, which is absolutely a necessity towards their ultimate and universal adoption within the empire. That recommendation of the select committee of the House of Commons in 1895 is also an essential, and will have to be faced, so as to give it absolutely full effect in any measures which we may subsequently adopt. Reverting to the argument, that to be effective the reform must be compulsory, what has been the course of legislation on this subject? In 1897 the Weights and Measures or Metric System Act, 60 and 61 Vict., c 46, was passed by the British Parliament. The use of the metric system had been authorized by the Weights and Measures Metric System Act 1864, 27 and 28 Vict., c 117. In spite of this it was doubtful, after the passage of the Weights and Measures Act 1878, 41 and 42 Vict., c 49, whether section 19 of the last-mentioned Act did not render liable to a fine any person using the physical weights of the metric system in trade. Section 1 of the Act of 1897 renders the use of such weights in trade lawful. By section 2 of that Act the Board of Trade standards, which might be made under section 8 of the Weights and Measures Act 1878, were to include metric standards derived from certain metric standards deposited with the Board of Trade. By section 2 of the same Act the Queen was authorized to make, by Order in Council, a table of metric equivalents in substitution for the table in Part I. of the 3rd schedule to the Weights and Measures Act 1878. No such Order in Council has yet been issued. The first position, therefore, is that the mere legalization of the system will never lead to its general adoption, and that is very largely shown by what I have said, first, as to the origin of the system, and next as to its history in the United Kingdom, and is further shown by what is advanced in the report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons. It is desirable for the House to resolve that the best and most convenient method of attaining the object stated is the passage by the Imperial Parliament of a law rendering compulsory the use of the metric system in the United Kingdom and in all other parts of the Empire whose Legislatures have expressed or may hereafter express their willingness to adopt that system. When the law is passed, as it ought to be passed, first in the United Kingdom, and adapted to apply to other parts of the Empire, it may automatically come into operation in those parts whose Legislatures have not up to that time expressed their willingness to adopt the system so soon as the law is adopted by them, and by its gradual adoption in that way its usefulness will extend to every corner and portion of the Empire. I do not wish to speak at great length, because both on the other question and on this one the honorable member who has brought the subjects before the House, has performed his duty well, and has given full information to this Legislature. We desire, in common with the honorable member, that the resolutions of the House should be sent to the Senate for their concurrence in order that when they are sent to the Secretary of State for the Colonies through the Governor-General they may stand, not merely as the expression of this House or of the Senate, but as the conjoint expression of both Houses, and thus have that added weight which such concurrence will give them. I have nothing more to say, except that as it is one of the matters upon which the Conference of Premiers in London arrived at a resolution, the solution which is now presented, as far as immediate needs go, is altogether welcomed by the Government, who take this opportunity, with the assistance of the honorable member, to adopt the step suggested, and so bring the matter into such a practical form as may lead to the earlier adoption of so much needed a reform.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I should have spoken at some length, had it not been that I think the remarks made by the honorable member for South Sydney have been so extensive that little remains to be said in support of the resolutions. For many years I have been thoroughly convinced that a change of this sort would be for the ultimate advantage of the public. Of course, one difficulty is that, when a change is made, there will be a certain amount of annoyance created amongst individuals, especially amongst the older portion of the population, who are not so ready as the younger portion to welcome any changes. A great deal of that difficulty, however, is being overcome by the schools in New South Wales and Victoria, and, I believe, in other States, in teaching the metric system side by side with the present system. In that way a very large portion of the difficulties will be overcome. I can only express my great feeling of thankfulness that this question is to be forwarded by a resolution of this House, and that the Ministry have expressed their willingness to fall in with it—that, in fact, the motion is really anticipatory of a resolution that they had intended to submit to the House. It shows all the more courage on the part of the Ministry to do this, because, from the very annoyance which may arise from the adoption of a new system, and which is seen and felt by every one—although it may be followed by ultimate benefits to the community, those benefits are not so readily perceived—a matter of this kind is not always one that politicians care to deal with. I congratulate the Government on having taken advantage of the superior knowledge that they have obtained on the subject, and which has led them to support this resolution.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH: ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

May I state that probably Mr. Speaker has a statement to make to the House, which I shall be glad if honorable members will wait to hear? It has reference to the address in reply.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I desire to remind honorable members that it has been arranged that this House is to wait upon the Governor-General this afternoon at the Treasury buildings at ten minutes past three o'clock, with the view of presenting to His Excellency the address in reply which was recently passed. I shall be glad if such honorable members as desire to do so will meet me here at three o'clock, so that we may proceed to the place appointed to wait upon His Excellency.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 23 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH : ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have to inform honorable members that His Excellency the Governor-General was pleased, on Friday last, to make the following reply to the address adopted by this House :—

MR. SPEAKER AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—

It gives me great pleasure to receive your address in reply to the speech delivered by me on the occasion of the opening of the second session of the first Parliament of the Commonwealth.

I thank you for your expression of loyalty to the Throne and person of His Most Gracious Majesty.

I trust that your earnest consideration of the various measures submitted to you will result in benefit to all classes of the Commonwealth.

TENNYSON,

Governor-General.

19th June, 1903.

ELECTORAL ROLLS.

Mr. PAGE.—I wish to know from the Minister for Home Affairs if his attention has been drawn to the following telegram, which appeared in the Argus of the 19th June :—

BRISBANE, Thursday.

The Premier, when interviewed with reference to the printing of the Federal rolls, said that two months ago the Federal Government were advised by the Treasurer that arrangements had been made to have the work done in the Government Printing-office. Sir William Lyne's statements, he thought, were not correct. Two tenders were submitted, one for linotype-setting and the other for setting by hand, but so far the Queensland Government had not been informed which tender would be accepted. However, on the assumption that linotype-setting would be preferred, arrangements have been made to get the necessary machines, and the printing-office was quite prepared to undertake the work. There never had been any intention to farm out the work. The Treasurer also said that there was no justification for Sir William Lyne's statements, and added that it had been very evident all along that the Federal Government was anxious to find some excuse for keeping the printing of the rolls in Melbourne.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Minister for Home Affairs will be here presently, and will then, I have no doubt, be able to give a complete answer to the honorable member's question. But, as a part answer, I can say that the suggestion that this Government is endeavouring to find an excuse for keeping back the perfecting of the rolls is wholly inaccurate.

PACIFIC ISLAND LABOURERS ACT.

Mr. FISHER.—The following paragraph appears in to-day's Argus :—

His Excellency the Governor-General (Lord Tennyson) suggested that the King should not assent to the Pacific Island Labourers Bill until the regulations to be framed under it were issued. The King did not, however, withhold the Royal assent. The regulations governing the deportation of kanakas have not been prepared yet, but the Prime Minister states that they will be forthcoming when any are found necessary.

I wish to know from the Prime Minister if it is true that His Excellency the Governor-General took the opportunity to suggest a certain course to the King without being so advised by his Ministers?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I believe that the papers containing the passage upon which that construction has been put have been made parliamentary papers in England, and I will see that they are laid upon the table of this House, so that honorable members may form their own impression upon the subject.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers :—

Defence Forces.—Regulations under States Acts and Constitution of Commonwealth, dated 15th June, 1903.

Audit Act 1903.—Transfers of amounts approved by Governor-General, financial year 1902-3.

DEARNESS OF MEAT.

Mr. McDONALD.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister whether, in view of the high price of meat in Australia at the present time, the Government is prepared to introduce a Bill to provide for the imposition of an export duty upon it?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It has not yet occurred to the Government that there is any necessity for the measure to which the honorable member alludes, and, so far as I can speak from personal impressions, I do not think that the necessity will arise.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Following up the question of the honorable member for Kennedy, and having regard to the unsatisfactory reply of the Prime Minister, I should like to ask the right honorable gentleman whether, inasmuch as it was proved last week that there is a combination here to raise the price of meat, he will invite the Premier of New Zealand to open his butcher's shops in Melbourne instead of in London, so that we may be supplied with New Zealand meat?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The question is so momentous that I am not prepared with an answer.

Mr. CONROY.—Is the Prime Minister prepared to put an export duty upon other articles, and thus by checking all exportations more effectually check importations than by protective duties?

SORTING OF MAILS.

Mr. MAHON asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Does the Postmaster-General not consider that economy and expedition would be promoted if the English and other mails were sorted during the four days passage of mail steamers from Fremantle to Adelaide?

2. Has this question been formally considered since the Commonwealth assumed control of the Department; and, if not, will the Postmaster-General cause inquiry to be made?

3. Has the attention of the Postmaster-General been directed to the lack of up-to-date facilities at Largs Bay for discharging mails, and to the great delay which usually occurs in placing them on the mail train?

4. Have any complaints been made to the Department by or on behalf of the staff of sorters engaged on the trains between Adelaide and Melbourne?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Inquiries are being made, and the desired information will be furnished as early as possible.

FEDERAL STAMPS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether arrangements can be made for printing, in Adelaide, a portion of the new Federal stamps which the Postal Department proposes to issue?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Inquiries are being made, and the desired information will be furnished as early as possible.

ADMINISTRATION OF NEW GUINEA.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

With reference to the Administrator of New Guinea's last annual report, recently presented to the House, in which the following passage appears:—

"Mr. Symons made a trip into the district of the offending natives, accompanied by several of the owners of property that had been stolen. In order the better to arrest culprits, and to try and find stolen goods in the small scattered villages, Mr. Symons divided his party. Some of those who were not under Mr. Symons' eye were not sufficiently careful about keeping strictly within the law. The result was that exaggerated rumours of natives being wantonly murdered, and so on, were spread abroad. These rumours, when sifted and reduced to distinct charges, and to the evidence that supported them, showed that, considering the circumstances, nothing very exceptional had taken place. One European had shot a native without justification, though it is but fair to the offender to state that he thought he was justified in doing what he did. Another European, believing that he had come upon an ambush, fired at what he supposed to be an hostile native man, and found that he had shot a native woman."

1. Will the Prime Minister cause inquiries to be made as to whether any trial and punishment were incurred by the alleged murderers referred to above; and will he communicate to the House the result of his inquiries?

2. Will he further inquire and state what are the ordinary conditions of life in New Guinea, if such conduct is regarded by the Administrator as "nothing very exceptional."

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable and learned member's questions are as follow:—

1. The alleged murderers were tried before the Chief Justice of British New Guinea, in November, 1901. The trial was a prolonged one, lasting two days. The result was that one man was found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The others were acquitted.

2. The alleged offences occurred during the progress of an armed expedition through territory the inhabitants of which were hostile. The phrase "ordinary conditions of life" cannot therefore be properly applied to such an incident. A considerable portion of British New Guinea is still unexplored; and even in the better-known districts the natives are hardly yet under the complete control of the Government.

I may add that the Lieutenant-Governor considered that Mr. Symons had acted indiscreetly in not retaining full control of the persons composing his party, and he removed him from his position as assistant magistrate of the district to perform duties of a different character.

TELEPHONE GUARANTEES.

Mr. CONROY asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether, in view of the fact that cash guarantees have been dispensed with in connexion with some telephone lines, the Postmaster-General will consider the advisability of proceeding with the following lines, which have been delayed in construction on account of guarantees being required :—

Binda to Bigga?

Bungonia to Goulburn?

Windellima to Goulburn or Bungendore (which ever is the more economical)?

Wombat to Murrumburrah or Young (which ever is the more economical)?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answer to the honorable and learned member's question is as follows :—

In cases where cash guarantees have been dispensed with, the estimated revenue has been considered sufficient to afford a reasonable return for the expenditure. With respect to the lines mentioned this is not the case, the particulars being as follow :—

Binda to Bigga. Estimated cost of erection, without including cost of operating, &c., is £490; the estimated revenue under £13 per annum.

Bungonia to Goulburn.—Estimated cost of erection, without including cost of operating, &c., is £312; the estimated revenue, £20 per annum.

Windellima to Goulburn.—No application has been received, but the estimated cost of erection, without including cost of operating, &c., is £579; the estimated revenue about £20 per annum.

Wombat to Murrumburrah or Young.—The cost would be about the same, and is estimated at £280, without including operating, &c.; the estimated revenue, £0 per annum.

Under these circumstances the Postmaster-General cannot favorably consider the provision of the lines without guarantees.

Mr. CONROY.—Cash or other guarantees?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Cash guarantees.

ALLEGED FEDERAL EXTRAVAGANCE.

Mr. HUME COOK.—In asking the series of questions, upon notice, standing in my name, I should like to make a short personal explanation. The questions are as follow :—

With reference to an article in the Age newspaper of the 15th instant—

1. Is it true "that through Federal extravagance the State Government do not receive the returns of revenue to which they are entitled." If not true, what are the facts?

2. Is it true "that dozens of officers whose positions were sinecures under the States were transferred to the Federal service at largely increased salaries"?

3. What is the total of new appointments?

4. Is it a fact that some State officers have been appointed to Federal positions "at double salaries." If so, how many, and what are the salaries paid?

5. Is it true that the private secretaries of two Ministers are being paid out of Commonwealth funds?

6. Are any officers of the Commonwealth service, whilst travelling, having their living expenses paid out of the public funds?

7. What was the Adelaide estimated cost of federation per head; and, including the proposed High Court expenditure, by how much has that estimate been exceeded?

8. What was the pre-federation cost of the military and naval forces, and what is the present cost?

9. What is the actual saving per head by the reduced military expenditure?

10. What is the net cost of federation per head of the population?

The article which prompted those questions, appeared in the Age of the 15th inst., and the questions were prepared with a view to getting an authoritative reply to the very important statements which it contained. Since then, in its issue of the 19th June, the Age has published the following statement :—

In the House of Representatives on Wednesday afternoon Mr. Hume Cook was put up to ask the Prime Minister a series of questions based upon an article published in the Age of Monday last in regard to Federal extravagance. One of these questions, at least, was framed in such a way as to distort the statement to which it was supposed to refer, possibly with the object of making a denial a little easier.

I should like to say that, if there is any unfairness in the questions as I have prepared them, I am solely responsible for it, my endeavour being, as I have said, to get an authoritative reply to the statements made in the article of the 15th. As to my being "put up," I desire to say that the questions were not suggested to me by any member of the Government or any member of this House. As a matter of fact I have had no consultation with any person, either inside or outside the chamber, in reference to them.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have had no consultation with the honorable member for Bourke, nor, so far as I am aware, has he consulted with any member of the Government, with regard to the questions of which he has given notice. Neither I nor, so far as I am aware, any member of my Cabinet knew of his intention to give notice of these questions until they appeared on the business-paper. The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. It is not correct to say that the State Governments do not receive the returns of revenue to which they are constitutionally entitled, or that they do not receive all that in honour and reason ought to be paid to them.

(a) The Commonwealth is bound by the Constitution to return at least three-fourths of the total net Customs and Excise revenues to the States.

(b) It is bound in honour and reason to return, beyond such three-fourths, any surplus after the requirements of the Departments of the Commonwealth have been economically provided for. During 1901-2, the only year for which complete figures are available, a sum of £888,742 over and above the necessary three-fourths was returned to the States. The subjoined table shows the exact figures :—

Commonwealth Treasury,
18th June, 1903.

GEO. T. ALLEN,
Secretary to Treasury.

2. It is not correct to say "that dozens of officers whose positions were sinecures under the States were transferred to the Federal service at largely increased salaries." This statement, besides being unjust to gentlemen who occupied onerous and responsible offices in the service of the States, is inaccurate in so far as it refers to the Commonwealth service.

It is true that some officers who were transferred from the States are receiving under the Commonwealth higher salaries than they received under the States; but this is in every case because they occupy higher and more responsible positions in the Commonwealth service. It is also true that the salaries attached to the higher offices referred to are in nearly every case less than the salaries attached to corresponding offices in the State services.

In justification of the statement referred to in the honorable member's question, the paper referred to published the following list, to which I have added, to illustrate the unfairness of the statements in question, the columns showing the salaries paid to the holders of similar offices in New South Wales and Victoria :—

There is ample proof to support the justness of these observations in a few selections from the Federal salary list :—

If officers who do little or no work for months while Parliament is out of session are not in the enjoyment of sinecures, it would be interesting for Sir Edmund Barton to explain what he regards as a "fat billet."

In correction of the figures in the Age, I might say that the salary of the President of the Senate is £1,100, not £1,500; that the State salary of the Clerk Assistant to the House of Representatives was £560, including two allowances, not £450; that the former salary of the Secretary to the Treasury was £700, not £600; and that the State salary of the Comptroller-General of Customs was, including an allowance of £200, £1,200, not £1,000. It should also be explained that the salary of £600 named in the table as attached to the position of Chief Parliamentary Reporter in Victoria is not fairly comparable with the salary of £700 paid by the Commonwealth, as the work controlled under the Commonwealth by this officer is, in Victoria, distributed between two officers, whose aggregate salaries amount to £1,210. To continue my answer to the honorable member's question—

As to these officers, with reference to whom it is suggested that "they do little or no work for months while Parliament is out of session," it is pointed out that this list includes nine Parliamentary and six non-Parliamentary officers. It is not correct to say that the Parliamentary officers have no work to do while Parliament is not in session; and it is also incorrect to say that Departmental officers, such as the Comptroller-General of Customs, the Secretary to the Treasury, the Secretary to the Post-office, "do little or no work for months while Parliament is out of session." It should further be stated that the salaries paid to the officers named are, in most cases, less than those attached to similar offices in Victoria or New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. I desire to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the course now being adopted by the Prime Minister is not an abuse of the ordinary method of questioning Ministers and eliciting replies?

Mr. SPEAKER.—What is the point of order?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My point is that the Prime Minister is reading an answer of inordinate length in answer to a question which should not have been placed upon the notice-paper.

Mr. WATSON.—The Prime Minister is giving us very interesting information.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Undoubtedly; if it were obtained in the ordinary way, but it is not such information as should be given in the form of an answer to a question. The Prime Minister is discussing certain statements which have appeared in the newspapers, and, if such a practice is to be permitted, there will be nothing to prevent any honorable member from embodying in a question the principal statements contained in a newspaper article, and eliciting from a Minister an argumentative statement in refutation. This practice might be carried to such a length that no other business could be transacted in the House. I submit that the question is out of order, and that the answer now being given is also out of order on account of its length and detail.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that it is a matter of everyday practice for questions to be asked whether statements in the newspapers are correct or otherwise, and inasmuch as news often appears in the newspapers before it can be made accessible to the public by means of official documents, one cannot wonder at the practice. I am confining my answer to a statement of the facts, and I submit that when I find that a newspaper contrasts the salaries attached to offices held in the States with those attaching to superior and more responsible positions in the Federal service, I am surely entitled to give details as to the salaries attached to positions in the States similar to those held by the Federal officers whose salaries are the subject of cavil.

Mr. CONROY.—I suggest that it might save time if direct answers were made to questions in the ordinary course. Another opportunity may be sought if it is thought necessary to place before honorable members details such as those now being submitted. If the course now being followed by the Prime Minister is to be permitted, I can conceive that it may lead to very serious abuse of the forms of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There is no standing order which prevents an honorable member from asking such a question as that placed upon the notice-paper by the honorable member for Bourke, or a Minister from giving a reply, even at such length as that now being offered. But it is contrary to custom, and to the best practice of Parliament, that a reply, involving so much detail, should be given in answer to a question. It is far better that details, such as those now being submitted, should be laid upon the table in the form of a return. In future, if I consider that any question is likely to call for detailed information, I shall intimate to the honorable member giving the notice that his question should take the form of a motion for a return. I shall be glad if Ministers will, in future, abstain from supplying particulars such as those now being given in the form of answers to questions.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I shall be very glad to follow the practice indicated by you, Mr. Speaker, because it will relieve me of the necessity of going into much detail. I have mentioned the figures given above by way of illustration only, because I have not been able to obtain full particulars. Of my own knowledge, however, I can say that the same comparisons would apply throughout, the difference being in some cases on the one side, and in some cases on the other. The answers to the other questions are as follow:—

3. The total of appointments to new offices created since the establishment of the Commonwealth is 26. If the honorable member intends his question to cover any wider ground than this I shall be happy to obtain the information.

4. Five officers are now receiving salaries double the amount they received in the States. They were specially selected, and are now performing much more onerous and responsible duties. Their aggregate salaries in the States were £740; their aggregate salaries now are £1,560. Corresponding positions in the public services of New South Wales and Victoria are more highly paid.

5. Ministers have no private secretaries. The official secretary to the Prime Minister and the official secretary to the representative of the Government in the Senate are both officers of the Commonwealth, under the Public Service Act, and their salaries as such are annually voted by Parliament.

6. Officers while travelling receive travelling allowances at a rate fixed by the public service regulations. There are no expenses allowed them beyond those stated.

7. The Adelaide estimate of the cost of Federation, including provision for the High Court, was 1s. 8d. per head. The expenditure for the half-year ending 30th June, 1901, was 4½d. per head; for the year 1901-2, 1s. 1d. per head; for the year ending 30th June, 1903, 1s. 1d. per head. Had the High Court been established in that financial year and throughout its currency the expenditure would have been increased by 2d. per head, if as much as £30,000 had been spent on it. This estimate does not include expenses not caused by federation, namely, administration of New Guinea and non-recurring expenditure—expenses of opening Parliament and Royal receptions and coronation celebrations.

8. The approximate expenditure for 1900-1 upon the military and naval forces was £860,000. This allows for the services now charged for in the votes of the Department, and also a sum of £25,000 for the expenses of salaries, pay, and contingencies of men away in South Africa, which are borne on present estimates. Estimate for 1903-4, say, £700,000; reduction, £160,000. Just before Federation the States very largely increased their defence expenditure, probably by £75,000, but it did not come into operation, except to a very small extent in 1900-1, and if it had, the amount for that year would, of course, be increased. Neither of the amounts given includes repairs, &c., which, however, would probably approximate pretty closely. In 1900-1 large sums were expended out of loan moneys for defence purposes, namely, £132,000, and although these would be far in excess of the amounts proposed for next year, they have not been taken into consideration.

Sir Edmund Barton.

9. The actual saving per head by the reduced military expenditure is about 10d.

10. The net cost of federation per head has been given in the answer to question 7.

The questions raised by the honorable member will be more fully dealt with by the Treasurer in his Budget statement.

OVERTIME : POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. HUGHES asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. How has the grant of £2,000 voted for deservng officers and overtime pay of Sydney Post-office officials been allocated?

2. Is it a fact that the whole, or practically the whole, of this sum has been paid to officers receiving over £200 a year, while lower grade officers have not only received no increments for ten years, but have not been paid anything for overtime since Christmas last, notwithstanding that they have been recalled to extra duty on the arrival of the English mails and other occasions when there has been an extra press of work?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answer to the honorable and learned member's questions is as follows:—

1 and 2. Nothing is known of the £2,000 referred to, but of the £1,000 provided on the Estimates of 1901-2 for increases to deservng officers, 33 officers with salaries over £200 received £415, and 81 officers of lower grade £585. Of the amount of £750 voted for the same purpose in 1902-3, 50 officers, receiving over £200 a year, obtained £475, and 48 of lower grade obtained £275. It is impossible to answer without names as to those who it is said have received no increases for 10 years, but it is assumed that they have received the maximum salary provided by the regulations as all others have received annual increments. The matter of payment for overtime is receiving consideration.

CUSTOMS FACILITIES, BURNIE.

Mr. HARTNOLL (for Sir EDWARD BRADDON) asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, upon notice—

Whether any steps have been taken—and what steps, if any—to effect the necessary improvements in the Customs accommodation and staff at the port of Burnie, Tasmania, as to which the Minister has been addressed at length by letter?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

These matters are under consideration in connexion with the Estimates.

TELEGRAPH GUARANTEES.

Mr. MAHON asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. Referring to the second paragraph of his reply in this House on 14th June, to questions concerning the Tarcoola telegraph line, does he not consider it his duty to obtain an estimate of the probable revenue to be derived from it before proceeding further with a work costing £14,000?

2. Referring to the third paragraph of his reply, are not the additional telegraph lines to Eucla and Yardea, mentioned by him, part of the main system between Western Australia and the Eastern States; and is not their construction rendered imperative by climatic or commercial reasons, on which the question of guarantee has little, if any bearing.

3. Does not the line to Tarcoola terminate at that place; and, if so, what is the justification for placing it, as his reply does, in the category of lines connecting two States of the Commonwealth.

4. Was any guarantee required before the Tarcoola telegraph line was undertaken; and, if not, why was the guarantee condition dispensed with.

5. Are recommendations of new works by local officers submitted to any scrutiny except that of the central authority in Melbourne.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—This matter comes within the Department of the Postmaster-General, who has supplied me with the following information:—

1. The Postmaster-General does not consider this necessary.

2. The additional telegraph lines to Eucla and Yardea mentioned constitute part of the State systems of Western Australia and South Australia respectively, and their construction is considered necessary for commercial reasons; therefore the question of guarantees was not considered in connexion with them.

3. The line to Tarcoola terminates for the present at that place; but it may eventually be extended to Western Australia in connexion with the suggested railway between South Australia and Western Australia.

4. No guarantee was required before the Tarcoola telegraph line was undertaken; the conditions were considered sufficient to justify the guarantee condition being dispensed with.

5. Recommendations of new works by local officers are dealt with in such manner as the Government or the Postmaster-General may consider most suitable under the circumstances of each case.

JUDICIARY BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 18th June, vide page 1155):

Clause 40—

The jurisdiction of Federal Courts shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the several Courts of the States in the following matters:—

- (a) Matters arising under any treaty;
- (b) Matters affecting consuls, or other representatives of other countries, in respect of any act done by them in their capacity as such consuls or representatives;
- (c) Suits between States, or between persons suing or being sued on behalf of different States, or between a State and a person suing or being sued on behalf of another State;

(d) Suits by the Commonwealth, or any person suing on behalf of the Commonwealth, against a State, or any person being sued on behalf of a State;

(e) Suits against the Commonwealth;

(f) Matters in which an order or writ is sought to be obtained against an officer of the Commonwealth in respect of some act done or omitted to be done by him in the execution of his duty.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Attorney-General).—I propose to meet the criticism which has been directed against the first portion of this clause, by substituting for the words "Federal Courts" the words "the High Court." On a former occasion it was pointed out by several honorable members, that although the phrase "Federal Courts" includes the "High Court," at the present time it is not proposed to establish any Federal Court other than the High Court, and that perhaps it would be as well to leave that plain. I therefore move—

That the words "Federal Courts," line 1, be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "the High Court."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Personally I think that the amendment proposed ought to be made. It would be a mistake to include in this Bill the words "Federal Courts," because, when we come to create Federal Courts by special Act of Parliament, the question of the extent of their jurisdiction will be settled by the Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I move—

That the words "against the Commonwealth," line 19, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "by a State, or any person suing on behalf of a State against the Commonwealth, or any person being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth."

When this measure was previously under discussion, it was pointed out that these words might possibly cover a number of actions in different parts of Australia where it would be difficult for litigants to await a visit from a Justice of the High Court. I therefore propose to omit them, and to introduce words which will simply cover actions by a State against the Commonwealth. These will have the effect of making the provision precisely parallel with that contained in the previous paragraph.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I would point out that if the amendment proposed by the Attorney-General be agreed to, there will be no power to decide the extent of the area within which exclusive jurisdiction is to be vested in the High Court. In the discussion which took place on Thursday last, several suggestions were made as to the particular provisions of the clause which ought to be retained, and those which ought to be eliminated. I think it was the honorable and learned member for Bendigo who suggested that paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) ought to be excised. The Attorney-General, however, proposes to retain paragraphs (a) and (b).

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will show why.

Mr. GLYNN.—We all know well enough that actions in matters arising under treaties will be very rare indeed. But if such cases do arise, why should we confine jurisdiction in them to the High Court? Under this Bill defendants are empowered to remove suits involving a matter of Federal jurisdiction from the States Courts to the High Court, so that Commonwealth interests, if they are involved, are amply protected, if the clauses relating to the removal of causes are retained. But even if those clauses perish, a right of appeal to the High Court will still remain. Thus, any interests which the Commonwealth may have in any matter are thoroughly guarded. Something may possibly be said in favour of conferring exclusive jurisdiction on the High Court in cases arising under any treaty. That is not a very important matter, but as the honorable and learned member for Bendigo spoke strongly upon it, and as he is absent to-day, I venture to call attention to it. Further, I do not see why States Courts should not have concurrent jurisdiction in matters affecting consuls. I remember a case which occurred in Adelaide a few months ago, in which action was taken for the recovery of £15, which had been paid to a consul under the Merchant Shipping Act, and which sum was held in trust by him for certain sailors. In that case the consul was sued by a creditor of one of the sailors. It was a comparatively trivial matter. Surely it is not advisable that jurisdiction in a case of that sort shall be exclusively vested in the High Court? If it is, either the suitor will have to await the visit of a Judge upon circuit, or the suit will have to be heard at the seat of Government, wherever that may happen to be. I ask the Attorney-General to agree to the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and to excise paragraphs (a) and (b) in addition to some of the succeeding paragraphs?

Mr. DEAKIN.—When this matter was previously under discussion, I had an opportunity of replying to the honorable and learned member for Bendigo upon both the points which have been raised. In answer to an interjection, I think he admitted that he had never known of a case under a treaty arising in Australia, and he had great difficulty in conceiving how one could arise. Under the circumstances, I put it to him that no possible injury could follow the retention of exclusive jurisdiction in the Commonwealth Courts. Moreover, it is clearly a matter which for the dignity of the Commonwealth and of its Courts ought to be dealt with by them. The cases provided for under the clause are limited to those which arise in consequence of some alleged breach in a treaty obligation.

Mr. GLYNN.—I think that the honorable and learned member for Indi raised a similar point.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think not. The honorable and learned member for Indi referred to paragraphs (e) and (f). Seeing that the Federal Government is charged with responsibility in all matters arising under any treaty, it would be only proper, if such a case did occur, that it should be dealt with by the High Court. I put that point as a matter of no very great importance from the standpoint of litigants, but as of some importance from the point of view of the dignity of the Commonwealth and its Courts. In the same way the honorable and learned member for Bendigo directed attention to the possibility of actions of any kind being taken against the consuls of other countries, and quoted from the United States practice in this connexion. But it was pointed out to him that under this provision the area covered had been expressly limited to actions against any Consul in his representative capacity. Thereupon the honorable and learned member for Bendigo admitted that such cases would be of very rare occurrence, and I understood—though he did not discuss the question further—that he was generally satisfied that these two paragraphs might be retained without injury to any one. The whole burden of the argument which took place was directed against paragraphs (e) and (f), and it is in one of them that I propose to make the amendment which I have already submitted. It was admitted that a number of these cases might arise, and it can well be argued, that if litigants have to await the sittings of the High Court in remote States, they might be involved in additional expense. I ask the Committee to accept the amendment which I have moved.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I desire to move a prior amendment if the Attorney-General will permit me to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GLYNN.—With regard to cases which may arise under treaties, I offer no objection to the provision in its present form; but I think I have already shown that there is some reason for making the jurisdiction conferred by paragraph (b) concurrent. Time after time claims will arise by sailors against consuls, or by parties having claims against the wages of sailors. Surely in such cases it is inadvisable that exclusive jurisdiction should be vested in the High Court. We ought not to increase the expense incurred by litigants in such pettifogging cases. I would further point out that this paragraph proposes to confer upon the High Court a jurisdiction which does not exist under the American Constitution. In America the jurisdiction of the Court in such cases is purely concurrent. I therefore move—

That paragraph (b) be omitted.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I hope that the Attorney-General will consent to the amendment proposed. I would point out that the honorable and learned member for Bendigo and the honorable and learned member for Corinella both urged the same objections to this paragraph that are now being put forward by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn. I am sure that the Committee desire to prevent the possibility of the expense to litigants being increased. Let me invite the attention of honorable members to what would occur if an action under this clause arose in Western Australia, and required to be determined at once. In such a contingency, the High Court would have to go to Western Australia or the litigants would have to come here. In either case there would be unnecessary expense. Personally, I think that when we come to discuss the appellate clauses of the Bill we can well allow any Court to determine matters such as those which are mentioned in paragraph (b). Then, if the Commonwealth is dissatisfied with any decision in which it is interested, it has the right of appeal from the State Supreme Court to the High Court. Thus the whole difficulty would be solved. I trust that what was the evident desire of those honorable and learned members, who had looked into this question, will be followed.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I am disinclined to agree with the honorable and learned member for Werriwa. If his idea be adopted I think that the expenses incurred by consuls who desire to secure justice will be increased. I take it that the settlement of these matters by the High Court is necessary to secure absolute uniformity in decisions. If each State Court is allowed to give its own judgment, it may happen that these judgments will be in conflict.

Mr. CONROY.—There is always the right of appeal to the High Court.

Mr. MAHON.—Exactly. A consul in Western Australia who was subjected to a decision by the Supreme Court of that State which conflicted with a judgment by the Supreme Court of New South Wales, would naturally feel that he had been denied justice, and would appeal to the High Court; whereas, if that tribunal had dealt with his case in Perth in the first place, he would have obtained satisfaction at much less expense. Consequently, under the clause as it stands, litigants would secure finality quicker than they would under the amendment proposed.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—In reply to the honorable member for Coolgardie, I would point out that the States Courts practically sit all the year round. If the High Court is composed of either three or five Justices, it will be impossible for them to visit the remote States more than once in six months.

Mr. MAHON.—In certain circumstances the litigants might come to the High Court.

Mr. CONROY.—Under such a provision the expense involved may be so great as to prevent them from obtaining justice. If appellate jurisdiction is to be vested in the High Court, it is clearly within the power of that tribunal to correct all conflicting judgments. In the event of a decision being given by one of these States Courts, with which the Commonwealth Government was dissatisfied, an appeal would always lie to the High Court. Thus uniformity would be obtained for all practical purposes, and at very much less expense than would be the case under the provisions of this clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I move—

That the words "against the Commonwealth," line 19, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "by a State or any person suing on behalf of a State against the Commonwealth, or any person being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth."

The amendment simply renders the sub-clause parallel with the preceding sub-clause. We have provided that jurisdiction in suits by the Commonwealth against a State shall be exclusive, and I now propose a similar provision in regard to suits by a State against the Commonwealth. It was generally agreed, when the Bill was last before us, that these were two classes of cases in regard to which the jurisdiction might very properly be vested exclusively in the High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—

If any jurisdiction is made exclusive, the jurisdiction contemplated in this sub-clause should also be exclusive. From my own point of view I should trust the States Supreme Courts with any power; but, if the Committee determined to make any jurisdiction exclusive, I see no objection to this sub-clause as amended. It will still be competent for a public servant to bring a suit in a Supreme Court to recover from the Commonwealth salary or damages for wrongful dismissal; the States Supreme Courts will still be available for small actions which continually arise between a Government and its employés.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—

Is there any objection to excluding sub-clause (f), which provides that the jurisdiction of the High Court shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the States Courts in—

Matters in which an order or writ is sought to be obtained against an officer of the Commonwealth, in respect of some act done or omitted to be done by him in the execution of his duty.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall not object if the honorable and learned member desires to move the omission of the sub-clause.

Amendment (by Mr. HIGGINS) agreed to—

That sub-clause (f) be omitted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 41—

1. The jurisdiction of Federal Courts in matters not mentioned in the last preceding section shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the several Courts of the States, except as provided in this section.

2. In such matters the several Courts of the States shall, within the limits of their several jurisdictions, whether such limits are as to locality, subject-matter, or otherwise, be invested with Federal jurisdiction, subject to the following conditions and restrictions:—

- (a) except as hereinafter provided Federal jurisdiction shall not be exercised by a superior Court of a State otherwise than as a Court of first instance;
- (b) except as hereinafter provided every appeal from a decision of a Court or Judge of a State exercising Federal jurisdiction, not being an appeal from one inferior Court to another inferior Court, shall be brought to the High Court;
- (c) provided nevertheless that in any suit in the Supreme Court of a State which cannot be removed by a defendant into the High Court as of right, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction as well as jurisdiction as a Court of first instance;
- (d) wherever an appeal would lie, but for this Act, from a decision of any Court or Judge of a State to the Supreme Court of the State, an appeal from the decision shall lie to the High Court.
- (e) wherever a decision of a Court or Judge of a State is declared by the law of the State to be final, the High Court may, if the decision is given in the exercise of Federal jurisdiction, grant special leave to appeal from the decision to the High Court.
- (f) The Federal jurisdiction of a Court of summary jurisdiction of a State shall not be judicially exercised except by a Stipendiary or Police or Special Magistrate, or some Magistrate of the State who is specially authorized by the Governor-General to exercise such jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I move—

That the words "Federal Courts," line 1, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "the High Court."

This is a similar amendment to that which has been made in the preceding clause.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Is the Attorney-General's idea that in all matters not specified in clause 40 the High Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction—that except where by clause 41 concurrent jurisdiction is given to the States Courts the High Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction? I understand that a subsequent amendment is to be proposed by the Attorney-General carrying out the suggestion made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and supported by several other honorable members, that concurrent jurisdiction shall in all matters not specified in clause 40 be given to the States Courts. If the States Courts are to have this concurrent jurisdiction why not strike out the whole of sub-clause (2)? We have just settled what is to be the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court; and the Attorney-General, by not excising the words to which I have called attention, leaves any other matters which are not mentioned to be matters of exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We afterwards give all the jurisdiction back.

Mr. GLYNN.—Is not that an extraordinary way of drafting? In the beginning of the clause we declare certain things which it appears there is to be a subsequent provision to negative. We start by declaring that, in all matters not mentioned in clause 40, the High Court is to have exclusive jurisdiction, and the Attorney-General asks us to do that, because he proposes to immediately afterwards undo it. Surely that is patching rather than clearly drafting a Bill. If the words to which I have called attention be excised, the clause will simply declare that the Courts of the States shall, within the limits of their several jurisdictions, have the exercise of the judicial power of the Commonwealth; in other words, that the States Courts shall have all parts of the judicial power which are not appellate, and which are not, by clause 40, exclusively vested in the High Court. It is the method of drafting to which I object. I do not wish to move an amendment, but merely to make a suggestion.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, admits that all that is involved is a question of method—of the manner in which a thing sought to be done is to be done. We are agreed as to what is to be done, and I propose to take steps in the remainder of the clause to accomplish all that the honorable and learned member desires. But I ask the honorable and learned member not to offer any objection to the sub-clause being retained, because it is deliberately adopted with a view to render it perfectly clear that the investing of the Federal jurisdiction is an investing under this Bill of the whole of the Federal jurisdiction in the High Court—with a view to putting beyond all question the fact that nothing has been omitted.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is making the jurisdiction exclusive.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We make it exclusive in the first instance, and then we invest the States Courts, subject to their own limitations, with the whole of this jurisdiction.

Mr. CONROY.—But the Attorney-General goes further than that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—One point at a time. I wish to make it perfectly plain that the object is to place it beyond doubt that all Federal jurisdiction is first of all exclusively vested in the High Court, and then is shared concurrently with the Courts of the several States. That procedure will, in my opinion, place beyond all question what the full meaning and extent of this investing is, and the method to which exception has been taken, is adopted for this particular purpose. If there be any other point in connexion with this clause which honorable members desire to discuss, I shall be happy to discuss it; but I wish it to be perfectly clear on the face of the measure, and perfectly clear in words which, in the opinion of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, are, at the utmost, unnecessary; that the investiture of States Courts is an investiture of Federal jurisdiction which has been first made exclusive in the High Court, and which then comes from the High Court—as an express endowment of States Courts over again, if honorable members like to so regard it—of what is distinctly Federal jurisdiction. This is done to mark off the more emphatically the jurisdiction given through the High Court from any jurisdiction at present belonging to the States Courts.

Mr. MAHON.—What will be the position of a private individual who wishes to recover damages against the Commonwealth?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Such a private individual may bring his suit in any court.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—So far as the mere matter of expression is involved, I do not feel justified in interfering with the drafting of the measure. I never do so interfere, because it is utterly impossible for a large body like this Committee to draft a Bill; and the responsibility in this connexion must rest on the Attorney-General. But I think this particular clause raises some very grave questions of substance. In clause 40 we have defined where the High Court is to have exclusive jurisdiction, and in clause 41 we sought to show where the High Court is to have concurrent jurisdiction with the Supreme Courts, or other Courts of the States. Of course, the simple and obvious way of doing this would be to provide that the jurisdiction of the High Court shall be concurrent with the Courts of the States in certain matters. However, the Attorney-General, in the exercise of his discretion, has said that he would like to provide first that it shall be exclusive, and afterwards to use special granting words in regard to it. I should not strenuously object to that, as I feel that we may attain the same object in other ways, if the Committee accede to my views. If honorable members will look at what the honorable and learned gentleman proposes to insert in clause 41 in lieu of paragraphs (a), (b), and (c), it will be seen that he wishes to substitute the High Court for the Full Courts of the States. I hope I am not dealing with technicalities more than is absolutely necessary, because it is a very important matter, and will go to the very root of the position of the High Court. The amendment says—

Every appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of a State or any other Court of a State from which, at the establishment of the Commonwealth, an appeal lay to the Queen in Council, shall be brought to the High Court.

I think I am right in saying that the object of the Attorney-General is to prevent an appeal from a Judge of first instance in a Supreme Court to the Full Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not now. Not under the new paragraph. I have had to abandon the original proposal in consequence of the amendments which have been made, and if my honorable and learned friend will look at the amendment, I think he will see that it does not affect any appeal to the Supreme Court of a State, but affects only appeals from the Supreme Court of a State.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Does the term Supreme Court include the Full Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is to say, an appeal may be brought from the Judge of first instance to the Full Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There may now.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is very material that the intention of the honorable and learned gentleman shall be carried into effect, and I think we are justified in calling attention to the drafting, because I certainly read the provision in the form in which he says it ought not to be read. I take it that it never was the intention of the Constitution to substitute the High Court for the Full Court of the State. It was the intention of the Constitution to give the High Court the same jurisdiction as the Privy Council. Supposing that a man has been made insolvent by the order of a Judge. If he is made insolvent his hands are tied, he cannot deal with his assets. These are vested in the assignee or trustee, and there he is helpless. Supposing that a mistake has been made, at the present time he is able to appeal to the Full Court, and very often he can be heard the next month. It is important that we should provide that that right of appeal shall not be taken away, because, if we restrict the right of appeal to the High Court, which must consist of three or four Judges at least for the purpose of an appeal, it will mean that the litigant will have to wait the time of five Judges who will have duties all over Australia, as distinguished from five, six, or seven Judges in a particular State, and his chances of getting his appeal heard will be much less. I think the Attorney-General has intimated that he is in favour of what we suggested on the last occasion—leaving the Full Court with that same jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We must be now.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Quite so. The honorable and learned gentleman desires to delete the words "in such matters" at the beginning of sub-clause (2), so that it shall then read as follows:—

The several Courts of the States shall within the limits of their several jurisdictions, whether such limits are as to locality, subject-matter, or otherwise, be invested with Federal jurisdiction, subject to the following conditions and restrictions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; the words are to come in after the word "jurisdiction," so that the provision will then read—

In all matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction may be conferred upon it, except as provided in the last preceding section, and subject to the following conditions and restrictions.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have not had the privilege of seeing the list of amendments until this moment. I understand the honorable and learned gentleman to wish that the several Courts of the States shall be invested with Federal jurisdiction in all matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction may be conferred upon it?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We transfer the whole—we give a complete endowment to the States Courts.

Mr. HIGGINS. — Yes, but there is to follow the new paragraph which appears on the sheet which has been circulated—

Every appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of a State, or any other Court of a State, from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lay to the Queen in Council shall be brought to the High Court.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That is in Federal matters only.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Quite so. I understand that it is so far limited. It is not clear, but I think it may be made clear that the Supreme Court of a State includes the Full Court and the appeals to it; that, in fact, there is no appeal to the High Court until after the Full Court has had a chance of dealing with the case.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Under that part, yes. There is a later paragraph, but I do not think it affects the honorable and learned member's point. We strike out paragraphs (a), (b), and (c), but we leave paragraph (d), which gives an option afterwards.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I should like the Attorney-General to state exactly what is the area of the proposed alterations. I feel that I am going a little on supposition here. Suppose that an action involving Federal jurisdiction is tried before a Judge in the Supreme Court of a State. In all cases, even those which involve Federal jurisdiction, there is an appeal to the Full Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think that will be clear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am quite sure that the honorable and learned gentleman will satisfy himself that the words convey that intention. Paragraph (d) refers to an appeal from a decision—that is, of the Full Court or of the Judge of first instance.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It gives an optional appeal. In all these cases it rests with the litigant to say whether he will appeal to the Full Court or to the High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—As the amendments have only just been circulated, it is advisable that the honorable and learned gentleman should make an explanation to the Committee.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did not make the explanation before, because I isolated, so to speak, the point raised as to the question of drafting. But as I gather from the tacit assent of my honorable and learned friend, Mr. Glynn, and the remarks of the last speaker, that this question is waived, I am only too willing to proceed to the matter of substance, which is of extreme importance. Honorable members will notice that the amendment proposed to be made in the first part of sub-clause 2 is of great importance. Taking out the words "in such matters," we commence the sub-clause with the words "the several Courts of the States," and we then proceed within their respective limits, of whatever nature they may be, to invest them with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. WATSON.—Does that mean the geographical limits of the State?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, whatever the limits may be. There are in New South Wales District Courts, in Victoria County Courts, which entertain cases up to, I think, £250. Whatever their limits are, within those limits the State Courts are to be invested with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN.—Not absolutely. It is only given where an Act of Parliament gives it, or where the Constitution Act gives original jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly; we give all that we have to give.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is left to be subsequently added to.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not able to agree with my honorable and learned friend.

Mr. GLYNN.—That is how the amendment reads undoubtedly.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the honorable member will look at that part of the sub-clause again he will see that the endowment is as absolute as it can be made. If he can point to any way in which it can be made more absolute, I shall be very glad to adopt it. We commence the sub-clause by saying that the several Courts of the States within their several limits shall be vested with Federal jurisdiction, and we then introduce words to make it perfectly clear, so far as we can, that we convey the whole of the Federal jurisdiction as far as we can invest it.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Would that mean investing the whole of the powers contained in section 76?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We say so.

In all matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction may be conferred upon it.

So far as we can deal with original jurisdiction at all, by those words we invest the States Courts with the whole of that jurisdiction—put it beyond all question by explicit words. Next we proceed to say—

Except as provided in the last preceding section.

That, of course, is necessary, because in clause 40 we have left a few matters, which are still to be exclusively in the High Court. But, by this form of words, we make it as plain as it can be made that, with the exception of those few matters, we vest the whole of the jurisdiction of the High Court. Now we come to the first affirmative proposition. We strike out paragraphs (a) (b) and (c) from the sub-clause, and substitute the new paragraph, which was printed and circulated last week, as follows:—

Every appeal from a decision of a Supreme Court of a State, or any other Court of a State from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lay to the Queen in Council shall be brought to the High Court.

The other Courts which are there alluded to are the Equity Court in New South Wales, the Equity Court in Victoria, where the decision of a single Judge may be appealed against to the King in Council, and also that curious Court which is peculiar to South Australia. These are the only Courts from which an appeal lay to the Queen in Council at the time of the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Bill. So that practically the substance of that paragraph relates to the appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of a State. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has asked whether that includes a decision of the Full Court of the State. I take it that it does, that it in no respect alters, at all events it is not intended to alter, the present system by which appeals can be taken from a single Judge of a State Court to the Full Court of that State. The paragraph refers only to appeals which, having reached that stage, may otherwise be sent to the King in Council without going before the High Court, even although they were matters of Federal jurisdiction. This paragraph says that if there be an appeal in such a case, the parties not being satisfied with the decision of the Full Court of the State, that appeal shall be brought to the High Court. The operation of the provision is practically external, if I may use the word, to the notice of the Supreme Court, to which I understand that my honorable and learned friend, the member for Northern Melbourne, was alluding when asked whether the endowment of the States Courts was absolute, and whether or not it was intended to interfere with their appeals within their own States, I replied distinctly that that was not intended, except so far as paragraph (d), confers that option. We have not arrived at paragraph (d) yet, but I have called attention to it. That paragraph says—

Wherever an appeal would lie but for this Act, from a decision of any Court or Judge of a State to the Supreme Court of the State, an appeal from the decision shall lie to the High Court.

But that is not an exclusive appeal. It does not interfere with the existing right of appeal, from, say, a District Court Judge or any County Court Judge to the Supreme Court of the State. But it does provide an option to which, at the risk of somewhat confusing the argument on this point, I would call the honorable and learned member's attention.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—An appeal would lie from a State Judge exercising Federal jurisdiction to the Full Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly; under my new paragraph it comes before the High Court on appeal from the Full Court of a State.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—A litigant can appeal to the Full Court of his State, or to the High Court, at his own choice?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—And in any case an appeal lies to the Full Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In any case it lies to the Full Court.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—It seems to me that a portion of New South Wales is at present cut off almost completely, so far as concerns ordinary access to its own State Court. I refer to the district of Broken Hill. I was wondering whether this would be the proper place in which to introduce some provision that would allow the people of Broken Hill to go to the State Court at Adelaide if they thought fit. The clause under consideration seems in a manner to continue existing limits as to locality of venue; and I was wondering whether it would not be possible to insert some clause under which, so far as concerns Federal cases, the people of Broken Hill might have resort to the Supreme Court of the neighbouring State.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Of course, the honorable member for Bland clearly understands that it is only possible in this measure to deal with questions of Federal jurisdiction, and he also knows that its matters of original jurisdiction are now considerably limited. We are, so far as we can, transferring the whole of the Federal jurisdiction to the States Supreme Courts. There is no provision at present for such cases as those to which the honorable member has called attention.

Mr. WATSON.—Would it not be possible to insert something to meet them?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The question involves some very difficult problems, but I will give consideration to it and reply at a later stage. The honorable member understands that in some matters of Federal jurisdiction it would be possible for a litigant at Broken Hill to appeal to a Justice of the High Court if he were in Adelaide. But the honorable member desires me to consider whether it would not be possible to allow matters of Federal jurisdiction affecting certain parts of New South Wales to be dealt with by a State Judge of South Australia. That would be an entirely different problem.

Mr. WATSON.—It seems to me at the first blush that it should not be impossible to enable the people of Broken Hill to go to other courts than the courts of New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—My strong objection to this clause remaining as it stands relates to the form of drafting. We have struck out paragraphs (e) and (f) of clause 40. Now, in clause 41, we are giving back again to the High Court the powers we took from it under clause 40. There is a danger in allowing this drafting to remain, because, in passing other Acts, we may forget to state where the jurisdiction shall lie. In bankruptcy cases, where, of course, there ought to be a Judge sitting in each State—because it is of the greatest importance to the commercial world that such cases should be settled speedily, whatever decision is arrived at—we may find people in Brisbane having to wait until a High Court Judge visits them, or cases in Perth may be delayed until a Judge of the High Court goes to Western Australia. I cannot understand the Attorney-General's reason for striking out provisions from clause 40, and then in the first three lines of clause 41 practically reintroducing the same jurisdiction. Let me make this matter perfectly plain to honorable members. We have first of all struck out of clause 40 certain paragraphs, and have consequently taken away the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court as to those matters. Then, in the first few lines of clause 41, we give back again the whole of that exclusive jurisdiction. It is true that the Attorney-General points out that, in subsequent parts of the clause, there is a limitation as to that exclusive jurisdiction. But, by leaving in these words, the effect may be that in passing patent laws, bankruptcy laws, and divorce laws, we shall each time have to make provision as to where cases are to be settled, and by what courts they are to be tried. An omission to make such a statement in any future Act would vest the jurisdiction in the High Court exclusively. I cannot conceive of a more dangerous provision being inserted having regard to the contingency that we might allow a Bankruptcy Bill to go through Parliament without making provision for the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Can the honorable and learned member conceive of a Bankruptcy Bill that did not provide for the courts by which cases were to be tried?

Mr. CONROY.—My objection is that this clause reinvests jurisdiction exclusively in the High Court. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, agrees with me on this point; and I ask the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne whether he is not of the same opinion? I ask the Attorney-General himself whether it is not true that the effect of the first three lines of clause 41 is to give back to the High Court the jurisdiction taken from it by clause 40?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Has not the honorable and learned member failed to read the amendment circulated?

Mr. CONROY.—I am sufficiently answered by the Attorney-General's silence.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, the honorable and learned member is not; this is simply a means to an end.

Mr. CONROY.—The only limitation is contained in paragraph (d). This is a matter of such importance that the Attorney-General might as well take the Bill back and redraft it in the light of the decisions of the Committee upon clause 40. If he does not, he will place a great many honorable members in the unfortunate position that when the Bill comes up for its third reading they will be compelled to vote against it, however much they might be disposed to go part of the way with the majority.

Mr. HUGHES (West Sydney).—I should like to hear from the Attorney-General some answer to the statement that this clause gives back to the High Court the jurisdiction which was taken away in the preceding clause. It seems to me to be clear that it does so. In clause 75 of the Constitution it is provided that the High Court shall have original jurisdiction in five matters. It was sought, in this Bill, to make that original jurisdiction exclusive. Of those five matters, we have agreed to strike out three. We have left matters arising under any treaty, suits between States, and suits between the Commonwealth and any person. Those are matters in which, under the Constitution, the High Court has original jurisdiction, and upon which, by this Bill, exclusive jurisdiction was sought to be given to it. It is sought now to give the Supreme Courts jurisdiction in matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction may be conferred upon it, "except as provided in the last preceding section." I am not quite clear which clause that is. I suppose it is clause 41. I am bound to say, however, that the whole matter will be very ambiguous. One point is very clear, however, and that is, that what we effected by amending clause 40 is undone by clause 41 as it now stands. The Attorney-General contends that the matter will be made quite clear if a certain amendment, of which he has given notice, is agreed to. I do not think it will. The proposal is that sub-clause (2) shall be amended so that it will read as follows :—

The several Courts of the States shall, within the limits of their several jurisdictions, whether such limits are as to locality, subject-matter, or otherwise, be invested with Federal jurisdiction in all matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction may be conferred upon it. . . .

That is to say, they are to have jurisdiction in respect of all matters under section 75 of the Constitution. That jurisdiction is to be as exclusive as—

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. It sets out what jurisdiction the States Courts are to be invested with. It is investing the States Courts with all the jurisdiction.

Mr. HUGHES.—The position must be very clear to the Attorney-General, or he would not stand by his proposal; but if any honorable member can prove to me that the effect of clause 41 is not to take away directly the effect of the amendments made in clause 40, I shall be happy to receive that explanation.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I think I should intimate at this stage that I intend to move an amendment of the amendment to insert new paragraph (a), notice of which has been given by the Attorney-General. The proposed new paragraph provides that—

Every appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of a State, or any other Court of a State, from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lay to the Queen in Council, shall be brought to the High Court.

In my opinion, that provision would be void as a matter of law.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—I understand from the Attorney-General that clause 41 vests the superior as well as the inferior courts of the States with jurisdiction?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I presume that it is designed to confer upon them jurisdiction in regard to all laws made under the authority of Parliament?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That being so, I think I should illustrate the point I desire to make by referring to the Immigration Restriction Act, which provides that penalties shall be imposed on summary conviction, but prescribes no tribunal for hearing cases of the kind. The words "summary conviction" appear in the Act, but no court is vested with jurisdiction. The Attorney-General will also observe that in the Punishment of Offences Act 1901, we make provision to carry on pending the establishment of the High Court, and we must remember that on the passing of this Bill, all the authority conferred on States Courts under that Act will cease. I desire, only as a matter of interpretation, to learn whether the Attorney-General considers that this clause will be sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon all inferior courts to hear cases under Commonwealth Acts, which impose certain penalties for certain offences, but which do not give jurisdiction to any particular court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Before the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne moves the amendment of which he has given notice, I should like to reply to the honorable member for West Sydney. I presume that he was absent when I explained that the object of the first sub-clause is to carry out precisely what he desires shall be done. It proposes to take all the Federal jurisdiction outside the exclusive jurisdiction, and vest it in the High Court, in order that the whole of it shall then be transferred from the High Court to the States Courts. I believe that object will be effectively accomplished by the sub-clauses which follow. Having vested the whole body of Federal jurisdiction, outside clause 40, in the High Court, we next provide in sub-clause (2), in the widest words I have been able to find, that the whole of the Federal jurisdiction shall be vested in the States Courts, subject to certain limitations. We thus give them an area of authority which embraces, as the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs has pointed out, the vesting of jurisdiction in them, to deal with cases under all the Commonwealth statutes in which penalties have been imposed, but in which the inferior courts required to act have not been specified. I am unable to conceive of a more complete vesting of all the Federal jurisdiction in the States Courts.

Mr. GLYNN.—All that can be conferred upon them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. I am not speaking of the possibilities of the future. I take it that the very essence of any amending Act, or any Act dealing with any extension of jurisdiction that may be passed, will be a provision as to the courts by which that jurisdiction shall be exercised, and the extent to which it shall be employed. It is at this point that I part company with the honorable and learned member for Werriwa. I cannot conceive that any House of Parliament would be so blind to the position as to proceed to greatly extend the jurisdiction of the High Court, or other Federal tribunals, without at the same time making provision for the exercise of that jurisdiction. Even a Parliament in which there was not one member of the legal profession would not do that. I am not attempting, in this Bill, to provide for all the extensions of jurisdiction which this Parliament, or future Parliaments, may think fit to authorize. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Surely it is enough to provide here, in the amplest way, for all the matters with which we have power to deal, and all the jurisdiction which we are actually vesting. If we give to the States Courts all the jurisdiction that we now have power to give, why should we enter upon the consideration of questions of what we might or might not give in the future?

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I feel that the Attorney-General himself has fully justified my objection. When the Committee dealt with clause 40, it laid down the very definite principle that the High Court should be practically an appellate court. The object which the Committee had in view in making that provision was to save expense. Honorable members saw that if original jurisdiction other than that absolutely conferred by the Constitution were given to the High Court, fifteen or twenty Judges, instead of five, would be necessary, or a number of inferior courts would have to be created.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are not departing from that principle.

Mr. CONROY.—The Attorney-General admits that he has gone outside it, and that he intends to extend the jurisdiction of the High Court, unless certain restrictive clauses are contained in every measure which we may subsequently pass. If we were to pass any Bill in which there was not a restrictive clause, the jurisdiction to deal with cases under it would vest in the High Court.

Mr. WATSON.—The exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. CONROY.—That practically would be the result. The Attorney-General admitted that it would be so when he asked the Committee whether there would not be a sufficient number of lawyers in the House to see that every Bill brought forward contained a few clauses determining what court should exercise jurisdiction under it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member is not applying my statement correctly.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not see how the honorable and learned gentleman can get away from that position. I intend to move—

That sub-clause (1) be omitted.

We cannot foresee what will be the absolute result of this clause if it is allowed to remain in its present form, and, therefore, I think it should be redrafted. If the Attorney-General is desirous of following the principle laid down by the Committee, that the High Court shall be only an appellate court, he can readily draft a few clauses clearly embodying that proposal. In every Bill passed by this Parliament in future it will be necessary to provide where jurisdiction under it begins and ends. If we fail to do so we shall find the jurisdiction of the High Court practically exclusive under it. Even if this were not quite so, the practical effect of omitting such a provision would be to vest the High Court with jurisdiction, and in that way we should go beyond the principle that we have decided upon in striking out paragraphs (e) and (f) of clause 40, and also certain provisions in clause 31.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I should like to ask the Attorney-General whether, as the object which he has in view can be accomplished in the way proposed by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa—and as there is some doubt as to the expediency of allowing these words to remain—it would not be better to make the amendment suggested. As a matter of fact, I had given notice of an amendment to omit these words before clause 40 was dealt with. This clause is open to an objection similar to that raised to clause 40, although not to the same extent. Under clause 40, it was originally proposed to confer upon the High Court exclusive jurisdiction, with one exception, in all cases, arising under section 75 of the Constitution. The one case omitted from that clause, however, was impliedly re-inserted in clause 41, so that the clause was open to the objection which has been so strongly urged by the honorable and learned members for West Sydney and Werriwa before the amendment was made. The objection holds now with double force. As the desired change can be made in one general statement instead of two, would it not be better for the Attorney-General to allow those words to be struck out? I quite admit that the subsequent amendment proposed to be made, if we interpret it in the way in which the Attorney-General desires, though it is a little ambiguous, modifies the effect of the retention of these words. But surely it is bad drafting to first put in words which say a certain thing and afterwards to abrogate them by a subsequent part of the clause? The general rule of construction is that words are put in for some purpose, and if the purpose cannot be clearly shown the Judges will not know what to do. The Attorney-General thinks that by the proposal he makes he is really vesting the Courts of the States with full concurrent jurisdiction, and I understand the honorable and learned gentleman to mean that he is giving it wherever the High Court has original jurisdiction, and wherever we can give jurisdiction under section 76 of the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is so.

Mr. GLYNN.—There is an ambiguity in the way in which the honorable and learned gentleman proposes to do that, because the proposed amendment reads—

In all matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction may be conferred upon it, except as provided in the last preceding section.

The jurisdiction may be conferred upon it by a specific Act of Parliament. The clause may not be read as the Attorney-General evidently intends that it should be read, "in all matters in which original jurisdiction can be conferred upon it." That is the honorable and learned gentleman's intention evidently.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is open to the other construction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member thinks that "can" is better than "may."

Mr. GLYNN.—The use of the word "can" will make the clause absolutely clear while the use of the other word will render its meaning doubtful. I think that if the word "can" is used it will meet the objection raised by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa. With that honorable and learned member I still think that it would be better to redraft the clause, but personally I do not care to interfere with drafting. If the Attorney-General will use the word "can" instead of the word "may" I shall be prepared to allow this clause to go as proposed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am perfectly willing to use the word "can" instead of the word "may." I hope that under these circumstances the Committee generally will accept my assurance that this matter has been given most careful consideration. In spite of the obvious objection to first giving a power and then transferring it, the way in which the Constitution is drawn in my opinion, renders this course desirable. This is a deliberate opinion formed after a good deal of examination. The drafting of the clause in the way proposed will render the transfer more explicit. I am prepared to do what the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, has asked.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Am I to understand that the honorable and learned gentleman will be prepared to recommit the clause if he subsequently finds that it will not work well?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments (by Mr. DEAKIN) agreed to—

That the words “in such matters,” line 6, be omitted.

That, after the word “jurisdiction,” line 10, the following words be inserted:—“in all matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction can be conferred upon it, except as provided in the last preceding section and”.

That paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) be omitted.

Amendment (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That, after the word “restrictions,” line 11, the following words be inserted:—“(a) Every appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of a State, or any other court of a State, from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lay to the Queen in Council, shall be brought to the High Court.”

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—The time is now ripe to call the attention of the Committee to what I think is a departure from the Constitution. The proposal as re-drafted is that every appeal in a matter which involves Federal jurisdiction from a Supreme Court shall be brought to the High Court. I wish it to be quite clear that I understand this is only proposed where there is a question of Federal law or of the Federal Constitution involved. Assuming that in the course of a long case, there is some question raised as to the meaning of the Federal law on divorce, on insolvency, on bills of exchange, or any of the numerous matters with which this Parliament may deal, the idea is to deprive the Privy Council of the right it has at present of hearing appeals upon those matters.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As of right.

Mr. HIGGINS.—As of right. I submit that there is no power to deprive the Privy Council of this right.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It deprives it of the appeal as of right.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The position is that at present the Privy Council, under an Order in Council, made under the Act 7 and 8 Vic., has full power to hear all appeals from the Supreme Courts of the colonies, Canada, Australia, and elsewhere, so long as the amount involved is over £500. It is by virtue of an Imperial Act that the Privy Council has this right, and it is only by an Imperial Act that the right can be taken away.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Constitution is an Imperial Act, but the Constitution does not take away the right of the Privy Council. All that the Constitution says is that a High Court may be created, and may hear appeals from the Supreme Courts of the States. It does not say that the High Court must hear appeals, and therefore the attempt which is being made is to concentrate, and to drive into the High Court, willy nilly, appeals which at present would go, as of course, to the Privy Council. I admit that the Attorney-General is limiting his proposal to cases where there is some question of the Constitution, or of Federal law involved. I hope honorable members will understand that I make the admission that the honorable and learned gentleman proposes to limit it absolutely in that way.

Mr. CONROY.—But does the Attorney-General limit it absolutely?

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is the intention. I rather think that these words will have the effect of limiting it to cases of Federal jurisdiction, because the amendment to which we have just agreed proposes that the several courts of the States shall within the limits of their several jurisdictions be invested with Federal jurisdiction.

In all matters in which the High Court has original jurisdiction, or in which original jurisdiction can be conferred upon it, except as provided in the last preceding section.

Then there is the new proposal involving this condition and restriction:—

Every appeal from the decision of a Supreme Court of a State, or any other court of a State from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lay to the Queen in Council, shall be brought to the High Court.

Although I agree with the honorable and learned member for Werriwa that in this clause it would, perhaps, have been better to expressly state “every appeal where Federal matters are involved,” still, I am assuming that the present drafting will be put right, and that that is the intention. I desire now to raise the substantial question whether there is any right on the part of this Parliament to say to a litigant who has been defeated in a Supreme Court of a State—"You must appeal to the High Court, because there is some question of Federal law involved." I dispute the constitutionality of the proposed amendment. If one looks at the Order in Council made on 7th June, 1860, in pursuance of the Acts 7 and 8 Victoria, it will be seen that the litigant has a right of appeal in any case in which a Supreme Court of a State decides against him where over £500 is involved. The words are—

Any person or persons may appeal to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in her or their Privy Council, from any finding, judgment, decree, order, or sentence of such Supreme Court of the colony of Victoria in such manner and within such time as hereinafter mentioned.

The provision could not be more universal than that. The mere fact that there may be new laws made after the Order in Council, which for this purpose may be treated as an Imperial Act, would not prevent the Order in Council applying. So that the effect of the Imperial Act, taken with the Order in Council, is that, no matter what new laws may be made by the Parliaments of Australia, and no matter what orders may be made in the Supreme Courts of New South Wales, Victoria, or any other of the States, the right of appeal lies to the Privy Council. Our Supreme Court Judges have the right, and do frequently decide as to the meaning of Imperial laws. I had a case of the sort only a few weeks ago. In the course of the working out of a case it may become necessary to decide as to the meaning of an Imperial law and a fortiori, the courts will have to decide as to the meaning of Federal laws. We cannot put Federal laws upon a higher basis than Imperial laws. I claim that the Constitution of the Commonwealth, though an Imperial law, has not altered the Imperial law which gives the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I do not dispute that the Imperial Parliament can change its mind and make any alteration it likes, but I say that so far it has not done so. In 1844 the Imperial Parliament said in effect, through an order in Council under the Act, that any person aggrieved by a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, may appeal to the King in Council. Then there is another Imperial Act, passed in the year 1900, which says that the Parliament of Australia may create a High Court to which appeals from the Supreme Court of Victoria, New South Wales, or any of the other States may lie. The Imperial law enables litigants to appeal to the High Court of Australia, but it does not compel them to do so.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Cannot we give Federal jurisdiction, and limit the conditions under which it shall be exercised?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am speaking now only of the effect of the clause upon the right to appeal to the Privy Council. It is not now a question of giving Federal jurisdiction. We can give Federal jurisdiction to any Court in Australia, but when any of the Supreme Courts gives a decision under any law one may choose to name, there is annexed to it the right of the litigant who thinks he is aggrieved thereby to appeal to the Privy Council. It does not matter what body made the law under which the decision is given. It is not a question of the source of the law; it is a question of what court gave the decision. If a Supreme Court, either through a Judge sitting as a court of first instance, or as a Full Court, gave a decision affecting a matter involving £500, an appeal would lie as of course to the Privy Council. I know that the Attorney-General is enamoured of the idea of this clause, but he will acknowledge that I suggested to him some weeks ago that I doubted very much whether such a provision could be carried into effect.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not want to have a clause put into the Bill which is either obviously wrong or will lead to litigation and trouble hereafter. In these matters there must be differences of opinion, however, and therefore I would waive my objection if this particular difficulty were referred to any impartial lawyer in practice, and he said that the clause is a right one.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Is it necessary to leave the matter in doubt? Cannot it be put beyond the possibility of doubt?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The question is one which is vital to the High Court. The Government is trying to compel litigants to appeal to the High Court instead of to the Privy Council. Google

Mr. WATSON.—That is in respect to matters affecting our legislation.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In cases in which even incidentally some trivial question with regard to the meaning of a Federal law is involved.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The interpretation of the Constitution may arise independently of any of the statutes of this Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Quite so. There is, however, a vague theory afloat to the effect that one set of Judges may close its eyes to one set of laws, and another set of Judges to another set of laws; that the State Judges can close their eyes to the Federal laws, and the Federal Judges to the State laws. That is a mistake. The whole body of law must be consistent, and every State Judge, down to Justices of the Peace, just as much as the highest dignitaries of the High Court, must obey the Federal law. A rule of law must be followed in every court. I venture to respectfully submit to the Attorney-General, however, that the effect of 7 and 8 Vic., taken with the Order in Council made under it, is to give a litigant the right, if he feels himself aggrieved by an interpretation of the Federal law, to appeal to the Privy Council. He may, therefore, snap his fingers at this provision compelling him to appeal to the High Court. I will give a concrete instance. Under the Constitution we may make a law dealing with bills of exchange. Now there is no class of actions more common than actions upon bills of exchange. Suppose then that we had made a law affecting bills of exchange, and a question arose in one of the States Courts as to the rights of parties under a certain bill for £5,000—a question relating to indorsement, to presentation, or to any other matter. That would be an ordinary commercial case. As things stand now the dissatisfied litigant can appeal directly from the Supreme Court of the State to the Privy Council. But the proposal of the Attorney-General is to deprive litigants of that right, and compel them to go to the High Court. There is to be no appeal to the Privy Council from the High Court unless special leave be given, and in most cases there must be a special recommendation from the High Court. That is an extraordinary interference with existing rights, and, not only do I not think it expedient, but I think it impossible. I put my argument on two grounds. First, that it is inexpedient under present circumstances to deprive litigants of their right to appeal on commercial causes to the supreme tribunal of the Empire; and secondly, that we have not the power to do so, because we cannot interfere with the operation of 7 and 8 Vic., which gives litigants the right to appeal to the Privy Council. I have indicated before that I think the option a most unwholesome one, and I know how it will work out in practice. Litigants who are aggrieved by the decision of a Supreme Court will study the idiosyncrasies of the members of the High Court Bench and of those of the Privy Council before deciding which court to appeal to, and thus the man who wants to appeal will be able to hold the whip over the man in whose favour the decision is given.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Attorney-General is trying to prevent that.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, but in my opinion a provision to that effect would be ultra vires. We cannot abolish the option; but we can prevent our statutes from becoming foolish. The option is given by the Constitution, and we must abide by it. If we provide in the Bill that appeals must go in a certain direction, we shall be exceeding our powers, and only misleading litigants. I move—

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the word "shall," line 7, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "may at the option of the appellant."

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I thoroughly agree with the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. We are now face to face with one of the difficulties which were foreseen, both when the Convention was sitting and alternative clauses were before it, and, subsequently, when the Constitution Bill was altered by the Imperial Parliament. The clause attempts to get over a difficulty in the Constitution itself. That difficulty arises because the Constitution allows alternative appeals. There is, however, no way in which we can overcome it without amending the Constitution. No doubt, if we took the course provided in the Constitution itself for the making of amendments, the Imperial Parliament would consent to any amendment that we might make; but the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has pointed out that we cannot amend the Constitution by the mode of procedure now being adopted. All that we shall do, if we pass the clause as proposed, will be to create doubt in the minds of the non-legal world as to the meaning of the provision. Laymen, when they read the words "shall be brought in the High Court," will think that an appeal will not lie to the Privy Council, and may, therefore, go to the High Court against the wishes of their legal advisers. But where they adopt legal advice they will no doubt go to the Privy Council. One of the first rules for the drawing up of a statute is to make it as precise and certain in form and expression as the knowledge of the men who are drawing it up enables them to make it, and we are departing from that practice when we agree to a provision which, at best, can result only in litigation. I think that the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne should be accepted. The words in the Constitution Act are very clear, and I am at a loss to understand how the Attorney-General can think that they can be got over. Does he suggest that because Federal jurisdiction is conferred upon the Supreme Courts they must, before they allow any appeal as of right to the Privy Council, inquire as to the law under which the decision was given? If they did, they would practically be saying to litigants—"Although the Constitution entitles you to appeal to the Privy Council from the Supreme Court on any matter, as this is a Federal matter you cannot appeal." Under such an interpretation of the Constitution, an appeal from a decision under the Imperial Navigation laws would not lie. Are not our courts called upon every day to interpret Acts passed in other countries? Does the Attorney-General hold that no appeal would lie to the Privy Council in a case such as that of McLeod v. McLeod in Sydney, which involved the interpretation of an American Act?

MR. DEAKIN.—In that case the court did not deal with an American law, but with an Act passed in New South Wales, and an Imperial Act which had been repealed, and of which one section was still in force in New South Wales.

MR. CONROY.—Does the Attorney-General wish us to believe that, if a decision were given in New South Wales upon a question affecting New Zealand law, the Privy Council would refuse to hear an appeal? I contend that, irrespective of the law involved, the moment a decision is given by a State Supreme Court upon any matter an appeal will lie to the Privy Council, and that we cannot take away this right. Perhaps we have the right to limit the power of appeal in matters involving the interpretation of the Constitution, but, even in regard to this point, it is held by some honorable and learned members that, the moment we invest States Courts with jurisdiction, the ordinary course of proceeding will not be followed, and that appeals will lie to the Privy Council. If that view is correct, the objections raised by many honorable members against the Bill on the ground that it is unnecessary are strengthened. The position taken up by those honorable members who supported the proposal that original jurisdiction should be given to the High Court would also have been improved if the committee had not decided against their views. I shall support the amendment, because the first object of a statute should be to lessen litigation, and because, in view of the doubts raised regarding a possible conflict with the provisions of the Constitution, it is necessary to make matters perfectly clear.

MR. DEAKIN.—With all deference, I differ from the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne upon this question, which he was good enough to bring under my notice privately a few weeks ago. The strength of his case on the question of law must be apparent to all honorable members who listened to his extremely clear exposition of his views. They may, however, have been somewhat puzzled when, after exposing with great force the very undesirable position in which we shall be placed if optional appeals are permitted, my honorable and learned friend went on to say that, although disapproving entirely of optional appeals, he yet thought, on the ground of expediency, that it would be very undesirable, even if we had the power, to get rid of them.

MR. HIGGINS.—No; I say that the optional appeal is fixed upon us by the Constitution, and that we must abide by that.

MR. DEAKIN.—I think that the honorable and learned member will admit that the extreme difficulties imposed upon us by optional appeals justifies us in making every effort to get rid of them; and that is the object with which the proposal is made in this Bill. I have addressed myself with great care to the Constitution, in order to discover if it is not possible to avoid the optional appeal. I need not at present enter into a discussion as to their inexpediency, because, first of all, if it be not possible for us to obtain the desired jurisdiction, we must submit to the double jurisdiction. I fear, however, that it may weigh with honorable members who, whatever their opinion of the legal question may be, are disposed to agree with the law of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. Let me now, apart from that aspect of the matter, explain why I have endeavoured to introduce this sub-clause into the measure, even after my honorable and learned friend was good enough to put to me his own clear and strong views on the question. In the first place, I rely upon the fact to which the honorable and learned member has referred, that the Constitution is an Imperial Act, and carries with it all the authority which Acts creating the appeal as of right to the Privy Council can carry, and that, we are to read it as passed in the light of existing Imperial statutes, when emanating from the body which having passed these statutes has authority to amend them either directly or by implication. I submit that the endowment which section 73 of the Constitution gives to the High Court may in effect repeal them by implication. Section 73 provides that the High Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences, not only of Justices of the High Court, but of any other Federal Court, or court exercising Federal jurisdiction. It is in the power of the High Court—in fact the Constitution imposes jurisdiction upon it—to hear appeals from any Federal Court or court exercising Federal jurisdiction. The courts which would be affected by this sub-section, are courts exercising Federal jurisdiction. They are Courts of the States, and are being endowed with all the Federal jurisdiction we can give them under this clause. Section 71 is important in this connexion. Then, if we turn to section 77 we find that with respect to any of the matters mentioned in the previous two sections, that is with respect to any matter of Federal jurisdiction, the Parliament may make laws not only defining the jurisdiction of any Federal Court other than the High Court, but defining—

The extent to which the jurisdiction of any Federal Court shall be exclusive of that which belongs to or is vested in the Courts of the States.

and vesting it or any part of it in State Courts. I submit, therefore, that under section 77, sub-section 2, it is possible for us to give exclusive jurisdiction to the High Court in all those matters of Federal jurisdiction which go on appeal to the Supreme Courts of the States, and to require that all appeals in matters of Federal jurisdiction which come before them shall be brought before the High Court. If, then, we have the power to make this appellate jurisdiction exclusive, and to shut out the Supreme Courts of the States or to define the extent to which they shall exercise jurisdiction, that implies that we have the right to invest them with power to hear appeals subject to certain conditions. That is what is sought to be done in this clause. First of all, we absorb in the High Court the whole of the Federal jurisdiction, and then invest the States Courts with it, subject to certain conditions. The position I take is that we are empowered under the Constitution to render back the appellate jurisdiction upon Federal matters to the Supreme Courts, with the condition that any appeals from them shall be brought before the High Court. They will have no such jurisdiction except under that condition. I admit the force of the contention of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, but, notwithstanding the deference which I pay to his opinion, and to the opinions of other honorable and learned members, venture to submit that the Constitution justifies the assumption that we have the power to condition these appeals. The inconvenience, loss, and difficulty created by the optional appeal to two different courts justifies us in endeavouring to claim this power. The appeals to the King in Council preserved either by section 73 or 74 of the Constitution, are those as of grace as distinguished from those as of right, and as the only appeals with which we propose to deal in the new paragraph are appeals as of right—I admit our inability to reach appeals as of grace, which would still be retained in these matters—it seems to me a fair construction to place upon the whole of these clauses when read together to say that just as section 74 disposes of appeals as of right from the High Court, and leaves untouched appeals as of grace, in like manner sections 71, 73, and 77 when read together, empower this Parliament to deprive litigants of appeals as of right from the States Courts always leaving them the prerogative appeals as of grace.

Mr. HUGHES.—When the Attorney-General speaks of an appeal as of grace, does he mean an appeal direct to the Privy Council or to the High Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Section 74 refers to appeals from the High Court only, but section 73 relates to appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from States Courts in matters arising in them apart from Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. HUGHES.—Under this clause does the honorable gentleman say that an appeal would lie direct to the Privy Council in any circumstances?

Mr. DEAKIN.—This clause does not attempt to deprive litigants of the right of appeal as of grace. Its effect is to take away from them the appeal as of right from States Courts. Both on the particular reading of the words relating to these appeals, and on the general construction to be placed upon the whole chapter, the insertion of the new paragraph can be justified. Unless it be disposed of upon considerations of expediency, as being, perhaps, premature, there is a great deal to be urged in its favour from the stand-point of taking the utmost advantage of our powers in the Constitution, of reading them in the largest possible way, while not attempting to deprive litigants of the prerogative appeal as of grace, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I hope the lay members of the Committee will understand that if this paragraph be inserted, it will still leave, even in matters of Federal jurisdiction, the same appeal from the States Courts upon special leave to the Privy Council that exists to-day. We cannot entirely abolish appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It will abolish only appeals as of right. But if my proposed paragraph be inserted, all matters involving the exercise of Federal jurisdiction would first have to be brought before the High Court. It would then rest with the appellants to determine whether they would go farther. We know that in the great majority of cases the decisions given by the Supreme Courts of the States are accepted by suitors as satisfactory. The functions of the High Court would cover a larger ambit and probably a great many of the cases coming before it would not be taken on to the King in Council. I do not dispute that there is much force in the contention of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, but from the reading of the Constitution which I have given, it seems to me that we are within the power of Parliament if we enact this sub-clause.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Personally, I lay less stress upon the legal objection to this clause, because of the possibility of its validity being challenged on the ground that it is unconstitutional, than I do upon the wisdom of passing it. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has declared that if a clause is ultra vires it is our duty not to place it upon the statute-book. I confess to entertaining a slight doubt about that matter. The balance of my opinion is with the honorable and learned member, but I cannot absolutely set up that opinion against the position assumed by the Attorney-General, and also by Professor Harrison Moore, that Federal jurisdiction can be conferred upon State Courts subject to a condition. I quite agree with the Attorney-General that possibly appeals as of right will be affected by the adoption of this paragraph, whilst appeals as of grace may not be affected. I am not quite sure upon that point. But quite irrespective of whether or not we vest Federal jurisdiction in the States Courts, I would point out that under the Constitution itself, probably those courts already have that jurisdiction. If so, appeals, both as of right and as of grace, are permitted to the Privy Council. At the same time any Act that we pass may, by implication, repeal appeals as of grace to the Privy Council, though it is generally acknowledged that to accomplish that end express words must be employed. It has been laid down in a Canadian case that Parliament cannot negative a prerogative which exists without the use of express words having that effect. The Dominion Parliament passed an Act in which it declared that notwithstanding any prerogative to the contrary an appeal was abolished. Within the past two or three years a case was heard in England, in which it was decided that the old rule requiring a prerogative to be expressly negative did not hold good in all cases. It was held that by implication the prerogative could be cut down. That being so, it is quite open to argument that under the Acts Interpretation Act, and under section 2 of the Constitution which expressly binds the Crown, we may, by implication, limit the power of appeal to the Privy Council as of grace—that is with the permission of the Privy Council. But subject to that qualification, I agree with the Attorney-General that the appeal as of grace will be open, and that what we are now attacking is the power of appeal as of right. The honorable gentleman declares that where we vest Federal jurisdiction in a court, we can vest it subject to any condition which we choose to impose. To some extent I have answered that contention by showing that we may not be required to vest it by Act of Parliament, because such jurisdiction may have been conferred upon the States Courts by the Constitution. It is a doubtful point, but it has been held by some—and I think by Professor Harrison Moore—that the jurisdiction may exist under section 5 of the Constitution. I believe he even goes further and says that as a matter of general British law this jurisdiction may exist without it being specially conferred by Act of Parliament. If that be so, the appeal as of right to the Privy Council exists under the Constitution. The original jurisdiction exists without any action being taken by us, and incident to that jurisdiction is the power to appeal to the Privy Council. If, as the Attorney-General says, we bestow jurisdiction, it might be we can limit it, but if it exists without us we cannot cut it down.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Where does the honorable and learned member say that Federal jurisdiction has been vested in the States Courts?

Mr. GLYNN.—Under section 5 of the Constitution, which makes that Act as an Imperial Act binding upon the Crown.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That merely means that the law must be executed.

Mr. GLYNN.—But it has been argued that it has a very much wider signification. It is argued by Professor Harrison Moore with a good deal of conclusiveness that, altogether apart from the Constitution, as a matter of general British law, this Federal jurisdiction does exist. If that be so, inasmuch as the jurisdiction arises out of this Bill, the appeal to the Privy Council which exists before it is passed will still be open. In the Canadian case of Cushing v. Dupuy it was laid down that where Parliament confers a right of appeal it can also take away that right. In that case an appeal was given as of right from the Insolvency Court of Quebec to the Supreme Court of Canada or the Privy Council. In a subsequent Act, however, the Dominion Parliament took away that right of appeal by declaring that the judgment of the Provincial Courts in matters of insolvency should be final. In that case it was decided that the appeal of right had been abolished because it had its origin under a Canadian statute, and that what a Canadian statute could confer, it could also take away. But it expressly stated that it did not take away the appeal of grace to the Privy Council, because that existed before the Canadian appeal as of right was conferred by a Canadian Act. I mention this to show that there is another side to that which has been taken by the Attorney-General. Some of the lay members of the Committee may imagine that the power of construing the constitutionality of statutes is absolutely vested in the High Court, subject to any permissive appeal given to the Privy Council by the High Court, but as a matter of fact, it is possible that if a point involving the constitutionality of statutes—an inter se point—arose in the Supreme Court of a State, under the Federal jurisdiction to be conferred, an appeal would lie direct to the Privy Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unless we make that provision.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not know that the clause does that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not say this clause. There is a later clause.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt an attempt is made by the Bill to stop that; but I do not know that it is efficacious. Supposing that an Act passed by a State Parliament was unconstitutional under the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act. If such a question arose in the Supreme Court of the State exercising Federal jurisdiction, an appeal would probably lie to the Privy Council; so that the safeguarding of the interpretation about which honorable members heard so much on the second reading as arising under section 74 does not exist; and so far as these appeal clauses are concerned, there is very little final jurisdiction in the High Court. Of course, that ought to have told more strongly than it has done against the immediate creation of the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It does not relieve us of the obligation to create it.

Mr. GLYNN.—We do not want to go into that point now.

Mr. DEAKIN.—And the optional appeal lies all the same under section 73.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt—much to my regret. On the last division in the Convention, I was defeated by three votes in making the attempt to abolish all direct appeals to the Privy Council.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Now we are trying to get back to where the honorable and learned member left off.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes; but by sinister methods. There is no doubt that this is an attempt to cancel the bungling of the Convention in its final division. On this point the delegates were unfortunately—and, I believe, unintentionally—misled by their leader and Sir Josiah Symon. I endeavoured to point out that direct appeals were retained, and I was point-blank contradicted by those gentlemen, who said that no appeals were allowed in Canada. What they had in their minds was that there were few appeals from the Supreme Court of Canada, but the direct appeals exist of right and grace. The tremendous leakage which will take place in Australia will be from the States, and do what we will, we shall find that there will be very little final jurisdiction exercised by the High Court. The passage of the High Court Bill and the abolition of the appeal to the Privy Council from the States ought to be contemporaneous. As regards the policy, what the clause does is to protract litigation, because really, where a suitor wishes to appeal direct, he is compelled to appeal to a court not of final jurisdiction—that is, to the High Court of Australia. So that we may have two appeals where, if the clause were left out, we possibly would have only one, or at all events one of the litigants could say that there was to be only one appeal. The probability is that an appeal as of grace from the High Court, if we leave the appeal of the High Court, will be granted in almost all cases. The Privy Council refuses to allow appeals as of grace from the Supreme Court of Canada except in very rare cases of public importance, or where something more than mere money is concerned. But it acts on this ground, that the suitor having had the option of two appellate courts—the Supreme Court of Canada and the Privy Council—has chosen one and is bound by his option. There is no option given by this clause, so that the reason which frequently influences the Privy Council to refuse these appeals does not hold in this case, because the suitor is compelled to go to the High Court. I therefore contend that in almost every case the Privy Council will grant an appeal from a Judge of the High Court. If that is so, the best thing we can do is to diminish the opportunities for appeal by leaving out the clause. For that reason, if a division is called for, I shall vote against it.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I listened with very great attention to the view put by the Attorney-General as to the constitutionality of the clause. But I confess that I was unable to go with him in his reasoning to the conclusion at which he arrived. He has had to say in effect that, taking section 73 of the Constitution with section 77, he could spell out from the two an implied power to place a condition upon the bestowal of jurisdiction on the Courts of the States. Section 73 deals solely with one of the courts created by the Constitution, or that may be created under the Constitution, but does not deal in any way with the jurisdiction to be bestowed on existing courts on which we have the right to bestow further powers. Then, if we look at section 77, upon which the honorable and learned gentleman relied, we find in sub-section (2) that the Parliament may make laws—

Defining the extent to which the jurisdiction of any Federal Court shall be exclusive of that which belongs to or is invested in the Courts of the States.

If I understand the honorable and learned gentleman aright, he says that that power implies an authority to limit the jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—To impose a condition on the granting of the appeal, because we can define the extent to which the jurisdiction shall be exclusive.

Mr. McCAY.—Exactly. The honorable and learned gentleman says that the word "extent" implies the power to impose a condition. Let us grant for a moment that it is so. Sub-section (2) refers solely to courts created by the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN.—To Courts of the States!

Mr. McCAY.—The term "Federal Court" in the sub-section includes the High Court and any other Federal Courts that we may create, but it does not include the States Courts, which we invest with Federal jurisdiction. The first section of the Judicature chapter of the Constitution says—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other Federal Courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts.

which are not called Federal Courts—

as it invests with Federal jurisdiction.

Consequently sub-section (2) of section 77 does not refer in any way to States Courts invested with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But it says, "or is invested in the Courts of the States?"

Mr. McCAY.—I know. It says the Parliament may make laws—

Defining the extent to which the jurisdiction of any Federal Court—

That is, the extent to which that jurisdiction of Federal Courts shall be exclusive of certain other jurisdictions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly, "Invested in the Courts of the States."

Mr. McCAY.—Quite so, but the definition of extent is only permitted with respect to Federal Courts. We can only say as regards a Federal Court, that this jurisdiction shall be exclusive of State jurisdiction. But it does not convey the power to impose a condition upon the investment of the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction. It does not convey the power to define the extent to which Federal jurisdiction shall be bestowed upon States Courts, because, when we come to sub-section (3), we have the investing power given without any corresponding power of defining the extent. Sub-section (1) refers solely to courts created by the Parliament. In sub-section (2) the words "any Federal Court," refer solely to courts created by the Parliament, and it is only in the case of courts created by the Parliament that we can define the extent of their jurisdiction in the sense in which we can impose a condition with respect to jurisdiction. In sub-section (3)—beyond section 71, of course—we get the only express authority for investing States Courts with Federal jurisdiction. There is no power to be spelled out of that sub-section, or any other portion of the chapter which allows us to impose a condition at the same time that we invest the Courts of the States with Federal jurisdiction. What I mean is that, having decided that the State Court is to have a given Federal jurisdiction, we must bestow that jurisdiction along with all the incidents and rights of litigants which belong to the State Court in the exercise of its ordinary State jurisdiction; that the only ground on which we can say that a State Court can have the jurisdiction bestowed on it limited with respect to the right of appeal is that we have the authority to define the extent of its jurisdiction, which we cannot do. The wording of sub-section (1) and sub-section (2)—to define in one case the jurisdiction and in the other case the extent to which the jurisdiction shall be exclusive—varies so markedly from the third sub-section, which authorizes us to invest the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction that it seems to me there is a very cogent argument to be drawn from these words to the effect that the Constitution has almost, in so many words, distinguished between what we can do with regard to Commonwealth-created courts, and what we can do with regard to previously existing courts. Sub-section 2, when it is read carefully, seems to me to give only a power to assert that the jurisdiction shall be exclusive—nothing else surely the power to assert that the jurisdiction of Court "A," shall be exclusive, cannot be read to mean that Court "B" may have a condition imposed upon the jurisdiction vested in it, which is not made exclusive in Court "A." The Attorney-General has used sub-section (2) in support of the clause in a way in which it cannot be used, when we consider the words of the whole section. I submit that sub-section (3) is the only one dealing with the question, and that it does not give such authority. When we find irresistible inferences arising from express words, it will require a very strong implication to be gathered from the general sense of the chapter on the Judicature to justify us in overriding those inferences. I feel compelled, on the ground of law, to say that this sub-clause is not within the authority of this Parliament; because having invested the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction, having said that they shall have power to hear cases arising under laws made by the Commonwealth, we propose to say that there shall be no appeal in the ordinary way. I can see no authority for such a condition; and, though it is almost with timidity I say it, my mind is, rightly or wrongly, not in any state of doubt on the matter. Rightly or wrongly, it seems to me that unless we are to have the Constitution enlarged by interpretation by some court in a most national and most notable manner—unless we are practically to have meanings read into the Constitution which the ordinary reader cannot there find—this power does not exist. Even if this question were only debatable, it would be unwise at this stage to adopt the proposal of the Attorney-General, quite apart from whether its adoption might not be an interference or an imagined interference with the prerogative, and thereby give rise to the necessity of reserving the measure for the Royal assent. We do not want to pass laws here of such a character that there shall be a chance of any custom growing up of reserving measures, unless in cases in which the Constitution positively orders such a step. In regard to the matter of appeals, it seems to me—and I expressed very much the same view during the debate on the second reading—that so long as we, as a matter of fact, have no finality, or anything like finality, in the High Court, it is not desirable to introduce another stage in litigation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We want as much finality as we can get.

Mr. McCAY.—We want as much finality in Australia as we can get, but I do not think that finality will be attained, under existing conditions, by merely introducing a fresh stage, or possibly fresh stages, of litigation, and thereby giving rise to appeal after appeal, until the Privy Council is reached. There is a great deal in what was said by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, as to the probability of leave of appeal to the Privy Council being given in a large number of cases. If under this clause every appeal went to the High Court, many litigants, whether satisfied or dissatisfied with the result, would probably be thoroughly satisfied with the bill, or bills, of costs which would come in due course, and consequently a great number of appeals would stop, because of reasons other than the satisfaction—if such a term may be used—of a litigant with the decision against him. I base my objection to the clause chiefly on the ground that I do not see any authority in the Constitution for imposing a condition on a State Court which we have invested with Federal jurisdiction. I can see reasons for arguing that, given a Federal Court, we can impose conditions on that court. I may have grave doubts on that point, but I cannot—probably through my own fault in not properly following the arguments of the Attorney-General—see at the present time any ground for imposing any condition, and, therefore, I feel it my duty to oppose the honorable gentleman's proposal.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—The arguments in this matter seem to be very strong both ways, but on the whole I feel inclined to accept the view of the Attorney-General. If there is any doubt, the decision should be in favour of the High Court. It is quite clear that the judicial power conveyed by the Constitution is to be vested in the High Court, in such other Federal Courts as are created, and in such courts as may be given Federal jurisdiction; and if there are arguments both ways, it would be as well to give effect to that provision and concentrate the Federal jurisdiction in the Federal Courts which come within the purview of the Constitution. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, said that in his view Federal jurisdiction is conferred on States Courts ipso facto by the Constitution, under covering section 5, which provides that the Constitution and the laws of the Commonwealth shall be binding on the States Courts and States Judges.

Mr. GLYNN.—I said that possibly that was so.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—A similar provision exists in the United States Constitution, and yet it was not held there that the States Courts had full Federal jurisdiction. What is meant is, as I understand it, that any prohibitions or mandates of the Constitution, or laws passed thereunder, are binding on the States Courts.

Mr. GLYNN.—The words are not identical in the two Constitutions.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—They are pretty nearly identical; at any rate they are based on the same design. But the view suggested by the honorable and learned member is quite deprived of anything to sustain it prima facie by the distinct power conveyed by our own Constitution to invest the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction had been previously granted there would have been no occasion for the special provision in the Constitution authorizing the Federal Parliament to invest the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction. It seems to me that if Parliament has the power to invest the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction, it has the power to describe the mode, conditions, surroundings, and provisions under which the jurisdiction is to be exercised. The power is unlimited; and, therefore, I think there is very great force in the view presented by the Attorney-General, namely, that we may give Federal jurisdiction to the States Courts subject to the condition that the High Court shall have the right before the Privy Council to review decisions in the first instance. I entertained no doubt whatever on the subject originally, and should never have entertained any doubt but for the suggestion made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, for whose opinion I have very high respect. It seems to me, however, that there are very strong arguments for the view presented by the Attorney-General, that this is a power which may be invested in the States Courts, either unconditionally or with a reservation. There is another argument by which the view of the Attorney-General can be sustained. The High Court, under the Constitution, has the right to hear appeals from the States Courts; and it is, therefore, quite clear that where there is a Court of Appeal presiding over courts of inferior jurisdiction, the Court of Appeal has the power of removal, and that that power of removal exists both during the hearing of a suit, and after the decision is given. The High Court having this inherent power of removal, there must be power in this Parliament to make a provision which certainly does not exceed the inherent power of the High Court. Under the Constitution of the United States it has been held in the leading case of Martin v. Hunter, that there is a power of removal of all causes from the States Courts which assume Federal jurisdiction, at any stage during the history of the case—during its progress or after the decision—and it has been held that this is a power inherent in the appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN.—That power was conferred by statute.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No; it is an inherent power.

Mr. GLYNN.—There was no Privy Council, and the power was subsequently conferred by statute.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It may be that the Privy Council, as a Court of Appeal, has also inherent jurisdiction of removal, but the position is quite clear from the remarks of Mr. Justice Story, in the case Mart v. Hunter, that the High Court will have the power of removal. Mr. Justice Story said—

This power of removal is not to be found in express terms in any part of the Constitution; if it be given, it is only given by implication, as a power necessary and proper to carry into effect some express power. The power of removal is certainly not, in strictness of language, a grant of original jurisdiction: it presupposes an exercise of original jurisdiction to have attached elsewhere. The existence of this power of removal is familiar in courts acting according to the course of the common law, in criminal as well as civil cases, and it is exercised before as well as after judgment. But this is always deemed, in both cases, an exercise of appellate, and not of original jurisdiction.

According to that principle the High Court of Australia would, in any case dealt with by the States Courts in the exercise of Federal jurisdiction, have power, as the Court of Appeal, to remove a cause from the States Courts, whether or not this provision proposed by the Attorney-General be passed. If that can be done by the inherent authority vested in the High Court as a Court of Appeal, I see no objection whatever to an express provision in the Bill vesting in the High Court, in the first instance, the exclusive right of appeal from the States Courts exercising Federal jurisdiction. Also, on the ground of expediency, I think it would be better to accept the proposal so as to avoid any option in a case where one party desired to go to the Privy Council, while the other party desired to go to the High Court. Of course, the proposal does not in any way interfere with the inherent power, which is still vested in the Privy Council, to grant leave to appeal from the decision of a State Court; and it is not proposed to take away that power. All that is taken away by the Attorney-General's proposal is the legal right to appeal under Orders in Council. Nor does the provision interfere with the ultimate right of the Privy Council to grant leave of appeal from decisions of the High Court provided no constitutional question is involved. Under these circumstances, I feel quite justified, according to constitutional principles, as well as on the grounds of expediency, in supporting the proposal of the Attorney-General.

Question—That the word “shall,” proposed to be omitted, stand part of the proposed amendment—put. The Committee divided.

Amendment of the amendment negatived.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I should like to know how the clause stands as amended. Is it still proposed to retain paragraph (d)?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—What is the effect of paragraph (d)?

Mr. DEAKIN.—An option.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Does that mean that an appeal is to lie direct from a decision of a court of petty sessions exercising Federal jurisdiction, to the High Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—If that be so, it does not come within the limitation of the newly-added paragraph (a).

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Paragraph (e) states that—Whenever a decision of a Court or Judge of a State is declared by the law of the State to be final, the High Court may, if the decision is given in the exercise of Federal jurisdiction, grant special leave to appeal from the decision to the High Court.

I had intended to move an amendment upon that paragraph, but I do not think I shall bother about the point now. As regards paragraph (f), I do not know whether the Attorney-General ever does appoint magistrates to act in a Federal capacity in a State. This paragraph appears in one of our Acts, which provides that summary jurisdiction under Federal laws may be exercised either by a stipendiary or police magistrate, or a magistrate of a State who is specially authorized by the Governor-General to exercise such jurisdiction. In other words, the Justice of a State exercising Federal jurisdiction must have a special authorization. But I know of cases where magistrates have been acting without that special authorization. I gave notice of appeal on this ground in one case, but from other considerations did not go on with it. I saw the other day that a case had arisen in Western Australia, where the point was taken that the magistrates acting were not specially appointed. Surely the administration should see that magistrates who act in Federal cases are not without the necessary authority, or should prevent them from sitting. But as it is, a magistrate may be authorized, and beside him upon the Bench there may be two or three other justices who have no authorization. Personally, I think it would be better to strike out the rest of the clause, but I do not intend to move in that direction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member will notice that this clause is negative. The section of one of our Acts to which he has alluded is positive. That section endows police and stipendiary magistrates or other magistrates to be specially appointed, with power to sit as courts of summary jurisdiction. This paragraph provides that the summary jurisdiction shall not be exercised except by a police or stipendiary or special magistrate. It is not a qualifying provision. But I admit the difficulty of which the honorable and learned member has spoken. A case has occurred in Western Australia. It will be necessary to meet that difficulty, although I do not know that it would be desirable to meet it by appointing many of the honorary magistrates. It is desired that there may be, if possible, a higher standard of qualification.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 42, 43, and 44 negatived.

Clause 45—

1. Any cause or part of a cause involving a matter of Federal jurisdiction which is at any time pending in any court of a State, and whether it is or is not removable into the High Court under the foregoing provisions of this part of this Act, may at any stage of the proceedings before final judgment be removed into the High Court, under an order of the High Court, which may, upon the application of any party or sufficient cause shown, be made on such terms as the Court thinks fit, and shall be made as of course upon motion in open Court by the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth or on his behalf.

2. When any such order for removal is made, the proceedings and documents in the cause or certified copies thereof shall be transmitted to such registry of the High Court as is directed by the order, in the same manner as hereinbefore described in the case of a removal by a defendant.

Mr. DEAKIN.—This is an important clause to which I would direct the attention of honorable members, first of all by way of indicating the amendments which I propose to move. I propose to omit the words "and whether it is or is not removable into the High Court under the foregoing provisions of this part of this Act." That amendment will be necessary, because, the foregoing provisions having disappeared, the words I have quoted must disappear also. I move—

That the words "And whether it is or is not removable into the High Court under the foregoing provisions of this part of this Act," lines 2 to 6, be omitted

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The next amendment in sub-clause (2.) I move—

That the words "And documents in the cause certified copies thereof," lines 15 and 16, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "in the cause and such documents, if any, relating thereto, as are filed of record in the court of the State, or, if part only of the cause removed, a certified copy of those proceedings and documents."

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—In my opinion the whole of the clause ought to be struck out.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I wish to direct the attention of the Attorney-General to the concluding portion of sub-clause (1)—

And shall be made as of course upon motion in open court by the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth or on his behalf.

I wish to know whether that means in suits to which the Attorney-General is a party, or whether it is intended that the Attorney-General may interpose in a suit between two private persons, and move that it be removed to the High Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not think that is justifiable. Why should the Attorney-General interfere between plaintiff A as against defendant B, and say—"I will not allow you to have this case settled in the court of the State; you must have it removed to the High Court."

Mr. WATSON.—Is it intended to cover constitutional points?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not know. It seems to refer to all cases.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I look upon that matter as one of the questions of substance with which I propose to ask the Committee to deal presently. I propose to make these formal and necessary amendments, and then to submit the clause as a whole. If any difficulty occurs, I shall be prepared to recommit the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Mr. DEAKIN) agreed to—

That the words "in the same manner as hereinbefore prescribed in the case of a removal by a defendant," lines 18 to 20, be omitted.

Mr. DEAKIN. — Honorable members will observe that this clause contains two important proposals. In the first place, the clause as a whole relates to the power of removing cases from the States Courts to the High Court.

Mr. WATSON.—As a matter of appeal.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not as a matter of right, but on the application of any party, if sufficient cause be shown.

Mr. WATSON.—After the case has been initiated in a State Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. The words of the clause as amended are wide. They provide that—

(1) Any cause or part of a cause involving a matter of Federal jurisdiction which is at any time pending in any Court of a State may at any stage of the proceedings before final judgment be removed into the High Court under an order of the High Court, which may, upon the application of any party for sufficient cause shown, be made on such terms as the Court thinks fit, and shall be made as of course upon motion in open Court by the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, or on his behalf. . . .

Let me deal first of all with the power of removal. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo in criticising the preceding clause, pointed out that, under words precisely similar to those which we have used in our Constitution with reference to judicial power, it had been held that the power to remove a cause involving matters of Federal jurisdiction was so inherent, that the Constitution of the United States of itself was sufficient to confer that right on the court. Subsequently that right was formally conferred by statute in the United States. The power of removal can be exercised first of all on the application of any party.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the Attorney-General say that the United States decision would be applicable to our circumstances?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have mentioned that, after the judgment in Martin v. Hunter was given, a statute was passed by Congress regulating the method of removal. But Mr. Justice Story, whose decision was quoted by my honorable and learned friend, held that such a power was absolutely inherent in the United States Courts, although in the Constitution, no such power was expressed in any definite words.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable and learned gentleman think that, in our circumstances, that decision would be followed by the Privy Council?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a very large question; but I think that as the words upon which that decision was based appear in our Constitution, and as it is obviously necessary that matters of Federal jurisdiction should be dealt with by the High Court, and that there should be power to remove cases from the States Courts in which they arose, a very favorable inclination would be shown towards that reading. Whether such a reading would be established or not I should hesitate to say until I had had an opportunity of examining the question much more closely than I have yet had occasion to do. But quite apart from that matter, which is merely a preliminary indication of the urgent necessity of such a power in the circumstances of the American Commonwealth, I submit that it may be an equally necessary power in the Commonwealth of Australia. A question of the most fundamental character, involving the interpretation of the Constitution upon some matter of vital importance, may arise in a matter of ordinary litigation, and, unless there be power to remove such a case from the State Court in which it is being tried to the High Court, it would have been possible—as the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, has pointed out more than once—that the High Court might be avoided altogether. In a case of that kind, the decision might have been given, in the first instance, in some inferior State tribunal. It might then have been taken, upon appeal, to the Supreme Court of a State, and carried direct to the Privy Council, without having been considered by the High Court. Such a proceeding might have been followed in connexion with a case, the decision of which might go to the very roots of the Federal power. It might occur in regard to a case involving some interpretation of the Constitution, affecting, perhaps, a large body of Federal legislation; affecting the courts themselves, and the powers of this Parliament.

Mr. WARSON.—Would not the clause we have just passed have some bearing upon such a case?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. It has a direct bearing upon it. One of the chief reasons for its insertion was to enable us to escape this danger.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is a reserve method.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. This is also necessary, because cases might occur in which it might be to the advantage of the parties themselves that it should be removed at once to the High Court. My honorable and learned friend knows that the only power given to us by the sub-clause of the preceding clause which we have just discussed is in regard to appeals. It refers to a case which will have been heard as of first instance in a State Court, which may have gone before the Supreme Court of the State on appeal, and which will then, under that provision, be brought before the High Court. But if it be perceived at the very outset of the case that a vital Federal question involving some decision of far-reaching importance must arise, it will be decidedly to the advantage of the parties if, instead of waiting for the appeal stage in the State Court, it is removed at once to the High Court. If its importance is so clear, and its Federal operation so extensive that it is manifestly a cause in which the decision of the inferior court would not be allowed to stand unchallenged by the unsuccessful party, it is much better in such a case—in which the ordinary course would be to take it on appeal to the Supreme Court of a State, and then to the High Court, before sending it on to the Privy Council—to have the power to take a short cut and bring it at once before the High Court. In that way a distinctively Federal matter would be dealt with by a distinctively Federal Court.

Mr. THOMSON.—But this clause would enable the Attorney-General to remove any

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. It is impossible to foresee in what case an issue of the kind I have referred to may arise. If the honorable member thinks that the expression used in this clause is too wide, and that we can embrace the necessary cases by some other form of words, I shall be happy to listen to a suggestion in that direction. The provision is set forth in this general manner, because it is impossible to foresee or, as far as I am able to judge, to describe by definition, those cases in which these points, and these alone, will occur. This is one of the instances in which if we desire to make the power effective, we must make it extremely broad. In these circumstances I think the sense of the Committee will be that it is emphatically necessary, not only in order that we may have a Federal interpretation of the Constitution or of the Commonwealth statutes on any vital question, but to spare the litigants themselves the cost of proceeding through the varying stages, to be able to say that the case shall be removed to the High Court directly it becomes evident that such a question has been raised and must necessarily be settled.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Why should there be any interference with the litigants by the Attorney-General?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall deal with that matter presently.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But the honorable and learned gentleman cannot separate it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think we can distinctly separate it. I am dealing now only with cases in which either party to a suit that has arisen in a minor court in any one of the States perceives directly the pleadings are exchanged, or as soon as the hearing is commenced, that some important constitutional question is involved. Such a party has the power of saying—"I object to be taken from this court to the Supreme Court of a State, then to the High Court, and, perhaps, ultimately to the Privy Council. I shall take the short cut of stopping this action in its earlier stages, and taking it direct to the High Court."

Mr. McCAY.—Would that case be taken to the Nisi Prius Court—would it be heard by a single Judge?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It may be.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It does not say so.

Mr. McCAY.—If it were heard by a single Judge it would not carry the Attorney-General's object any further.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It would help the litigant to this extent—that he would avoid whatever stages had not been passed in the inferior court, as well as the appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—But perhaps the parties would be satisfied with the decision of the court in which the case originated.

Mr. DEAKIN.—A case in which both parties are satisfied will not be removed. But it is absolutely necessary that the Attorney-General should have some power of removal. I am dealing now, however, with the power of the parties. If either party to a case thinks that its hearing and final settlement would be facilitated by going direct to the High Court, instead of working his way through the States Courts, this clause will enable him to take that short cut, and as such I take it that it should commend itself to honorable members.

Mr. WATSON.—Under the preceding clause parties have the right of appeal from a single State Judge to the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They have the option.

Mr. McCAY.—Does not the Attorney-General see that this power might be made an engine of oppression?

Mr. DEAKIN.—What procedure in laws which allows an appeal or any fresh proceeding may not be made an engine of oppression?

Mr. McCAY.—But we need not add another to the list.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are obliged to adopt this course. The honorable and learned member knows that if he followed out the principle he has enunciated, it would be necessary to have a new Procedure Act, and new measures of jurisprudence which would cut down the existing practice, which is equally capable of misuse. The fact that the Federal features of a case necessitate a prompt Federal judgment is worthy of recognition in the interests of litigants themselves. Every power capable of use is capable of abuse. That is true not only of legal powers, but of every power which exists. The more strength a machine has to perform its work the greater the danger if it is misapplied. The Committee must consider that the important part of section 74, which requires that questions as to the limits inter se, of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth, or of a State or States, shall not be taken from the High Court, without the consent of that body, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, may become a dead letter unless it is safeguarded by provisions of which this is one and an effective one.

Mr. McCAY.—Is there a case of that kind which is not covered by the clause just passed?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That provides an appeal—as the last stage of a series of appeals.

Mr. McCAY.—I understood the honorable and learned gentleman's contention was that a litigant might get to the Privy Council on an inter se question behind the back of the High Court. How could he, in view of the clause we have just passed?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If I conveyed that to the mind of the honorable and learned member, I did not intend to do so. What I pointed out was that we have one provision under which suits, after they have passed through all the stages in which the States Courts can deal with them, are brought before the High Court on appeal. I used the word "provisions" deliberately, because this is another provision which will enable us to interrupt that long course of procedure in certain cases, and in those cases, directly it becomes clear that a question of the character to which I have referred is being raised, there will be a means of removal.

Mr. WATSON.—If litigants saw before them a prospect of having to go through a State Supreme Court to the High Court, would they not exercise their option in the lower court of going direct to the High Court from a single State Judge?

Mr. DEAKIN.—They have the power to do that under the Bill.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I asked the question just now, and the Attorney-General replied that they could go direct from a State Police Court to the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is perfectly true, but what I am coming to now is the power proposed to be vested in the Attorney-General of intervening in any suit. That is the second proposal in this clause. I take it that it would be the duty of the Attorney-General to intervene at any stage of a case at which it became plain that a serious constitutional question was arising. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs interjected that it would probably appear on the pleadings, but it will be admitted that whenever it arises it would be desirable that the suit should be transferred at once to the High Court because such a question can only be finally dealt with by the High Court, and, in fact, it rests with the High Court under the Constitution to say whether it shall ever be dealt with by any other court. Those who desire to shorten legal proceedings, and to see finality obtained as soon as possible, will surely not complain of a provision which enables cases of that particular character to be brought to the speediest possible trial in the shortest possible way?

Mr. McCAY.—Is it contemplated to remove a cause to a hearing before a single Judge of the High Court, or to the Appellate High Court direct?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It can go, under this clause, to a single Judge of the High Court.

Mr. McCAY.—That means a nisi prius hearing with a subsequent appeal, which is exactly what is covered by the previous clause.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Would the Attorney-General pay the costs of the litigants where he intervenes?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a question for the Committee to consider.

Mr. CONROY.—If he would all suits would be removed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If honorable members will look at the clause they will see that it provides that a suit—

May at any stage of the proceedings before final judgment be removed into the High Court under an order of the High Court.

That order will be made upon such terms as the High Court may think fit, and honorable members will see that by clause 46 it is provided that—

When the cause is removed into the High Court under the provisions of this Act the High Court shall proceed therein as if the cause had been originally commenced in that Court, and as if the same proceedings had been taken in the cause in the High Court as had been taken therein in the Court of the State prior to its removal.

That indicates the stage at which it would be taken up. For instance, if it was a removal whilst still in the court of first instance it would go before a single Judge; but if it had passed the court of first instance, and reached the appeal stage, it would go to the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. McCAY.—If we assume that a cause is taken from the Court of first instance, what saving would there be?

Mr. DEAKIN.—This saving: that it would get at once to a Federal Judge whose particular business it is to deal with Federal issues, who will be dealing with them every day, and who may, therefore, be expected to deal with the cause more rapidly and more definitely than it is likely to be dealt with by some tribunals before which a litigant may find himself. As it stands, this power of removal safeguards every power of appeal with which we have been dealing. The power of removal will be useful to litigants, and it may be extremely valuable to the Commonwealth as a whole when exercised by the Attorney-General, as it would be exercised, only in cases meriting that special and extraordinary interference. No Attorney-General could be found who would lightly or willingly intervene in litigation in order merely to change the tribunal before which a cause was being heard. It would require to appear upon the face of it that an important Federal issue was involved.

Mr. THOMSON.—An Attorney-General who was trying to build up the High Court might intervene.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Many matters might be suggested, similar to the illustrations already given, in which it is desirable that the business should be dealt with by the High Court, which will be able, not only to deal with it more speedily, but upon more consistent and uniform principles than we can expect every particular tribunal before whom it may come in the States to apply.

Mr. McCAY.—That argument applies only to the Appellate High Court, and not to a Judge of the High Court of first instance. Those Judges will differ among themselves as much as do the Judges of the States.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Still I think the High Court Judges would be better able to deal with these questions. If the Committee consider that the power of removal can be safeguarded effectively by making it a removal always to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court, we can consider that proposal.

Mr. McCAY.—It would be removal only on appeal then.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It would have to be a matter involving some hundreds of pounds. This provision gives much wider grounds.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Very much wider. Under this provision a cause involving a matter of £10 or £5 might be removed.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It gives the right to order a fair trial.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not assert that removal is essential to that. Sometimes that can be obtained without this mode of removal. What I wish to impress upon the Committee is the importance of the power, and at the same time my entire willingness to consider any proposal that will safeguard removals, and which authorize it only upon reasonable and proper grounds, so as to prevent it being made what one of my honorable friends calls an instrument of oppression. I am perfectly prepared to consider any limitations either of the matter to be removed or the manner of removal. I have no desire to multiply proceedings or to increase costs.

Mr. McCAY.—I suggest the insertion of the words "on appeal" after the word "pending" to begin with.

Mr. DEAKIN.—What I desire is to retain this power as a safeguard, in order that the class of cases for which the Federal Court is specially created, and to decide which it will exist, may be brought before it when necessary, in the most summary and inexpensive manner. That is the design underlying all the removal clauses, and I hope I shall have the assistance of honorable members in shaping them in any better form than is at present proposed to achieve that end. I do not desire that they should be unduly elaborate, coercive, or cumbrous. I hope that honorable members are agreed as to the necessity of possessing a power of removal, and am willing to accept their assistance to so safeguard its exercise, and the manner of its exercise, as to meet all the objections we can.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—If the powers conferred in clauses 42, 43, and 44 had remained, clause 45 would probably have been rightly drawn, but since this Bill was introduced we have started upon entirely different lines. We are now trying to secure that the High Court to be created shall be purely an appellate court, and regarding it as an appellate court, especially in view of the alteration we have made in clause 41, I cannot see how clause 45 can possibly be necessary. It may work much evil, and it should therefore be eliminated. If the Attorney-General drafts a clause to deal with cases pending appeal or on the lines lately suggested by himself, it might meet with a different reception from the Committee. At present we cannot disguise the fact that this clause is altogether too wide, and would allow the Attorney-General to control and to entirely alter the jurisdiction which we have decided to vest in the High Court. The honorable and learned gentleman would, of course, in his opinion, be rightly exercising his powers under this clause, in giving original jurisdiction to the High Court. Any one can see that that was the honorable and learned gentleman's intention in regard to it. If some later Attorney-General is of the same opinion honorable members can imagine the difficulty we shall be met with—we shall have gone altogether outside of what the Bill as amended by the Committee is intended to provide for. As the clause is drawn, we have no option but to excise it; but it could be drafted in a very much narrower form to meet the class of cases which the Attorney-General has suggested. Perhaps the honorable and learned gentleman, upon recollecting that this clause was drawn when very much larger powers were provided for under the Bill, will see his way to withdraw it.

Mr. THOMSON.—We have restricted the power of the High Court, and we are now being asked to expand it.

Mr. CONROY.—Really this clause amounts to that. I remind the Committee that, under clause 15—

Any Justice of the High Court, sitting alone, may exercise in court, or, in the cases hereafter specified, in chambers, all or any part of the jurisdiction of the High Court.

So that, so far from any saving of time being secured by this clause, considerable additional delay might be involved. There would, for example, be a removal to a Justice of the High Court, and then the right of appeal would still continue from the Justice of the High Court to the Appellate High Court. There could be no possible saving of time under those circumstances. While the Supreme Courts of the various States are practically always ready to give their decision, it will be admitted that, considering the limited number of Judges of the High Court which the Committee seems likely to agree to, the delay under this proposal will be very much greater than without it. However, the chief objection I have to the clause rests on the ground that we are here being asked to extend a power which has been removed from the previous clauses by the Committee. So far as we could take it away, the Committee has taken away the whole of the original jurisdiction proposed to be conferred upon the High Court, and our desire has been, as far as possible, to create an appellate court only. Two principles were at first involved, the giving of appellate and also of original jurisdiction, and this clause 45 deals with questions of original jurisdiction, as if no alteration whatever had been made in the preceding clauses. The very fact that the Attorney-General was unable satisfactorily to answer the question put to him by the honorable and learned member for Corinella should preclude us from accepting the clause as it stands.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I hope that the Attorney-General will see his way to abandon this clause. In effect it provides first, that either party to a suit for cause, on application to the High Court may have a suit which is pending in a State Court transferred to the High Court, and that the Attorney-General, as of right, shall be entitled to have any such suit transferred to the High Court, whatever the wishes of the parties may be. In order to justify the clause we must show that it is likely to confer some benefit upon the parties, or that it is desirable in the interests of the Commonwealth. The only benefits that would be appreciated by the parties to a suit would be speed and economy in the conduct of the litigation. We may leave out of consideration cases which are pending in inferior Courts of States jurisdiction, because the decisions of such tribunals are not considered as binding except upon the parties to a suit. In the greater number of cases pending in the Supreme Courts of the States evidence will have to be taken either orally or on affidavit, and, if causes are removed, a single Judge of the High Court, instead of a Judge of a Supreme Court of a State, will have to hear that evidence. In either case there will be an appeal to the High Court, so that there will be no saving in time or expense by the removal. On the contrary, probably some time will be lost, because, I venture to say that, whether three or five Judges constitute the High Court, the original jurisdiction of that tribunal will not be exercised as speedily as the primary jurisdiction of the State Court. If a case should be partly heard, and one of the parties desired to remove it to the High Court, the whole of the proceedings before the State Court would have to be repeated before the High Court. Then there would be the expenses attendant upon the application for removal. Presumably the application would be made upon notice, and there would be a fight before the High Court as to whether or not the cause should be removed. The exercise of the right of removal of a cause from the primary Judge or Judge of first instance will not result in any saving, and if the power of removal is limited to pending appeals it can be exercised only in regard to appeals from a single Judge of a State Court to the Full Court of the State, in view of a subsequent appeal to the High Court. A single stage in the proceedings might be saved by the party who had won before the single Judge removing the cause from the appellate jurisdiction of the State Court to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court; possibly because he might think that he would lose before the Full Court of the State and win before the High Court. Such cases would not occur with frequency, or be of sufficient importance to justify the retention of the clause. Then the question arises whether the ultimate decision of the High Court could be evaded. I think that the Attorney-General will admit that the clause does not offer any safeguard unless regard is had to the fact that under it a litigant could bring before the High Court a case involving less than the appealable amount elsewhere provided for. It would rarely be worth while to transfer such a case to the High Court. The Attorney-General could justly intervene only in suits between private individuals which could not otherwise be brought before the High Court, but under the Bill as it stands there could be no such cases.

Mr. ISAACS.—Suppose that a private individual could not afford to take a case to the High Court?

Mr. McCAY.—If a suitor had not the money to enable him to take a case before the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction, would the Attorney-General, upon intervening, pay the expenses? He told us that the clause was intended to insure the speedy decision of the High Court in important constitutional matters. If the Attorney-General is to be a beneficent aider of impecunious litigants, and a friend and protector of poor suitors at the expense of the poor taxpayers generally, I shall vote against any such benevolent proposition.

Mr. ISAACS.—May it not be important for the Attorney-General to secure from the High Court a decision which will guide the whole Commonwealth?

Mr. McCAY.—If an appellant could not afford to appeal to the High Court, neither could he afford to appeal to the Full Court of a State; because we are told that the High Court is to be much less expensive to litigants than are the Supreme Courts in their appellate jurisdiction. The decision of the single Judge of a State would not have any weight in any other State, beyond that attached to a learned opinion, nor would it be binding upon his fellow Judges if they took a different view of the matter. Therefore, as regards the individual the proposal cannot make for economy or speed, whilst as regards important matters affecting the Commonwealth, the causes must ultimately go to the High Court if the litigants have the necessary money, or, if they have not, it is open to the Attorney-General to provide the funds for the appeal without exercising the power of removal.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The social democrats of Germany contend that the State should bear the whole expense of litigation.

Mr. McCAY.—We have not reached that stage here. My experience leads me to believe that there would be a great deal more litigation if the parties could escape the payment of the costs, and until we are further advanced on the lines of the social democrats' programme I am not prepared to regard that matter as within the field of practical politics, or to promise it my support when it does come within that area. The clause does not effect any good purpose that is not achieved by provisions already passed relating to appeals to the High Court. The Attorney-General has stated that he is prepared to agree to modifications, and I would suggest to him that it is not desirable to remove causes from courts of first instance to a single Judge of the High Court. We may regard the courts of first instance as capable of dealing with these matters, and getting the causes into form for decision, and if the clause is retained it should apply only to cases pending appeal from the court of first instance to the appellate court. The Attorney-General might also consent to the elimination of the power of intervention by the Attorney-General, because for all practical purposes the High Court will have ultimate jurisdiction under the clause already passed; that is, assuming that that clause is intra vires of the Constitution. Perhaps the arguments upon this head used against the clause to which I refer might also be urged, though with perhaps less force, against this clause. I ask the Attorney-General to agree to that limitation of the clause, and then let us decide whether the clause as amended shall or shall not be retained.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I think that the clause should be struck out altogether, though, of course, I agree with the honorable member for Corinella that it should be amended in the direction which he suggests. But I fail to see that it is required.

Mr. DEAKIN.—A stage will be saved if we provide for removal before appeal.

Mr. GLYNN.—A stage may be saved.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Then why not give an opportunity for the saving?

Mr. GLYNN.—By the last clause we passed we added a stage, so that I suppose the Attorney-General now wants to save a stage by way of counterbalance. But the clause is unnecessary. The power of removal was regarded in the case of Martin v. Hunter as inherent in the American Supreme Court under the implied powers of the Constitution, because otherwise the decision of the State Court might have been final. In that case it was laid down, not only that there is a power of removal to prevent States Courts from giving decisions upon questions of jurisdiction which could not be checked, but that the Federal Parliament was obliged to create Federal Courts in which to vest Federal jurisdiction. If a removal from an American State Court were not allowed, there would be no possibility under the American system of checking its decisions, because there is no Privy Council to appeal to. But here there is the right to appeal from the States Courts to the High Court in all matters, and there is the check of the Privy Council as well. Therefore, our need for a provision like this is nothing like so great as the need for the power under the American Constitution. But this clause is far more comprehensive than the American provision. In America there is no power of removal—except in one or two cases in which justice might otherwise be denied in small matters arising in the district courts, or where a public officer is concerned—unless the amount in dispute exceeds 2,000 dollars. Under the clause, however, a constitutional question might arise during the hearing of an action upon a bill of exchange, because the clause does not apply only to constitutional questions arising under section 74, and affecting the mutual rights of the Parliaments of the States and of the Commonwealth to pass laws, but to all Federal matters. That is the meaning of “Federal jurisdiction.”

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It will depend upon the meaning placed upon the words “for sufficient cause shown.”

Mr. GLYNN.—That is a matter for the discretion of the court; but a litigant would have the power to put his opponent to the expense of an application, even though the case was only one upon a bill of exchange in which £5 was in dispute. About 90 per cent. of the cases which would come under the clause are such as occur at the present time—State cases. The chief end which the Attorney-General has in view is to provide for the removal of cases where decisions are given on constitutional matters, but to do that he asks us to give the power of removal in all cases, sweeping into one net all the cases which may arise under section 51 of the Constitution. That is bad legislation. We should confine the operation of the clause to the necessities of the case. The honorable and learned gentleman, however, seems to act upon the principle that if we want to do a little we must do all. With regard to the power of intervention given to the Attorney-General, I think it is provided for in the wrong place. I quite understand that where an important constitutional matter has arisen on the judgment of a State Court or of the High Court in original jurisdiction, and the litigant does not wish to take his case on to the Court of Appeal, the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth should be allowed to do so. I go further, and say that in certain cases the Attorney-General of the State should be allowed to intervene, and bring a matter on appeal to the High Court, or to the Privy Council, whichever Parliament likes to fix upon. Suppose that in a small matter in a District Court the question of the rights of the Commonwealth Parliament and a State Parliament inter se arose, and a decision was given affecting the constitutional powers of one of those bodies, and the litigants had not sufficient funds to conduct an appeal. In such a case the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, if the Commonwealth was concerned, and the Attorney-General of the State if the validity of a State law was affected, should be allowed to intervene, and have the question authoritatively settled once and for all. That might be done at the expense of the Commonwealth or of the State, whichever was affected. I think there is some power of that sort in the Canadian Constitution. At all events there is a power of reference. If a constitutional point is raised in any of the lower courts in Canada, it can be carried on to the Supreme Court or to the Privy Council, by the Attorney-General raising a point by way of opinion, and that is a much more independent way of dealing with the matter than the method provided for here, because the actual issue between the litigants is not decided, but only the constitutional point involved. Under the method provided here, the rights of the parties may be affected, both as to the amount of the judgment given and the costs. In Canada, however, the judgment is not affected. All that is done is to carry the constitutional point on to the Supreme Court or to the Privy Council. No such power exists under our Constitution, though some of us did our best to have provision made for it. We can, however, provide that where an important constitutional point arises in connexion with appellate cases—and I think that the provision might be limited to matters of constitutionality arising under section 74—and is left undecided by the litigants, the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, or the Attorney-General of the State, may step in and have it dealt with by way of appeal. But that power should not be given in this clause, because it has relation only to appellate jurisdiction. But, under this clause, power is given to the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, though not to an Attorney-General of the State, instead of waiting until a decision is given, to intervene at any stage, either in the beginning, or after judgment has been given. But if it is right that the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth should have that power, it is right that it should be given also to the Attorneys-General of the States, because not only may the powers of the Commonwealth be challenged, but the powers of the States may also be challenged, and provision should be made for such an occurrence. Honorable members will therefore see that the clause is imperfect even from the point of view of the Government, because it gives to one party only a remedy to which both are entitled, and which ought to belong to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court. Under these circumstances I think the Attorney-General should not continue his opposition to the wish of honorable members to have the clause omitted. If he amends the appellate clauses with a view to allowing the intervention of a State or the Commonwealth after judgment has been given, there are many reasons why such a provision should be supported, and then the omission of this clause will not destroy the whole object that he has in view.

Mr. DEARIN.—But if this provision is retained we can miss a stage.

Mr. GLYNN.—Possibly. I do not see much objection to that, but all the honorable and learned member wants to accomplish is accomplished at the present time. I think that he should adopt the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and even go further, and make the clause apply only under section 74 of the Constitution Act, where the constitutionality of a statute is affected. I would, therefore, suggest the insertion, after the word "jurisdiction," in line 2, of the words "under section 74 of the Constitution." That may cover cases in which it is desirable that the High Court should have the first and only say. They are partly provided for already, but if the Attorney-General wishes to have a subsidiary provision, and amends the clause in that direction, I shall not vote against it, though without such an amendment I must do so.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I believe that the power of removal is part of the appellate power, and, consequently, I cannot object to that portion of the clause which provides that in special cases the High Court may remove a cause pending in a State Court upon the application of one of the parties. So far, I am with the honorable and learned member in charge of the Bill, on the grounds which I have previously stated, but I take strong objection to the power reserved to the Attorney-General to remove. I do not see why he should intervene to remove a private suit during its hearing in a State Court which is exercising Federal jurisdiction. Why should he remove a case during its progress through a State Court? Let the parties fight it out, and let it be determined by the State Court first.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall not press that part of the clause.

Sir JOHN QUICK. — I am glad to hear the honorable and learned gentleman say that. If that part of the clause is omitted, my objection to the clause will be removed. It may be, however, that provision should be made in some other part of the Bill for special cases where the decision of a Supreme Court has been given upon a Federal question.

Mr. DEAKIN. — And the matter is not taken further?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—And the matter is not taken further. The interests of the Commonwealth may in some indirect way be related to, or determined by, a decision in a State Court, or a State right or a Federal right might be left in doubt. It might be desirable in such a case to allow the Attorney-General to cause an appeal to be made, so that the matter might be dealt with by the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If there is no power to remove while a case is pending before the State Court, the removal will be practically an appeal.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It would be an appeal after determination. If that portion of the clause to which I object is removed I shall support the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I do not agree that the Attorney-General should have power as of course to remove a cause. But I think the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth should have power to protect its interests in some shape and form when the exceptional circumstances of the case require it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That will very rarely happen.

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes; but I think in all cases he should be under the same obligation as either of the parties to show sufficient cause for removal to the High Court. I should not object to allow the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth or the Attorney-General of a State to intervene in a case if sufficient cause were shown to the High Court, which would mean that the court would be called upon to say that there were good reasons for its removal. I think the case might be met by reserving to the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, and to the Attorney-General of a State, leave to apply to intervene in a case in its primary stage. In a case before the Supreme Court, or any other Court of a State, it might be very important that the Attorney-General of either the Commonwealth or the State concerned should be present before the facts were finally decided. We know that when the facts of a case are finally decided, the question of law may run almost as a matter of course. It may be of the highest importance, in some particular case, that the Commonwealth and the State shall be protected in regard to the determination of the facts, because, after a case goes to appeal, the facts are not as a rule raised again, and the court decides the law on the facts as put before it; and, for a long time after, the facts as found in a particular case may limit the law in the particular State concerned. It is therefore important that the facts shall be rightly found, so that all courts and persons may act upon them properly from the beginning. Subject to that, I see no reason why power should not be given to suitors to apply to the High Court for an order to remove any cause involving a matter of Federal jurisdiction, which is pending in any State Court. I think that the fallacy lurking in the minds of honorable members is that upon any such application being made, the High Court will, as a matter of course, order such removal, whereas the clause under discussion merely empowers the High Court "for sufficient cause," to order it. In other words, if that tribunal thinks that any particular case is of so exceptional a nature that it ought to be removed from a State Court, it has the power to order its removal. In this respect the provision is very similar to that which operates in our State laws. For example, a man may bring an action in the County Court, and the other party to the suit may apply to have it heard by the Supreme Court. The positions are of an analogous nature. In each case, power is given to order the removal of any cause provided that it is of an exceptional nature.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does not this clause give the Attorney-General power to extend the original jurisdiction?

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes; but I do not agree that the Attorney-General should have a right to remove causes from the States Courts to the High Court as a matter of course. I think that there is great virtue in the clause. We can never foresee what circumstances may arise. I can conceive of no harm being worked by the operation of such a provision, and possibly it may result in much good. It is guarded against abuse by the use of the words—"for sufficient cause shown."

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Why not say—"for special reasons shown"?

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not object to the inclusion of those words in the clause. I think that some safety valve should be provided for circumstances that we cannot foresee, by enabling the High Court, in special cases, to remove causes into its own cognizance from the beginning. If that were done the Attorney-General, in making any special application, would have to show sufficient cause in support thereof, otherwise the High Court would not entertain it. It might be very important that the Attorney-General of a State, which was involved in litigation before the Supreme Court of another State should have power to apply for the immediate removal of the cause to the High Court.

Mr. CONROY.—Such a provision might be very unjustly used.

Mr. ISAACS.—I cannot conceive of it being unjustly used, if the High Court has a discretionary power—if it is told that it is to exercise its power only for special reasons. I think we can trust the High Court to do justice in each case. If the Attorney-General is placed upon the same footing as other litigants, with the safeguards I have indicated, I shall be disposed to support the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I think it would be very dangerous to concede the power to remove causes at any stage. I know well enough how such a power would be abused. Let us take for example a case connected with bills of exchange, which come within the Commonwealth competency. Every civilized country has provided means for deciding the liability of a man upon bills of exchange by summary process. Under the present law of Victoria and New South Wales, after the issue of a writ, a defendant is no longer able to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining his rights by postponing the evil day as long as he can, by protracting the proceedings. The plaintiff applies for summary judgment, and the defendant must show that he has a good defence, or judgment is given against him without allowing him an opportunity to be heard. This practice is a great convenience to banks and other financial institutions. But, under this clause, what will happen? I say unhesitatingly that, under its operation, frequent endeavours will be made to remove causes from the States Courts to the High Court with the view to delaying the course of justice. It should also be recollected that delay very often affords an opportunity to litigants to get rid of property, and it is, therefore, highly inadvisable to confer upon them the power to remove actions at any stage. I was very glad that the Attorney-General intimated his intention to prevent the removal of causes until they had been fully heard by the States Courts.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Until the facts had been ascertained.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes; until the final stage.

Mr. MCCAY.—I do not know that he has agreed to that.

Mr. HIGGINS.—At any rate the honorable gentleman seems inclined to act in that way. I would further point out that during the hearing of cases a Judge frequently makes observations which disclose the direction in which his mind is working; consequently the interested parties to any suit listen with great eagerness to such observations. But under this clause as soon as a suitor discovers that a particular Judge takes up an antagonistic attitude towards him, he will at once avail himself of its provisions, and find some reason for the removal of his cause to the High Court, because he will thereby secure another "run for his money."

Mr. McCAY.—Proceedings will have to be stayed till the application to the High Court is heard.

Mr. ISAACS.—The clause does not provide for anything of that sort.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It must be remembered that every application brings grist to the lawyer's mill. What honorable members do not sufficiently realize is that under the Commonwealth Constitution the operations of this Parliament cover a far wider area than do those of the States Legislatures. If we compare the matters in which our Parliament has jurisdiction under section 51 of the Constitution with those in which the United States Congress has jurisdiction, we shall find that there is an enormous difference between them. When we commence to enact laws relating to banking, currency, bills of exchange, and divorce, it will be found that nearly every matter of commercial import, and a great many of social and domestic concern, will come within the scope of our legislation. Why should not cases of divorce, or cases relating to infants, or to companies, be tried by the Supreme Courts of the States? All such cases are at present dealt with by those tribunals. Of course, the honorable and learned member for Indi will say that it will rest with the High Court to determine whether sufficient cause has been shown for the removal of any cause from the States Courts to itself. But I would point out that each case involves the making of an application, and that most ingenious attempts will be made to raise issues which never would be raised but for this power of removal. I think there is a strong feeling both in this Chamber and elsewhere that the more the functions of the High Court are restricted to matters of appeal the better. There will be an enormous number of cases under the ordinary Federal laws with which the tribunals will have to deal. Very often I see obvious evidence of rich litigants by means of numerous applications compelling poor suitors to submit to an unjust compromise. I am quite sure that the Committee have no desire to countenance that sort of thing. I hold that the power of removal is a very exceptional one to confer, and I would point out that in the United States it is very limited. May I remind the Attorney-General that in the United States a suitor cannot remove any cause from the States Courts in which the sum involved is less than 2,000 dollars. It must be a very exceptional case. But, apart from that limitation, there is no power to remove causes unless the State Court has decided against a Federal Act, or in favour of a State Act.

Mr. ISAACS.—In the United States I do not think there is any limit as to amount.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Oh, yes. In Moon, on The Removal of Causes, page 146, I find the following:—

The amount in dispute in an ordinary case must exceed the sum or value of 2,000 dollars to make it a removable one.

The Attorney-General desires to apply the power of removal to a far wider area of causes than is covered in the United States. No doubt he is actuated by the laudable anxiety that the Judges of the High Court shall have plenty of work to perform, but I do not desire them to obtain that work at unnecessary expense to litigants. I feel that he will serve his purpose better—having regard to the temper of the country and of Parliament—if he will allow the functions of the High Court to be confined as much as possible to the exercise of appellate jurisdiction. Of course, I do not attempt to predict the decision of the Committee in regard to the number of Judges to be appointed. But I think that the general tendency of the voting will be in the direction of limiting the number of Judges, and limiting the jurisdiction, making it as far as possible a court of appeal in Federal matters. I would ask the Attorney-General to consent to strike out the words "at any stage of the proceedings before final judgment," and although I would not ask him to consent to do it right off, he might consider whether he would not take away the power of removal before final judgment, and simply leave the ordinary right of appeal. If you do not give the power of removal before final judgment there will be a right of appeal. I might move an amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The clause will have to be recommitted to make any further amendments in it, because it has been amended right down to the end.

Mr. HIGGINS.—"For sufficient cause" is hardly definite enough.

Mr. DEAKIN.—"For special cause" has been suggested.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I would go even farther than that. I can see that if we keep the power of removal, there is a distinction between a cause in which the Constitution is involved, and a cause in which a Federal law is involved. There is no real need for removing a cause because a mere Federal law is involved; but there may be a ground for removing a cause where the Constitution is involved. A Federal law may be amended if it seems to be uncertain. It should be remembered, also, that Federal laws include divorce laws, bills of exchange laws, company laws, and mercantile laws generally.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—They may involve matters affecting the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am speaking of the effect of Federal laws. That is very different from a question of whether a Federal law or a State law goes against the Constitution. In a case where there is only a question as to the meaning of the Federal law, I do not see why there should be the power of removal, but in a case where there is a question as to the scope and ambit of the Constitution I can see that there is much more reason for that power, and although I think that it might be omitted, I suggest that as an alternative.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I hope that I have collected the meaning of the Committee from the interesting discussion which has been maintained in connexion with the clauses. Although I felt that the changes made in the measure would require alterations here, I thought it best to endeavour to obtain the mind of the Committee before essaying that difficult task. We are placed in the position—and it is not altogether a disadvantage—that having amended this clause, we cannot further amend it now to meet the views of honorable members, even if we desire to undertake that task at once. What I propose to do is to ask honorable members to allow the clause to pass, undertaking to recommit it with the amendments which I shall be prepared to suggest on further consideration. As I take it, the trend of the mind of the Committee is to limit this power of removal as far as possible to the appellate stage, to make it ancillary to appeals, and, if possible, to indicate the cases in which alone it shall be applied, to make it in all cases dependent upon the High Court, being satisfied that there is substantial ground for that removal, and possibly—I have noted it —to limit its area to cases arising under the Constitution or involving its interpretation. I must confess that it was the illustrations drawn from that class of cases which principally occupied my mind when I was previously speaking. Having now an indication of the mind of the Committee in regard to the clauses preceding, I hope I shall be able to submit amendments which shall represent the sense of the great majority.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Eliminating the part relating to the Attorney-General?

Mr. DEAKIN.—My present thought is to leave the Attorney-General power only on the same terms as any other person if I do not make a separate provision allowing the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth or of the States to refer certain cases as was suggested by my honorable and learned friend, Mr. Glynn, or in the manner suggested by the honorable and learned member for Indi. That proposal seems to me to be one which, if separated from this clause, might be very useful. It certainly could not prejudice the interests of any litigant, while it might assist the solution of difficult problems if such happen to arise in minor cases which would otherwise not be brought to appeal. The decision in such a case might, within a State at all events, and perhaps over a wider area if it were a court exercising Federal jurisdiction, operate unfavorably to the construction of the Constitution which, in the interests of the Commonwealth, ought to be maintained. If honorable members will pass the clause as it is it will be reprinted, and they will then be able to grasp with less difficulty the significance of the amendments I shall propose.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 47 to 51 postponed.

Clause 52—

1. There shall be paid to the Chief Justice a salary at the rate three thousand five hundred pounds a year, and to each other Justice a salary at the rate of three thousand pounds a year.

2. There shall also be paid to each Justice of the High Court, on account of his expenses in travelling to discharge the duties of his office, such sums as are considered reasonable by the Governor-General.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—Surely we are not going to pass the clause without any debate. I understand that some amendments have been given notice of. I consider that the salaries proposed to be paid are too high. I am quite aware that in some of the States, for instance in Victoria, such salaries are paid.

Mr. DEAKIN.—New South Wales and Queensland, too.

Mr. McCAY.—In Victoria the salaries of all future Judges are to be £500 less than the salaries of the present Judges.

Mr. MAUGER.—They will also get a pension.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not see why a Judge with a salary of £3,000 should get a pension any more than a post-office messenger with a salary at £100 or £200. A Judge has a better chance of providing for his old age than the average working man. I do not propose to vote for pensions to Federal Judges. They should be left as other people are to provide for their old age. I think that the salaries ought to be reduced, but I am not prepared at this moment to say what salaries should be paid. I only rose because I thought that the clause was going to be passed without debate.

Mr. GLYNN.—What does the honorable and learned member say to a salary of £3,000 for the Chief Justice, and a salary of £2,500 for the other Judges?

Mr. McCAY.—I shall not move an amendment at the present time. Like the Attorney-General, I shall wait to see what the sense of the Committee is.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—Whatever its individual opinion may be the Committee is in a certain way committed by the action of certain of the States Parliaments in voting salaries of £3,500 to their Chief Justices. They only do that because they find it necessary to have a perfectly free choice in order to get the best men. I would point out to those honorable members who happen to think that a smaller salary should be paid to the Chief Justice that we are in a certain sense precluded from fixing any amount which we may think reasonable while the States Parliaments retain their present rates of salaries. It stands to reason that we could not get a man to take a smaller salary in one position than he can get in the other position. If I am referred to the example of the United States I shall reply that in New York there are 34 Judges whose average salary amounts to £3,500.

Mr. McCAY.—Are they as good as the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States at £2,100?

Mr. CONROY.—It shows the price that the State has to pay for its Judges. In making the appointments to the Bench of the Supreme Court the United States is absolutely limited to a number of wealthy men, that is if it wishes to obtain the services of men of known and tried abilities. Of course, if it went outside that class it could get plenty of men to take the positions at a salary of £100.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Are they such inferior men in the United States and Canada?

Mr. CONROY.—If I am assured that there is a sufficient number of wealthy men at the Bar here—men of the best experience who are prepared to make the large sacrifice which is involved in the acceptance of a Judgeship—

Mr. McCAY.—Are not the best men, if chosen for the Bench, as a rule those who have been making the largest incomes at the Bar.

Mr. CONROY.—My own opinion is that it is so, but it does not always follow that a man is willing to give up his practice. I could mention four or five leading men at the bar in New South Wales who have refused to accept the salary which is offered there, and I have no doubt that in one or two cases Victoria has had a similar experience. There are two considerations which should actuate us at the present moment. We desire to secure the most suitable men for the positions, and to offer them what is a quid pro quo for what they must practically give up, and we desire that the best men shall be attracted to the service of the Federal Government as against the service of the States. If the best men are attracted to the States Benches, it stands to reason that the opinions of the States Judges will be of more value than the opinions of the High Court Judges. In these days of economy we are all desirous of limiting the expenditure as far as is possible having regard to the importance of obtaining men of the highest ability; and I do not see how we can fix a lower sum for the salary of the Federal Chief Justice than is at present paid to the Chief Justices in at least three of the States. Much as I disapprove of the Government in many respects, I think they have adopted the only attitude open to them on the present occasion. I was, and I still am, strongly opposed to the constitution of the Federal High Court as quite unnecessary; but now that we have determined on having a High Court, we ought to be able to select a Judiciary composed of men who show that their abilities in their outside walks of life are rated at something like the salaries now proposed. It cannot be inferred for a moment that, because in three of the States the Chief Justices each receive £3,500 per annum, three corrupt Parliaments have been ready to give larger salaries than are necessary.

Mr. PAGE.—That was the case in one of the three States.

Mr. CONROY.—But what about the other two States? I remember when the present Chief Justice of Queensland was elevated to the Bench, the late Sir Henry Parkes, whose public appointments throughout New South Wales reflected great credit on his judgment, and have been of eminent service to that State, said that Queensland could not afford to lose from its political life a man of the ability of Sir Samuel Griffith—that in Parliament he could save Queensland the amount of his salary twenty or thirty times over every year.

Mr. PAGE.—Sir Samuel Griffith voted the money for himself.

Mr. CONROY.—I had a conversation with Sir Henry Parkes on Sir Samuel Griffith's appointment at the time, and am thus able to state his opinion of the loss to Queensland in that gentleman's retirement from public life, and I do not think there is any breach of confidence in making public the circumstance. Whether we like it or not, we are bound by the decision of the various States Parliaments in this respect.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member has not applied that rule in other matters.

Mr. CONROY.—In a matter of this kind the States afford a good precedent; at any rate, we do not find that in any of the States there is agitation for a reduction of the salaries at present paid to the Judges.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—No future Chief Justice in Victoria will receive £3,500 per annum.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable member for Gippsland say that the Federal Government could not afford £3,500 per annum for the Federal Chief Justice when three Judges of the States Courts are at present receiving that amount? I do not believe that we can make the High Court as effective as it would otherwise be unless we offer salaries sufficient to attract men who will be a credit to the Judiciary; and under the circumstances I feel bound to support the Government. No doubt the Government would gain more popularity throughout Australia just at the present time if they made salaries low; but I venture to say that if later on the question was raised as to unsuitable Judges having been selected, they would find themselves accused of false economy. In dealing with the affairs of a continent like Australia we must remember the Roman maxim, the very age of which proves its value—"Sometimes the greatest tax of all is parsimony." That, I am inclined to think, will be the conclusion arrived at if the Committee do not adopt the proposals of the Government.

Mr. A. McLEAN (Gippsland).—It would be a great mistake to pass this clause as it stands. We must remember that the times were very different when the high salaries were fixed for the States Judges. The best talent was then very scarce, as it was possible to earn large sums at the Bar. Those were the golden days when we in Victoria fixed the salary of the Governor at £15,000 per annum; and we know that now his salary has been reduced to £5,000, though the salaries of the Judges remain at the original figures. A law has, however, been passed fixing the salary of future Chief Justices at £3,000 per annum, and the salaries of the puisne Judges at £2,500.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — But the States Judges receive pensions.

Mr. A. McLEAN. — Pensions are also provided in this Bill, and will be dealt with later on; at any rate, the question of pensions is not mixed up with the question we are now discussing.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—If the honorable member is comparing the proposed salaries with the salaries of the States Judges, it must be remembered that the latter receive pensions, and that the clause providing pensions under this Bill may hereafter be struck out.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—But for one consideration I should regard the salaries I have just mentioned as much too high. They are much higher than are paid in other parts of the world. In the United States, with a population of 87,000,000, the Chief Justice receives £2,100 per annum, and the puisne Judges £2,000, and surely the duties they perform must be as important as those to be performed in Australia, with a population of less than 4,000,000? I do not think it would be wise to fix the salary of the Federal Chief Justice at a lower sum than it is intended to give future Chief Justices in Victoria, and for that reason alone I am prepared to go to the length of fixing the salaries at £3,000 and £2,500 for the Chief Justice and the puisne Judges respectively under this Bill. We can get the services of the best men available for the position of Prime Minister at a lower salary than that proposed for the Federal Chief Justice.

Mr. MAUGER.—And the position of Prime Minister is uncertain in tenure.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—A man may run the risk of losing his practice at the Bar for the sake of a year or two of office, and yet we have no difficulty in getting the best men as Premiers and as Prime Minister.

Mr. CONROY.—Surely the honorable member does not pretend that a Prime Minister or Premier is paid an adequate sum in return for his work, seeing that a bank manager may receive £3,000 per annum?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I consider that £3,000 per annum is an excellent salary for any Judge. In these days, when the professions are largely overstocked, and a great many legal practitioners are unable to obtain briefs, there will be very little difficulty in getting the best talent available for the Federal Judiciary. When commencing our career as a nation it would be a fatal mistake to fix the standard unreasonably high. In fixing the salaries we must have regard to the maximum, and go down on a graduated scale through the other salaries; and if we fix the remuneration of the Judges—who occupy the highest-paid offices—at an unreasonably high figure, we shall not be able to fix other salaries at an amount proportionate to the services rendered.

Mr. SAWERS.—Why should there be such a large difference between the salary of the Chief Justice and the salaries of the puisne Judges?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I am merely taking the salaries as they are proposed; otherwise I might be disposed to think the difference rather too great. However, I shall not in any case vote for a higher salary than £3,000 for the Chief Justice, because to go beyond that would be to take a mistaken step which we might not be able to retrace. These appointments are practically for life; and after we have induced men to give up the practice of their profession, we cannot break faith with them by reducing their salaries.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Constitution forbids it.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—And therefore we shall be making a fatal mistake if we fix the salaries unreasonably high. I shall support a reduction of the salaries to at least the limits I have mentioned.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I do not agree that our hands are tied in any way, but hold that Parliament is perfectly free to do what is deemed best in this important matter. I intend to move that the salary of the Chief Justice be reduced by £1,000, because in my opinion £2,500 per annum is sufficiently high as a commencing salary. It is much easier to go up than down in the matter of salaries. I do not subscribe to the theory promulgated to-night, that a Judge goes on the Bench merely for the sake of what he can make out of the position. I read an article to-day, in the Age or the Argus, by Professor Harrison Moore, who expresses the opinion that Judges sell their law precisely as a grocer sells sugar, or any other commodity. I do not agree with that view. My own opinion is that most of our leading lawyers sacrifice something in the way of remuneration when they are elevated to the Bench. We are told repeatedly that barristers when pleading at the bar earn much larger amounts than they do when they become Judges; and personally I believe that the present Chief Justices in nearly all the States made great pecuniary sacrifice when they went on the Bench. If that be so, it is clear that the Bench has attractions other than those of a monetary character. The prestige and status of a Judgeship are in themselves a high attraction to ambitious men, apart altogether from the remuneration offered. As has been suggested, the attraction of the judicial office is something akin to that of the Premiership of a State. It is well known that the present Premier of Victoria is making a huge sacrifice of income in holding the position he does. If this operates in connexion with the administrative functions of a State, why not in connexion with the interpretation of its laws?

Mr. CONROY.—A man has power when he is at the head of a State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has a Judge no power?

Mr. CONROY.—To construe laws, but not to make them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think that a Judge has more real power than any other man can have. At any rate we might begin in a modest, economical way in connexion with the judicial offices of the Commonwealth. If we must not offer a lesser salary to the Federal Judges than is being paid in the States, the same argument would apply to all the civil servants in the pay of the Commonwealth. We have paid smaller salaries in nearly every other case.

Mr. McCAY.—The Federal Parliament pays the heads of the Commonwealth Departments about 25 per cent. less than the States pay the heads of their Departments.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Quite so. Take the case of the Secretary for External Affairs. He gets £800 a year, but the head of a corresponding Department in New South Wales receives £1,100 a year. The Secretary for Home Affairs receives £700, whereas £1,000 is paid in New South Wales. The Secretary to the Attorney-General's Department receives £750 a year; a similar State officer receives £950. And so, all through the gamut of these salaries, we have deliberately fixed them at a much lower rate than is paid in the States.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is no Federal extravagance there.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I see none. On the other hand, it is only fair to say that I do not believe that the Federal officers have the same amount of work to do as have similar officers of the States, for the simple reason that all our functions are not yet developed. Similarly, my own opinion is that the Judges will not have so much work to do; that is to say, it will not be so continuous, and their noses will not be kept so close to the grindstone in the earlier stages of federation, as is the case with the Judges of the States Courts. My object is to give to the court as few functions as possible. It is a much easier matter to clothe the court with greater powers, and to increase the salaries of the Judges at a subsequent period, than to curtail its powers and pay the Judges less, once the court becomes a settled institution in the country. We see how difficult it is to interfere in any way with the present States Courts. Reductions ought to be made in connexion with all of them. That is the doctrine that is being preached industriously throughout the Commonwealth. But it is found to be a matter of prodigious labour and of almost insuperable difficulty to curtail the privileges and the functions of State institutions in any way whatever. So it will be with the Judges of the High Court. Therefore we shall do a wise thing, and certainly a thing that will be in keeping with our protestations of economy, if we reduce the amount to be paid to the Judges. I move—

That the word "three," line 2, be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

I move this amendment with the object of fixing the salary at £2,500 a year.

Mr. MAUGER.—Make it £3,000 and many of us will vote with the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I consider that £2,500 would be an adequate salary.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I do not desire to enter into this question very seriously after the debate of a legal character which we have had to-night; but I wish to say that I cannot see that the Chief Justice will have much more work to do than the other Judges. Therefore, if we reduce the salary of the Chief Justice to £3,000, we should fix the salaries of the other Judges at £3,000 also. We have not yet fixed the number of Judges, but I am taking it for granted that there will be three. We ought not to be too penurious about this matter, because justice is cheap at any cost. Justice is something wherein the height of extravagance may be the essence of economy. Therefore, I shall be perfectly willing to pay £3,000 per annum to each of three Judges. It is nonsense to argue that we must pay £3,500 to our Chief Justice because a State has done so. That is a ridiculous way of looking at the matter. What have we to do with the States? The States can vote what they like. The State of Victoria gave for years £10,000 a year to her Governor, and borrowed the money with which to pay it. That is economy from the Victorian point of view. For years all the States borrowed the money with which to pay high salaries. But the Commonwealth must live within its own means. The Commonwealth has already given back to the States a surplus greater than it is required to do under the Constitution, to enable them to pay their way. I shall vote, not because the States pay their Judges £3,500, or £10,000 or whatever it may be, but because I consider a certain sum to be a proper amount to pay the Judges of the High Court of Australia. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa has said that in the State of New York the Judges are paid £3,500 a year.

There are no pensions attached to those positions.

Mr. PAGE.—How much do they make besides?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I have heard a good deal about corruption among the Judges in America, but my experience is that law and justice in the United States are as pure as in any part of the world. I received far more even-handed justice while I was living in the United States than I got in South Australia at the hands of one of the Judges of the Supreme Court there.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member won his case there.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Yes, I won it; and I got forty "bob" for my character. I am perfectly willing to tell the truth, though some honorable members would be afraid to get up and say how much their characters are considered to be worth. The point to bear in mind is that we have nothing whatever to do with what the States pay. It is a pity that the States do not abolish their useless tinselled Governors, and make the Chief Justices take their place. If they did they could save a lot more money; and if the Kyabramapootrahs and the gilded-spurred roosters would begin to crow in that line it would be far better for the States. I am talking of the Deform Leagues of this country, which have their paid agitators, who say that we are extravagant, while the States will pay any price for a jamboree or a fandango. I intend to vote against the honorable member's amendment, with a view of supporting the payment to all the Judges of a salary of £3,000 a year.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—As I intend to move that the provision with regard to pensions for the Judges be struck out, I cannot follow my honorable friend the member for Parramatta in his amendment to reduce the salary of the Chief Justice to £2,500. A salary of £3,000 for the Chief Justice, and salaries of £2,500 for the other Judges, would be sufficient even for such important positions. I quite agree with my honorable friend the member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley, that Judges do not take positions of this kind merely for the monetary considerations connected with them. I notice that the late Professor Morris says, in his Memoir of the late Chief Justice Higinbotham, that the statement to the effect that he had made a monetary sacrifice in becoming a Judge was not in accordance with fact.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He made a monetary sacrifice when he went into politics, and was punished for his politics.

Mr. MAUGER.—We all make sacrifices in going into politics, and do not get credit for it.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—And generally get punished!

Mr. MAUGER.—I think that if we fixed the salary of the Chief Justice at £3,000 per annum and abolished the pensions, we should be offering a scale of remuneration commensurate with the positions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I hope that the Committee will not alter this clause in any particular; because if they do so they will place the Commonwealth, at the very outset of its career in connexion with the High Court, at the disadvantage of finding itself outbid in each of the States. The important consideration has escaped the honorable member for Gippsland that even in the State of Victoria, after a time of economy and reduction, they still propose to pay £3,000 a year to the Chief Justice, and £2,000 to their other Justices of the Supreme Court—six in all; and to continue the pensions which they have always paid to them. These proposed salaries for the Judges of the High Court are, of course, followed by another clause in which a scheme is given for limited pensions. What we have to consider is the position that we shall occupy if we offer these positions to the leading men at the Bar in the States, or if they should be offered to any of the Judges who are now on the State Benches. Are we to ask them, in the one case, to accept a largely diminished income, and in the other case to step down from the receipt of the incomes they now enjoy, with pensions added, to take a lower salary, and perhaps diminished pensions, in order to enter into the service of the Commonwealth? It is perfectly true that the consideration of pay is not the only one that attracts leading members of the Bar to these high offices. There is the permanency; there is the social dignity; there is the opportunity offered to men of high character and intellect to write their names large in the legal history of the country. All these motives count, and will continue to count. But what will be the effect if these salaries are reduced below the current rates in the States? Victoria is the only State that has lately reduced the salaries of future Judges. In New South Wales there has been no such proposal, nor, so far as I am aware, is there such a proposal in any of the other States.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—What does South Australia pay?

Mr. DEAKIN.—£2,000; but her population is about one-fifth of the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. McCAY.—And her Chief Justice is a man with a magnificent record.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But he has the good fortune to hold a position similar to that which many of the Judges of the United States occupy—that he is a wealthy man, absolutely independent of his office. In the United States of America the salaries of the Judges of the High Court were fixed at £2,100 a year, when that sum was more than equivalent to the £3,500 a year paid in Australia at present. Attempts have been made in America for a number of years to alter that rate of salary, and increases would have been carried last session but for the fact that the two political parties came into hopeless collision over other legislation, and the session had to be closed with most of its business unfinished. According to an article published in Harper's Weekly, the salaries of the United States High Court Judges would undoubtedly have been raised in the last session of Congress, but for the fact I have mentioned. As I have already said, they were fixed at a time when America had the same number of people as Australia has to-day, and when the value of £2,100 a year, represented more than £3,500 a year does to-day in Australia. The facts are very much the same in Canada. In Canada the salaries were fixed at a time when Canadian rates were even lower than they are now; and Canadian rates, as honorable members are aware, are always lower than Australian rates. I commend to honorable members the letter by Professor Harrison Moore, published in to-day's Argus, wherein he shows that the principal legal journal of Canada states that the low salaries paid there are a direct bar to attracting the best men to the Bench.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The evidence is that the salaries do not attract the men who are earning the largest incomes at the Bar.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In these States I am aware that there are many men at the Bar who are reputed to be making considerably larger sums than the Chief Justices of the States are paid.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They have refused Judgeships.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is understood that they have refused Judgeships. The present Chief Justice of Victoria refused to accept a Judgeship until offered the position of Chief Justice, which carried with it a salary equal to that proposed by us. That was some five or six years ago. In Victoria and in New South Wales, and probably in Queensland, we can point to-day to members of the Bar who are earning more than is proposed to be given to the Chief Justice. In some cases they are certainly, and in others probably, earning more than the salary we have fixed.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—But their earnings are not permanent.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am coming to that point. I have little doubt but that if we fixed the salaries which have been mentioned, we should be able to obtain men qualified for the office. But we should not be able to obtain men in the prime of life who, with the full capacity of earning before them, are carrying on their practice at the Bar and are probably earning something considerably above the salaries proposed. The men obtained for the positions would have the advantage, perhaps, of riper wisdom, but they would be men who felt their powers to be not what they were, and who realized that it might not be possible to continue to earn a larger income.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—The case of Chief Justice Way is against the Attorney-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He is a man of independent fortune with whom the Chief Justiceship counts. If there be a sufficient number of independent men in Australia to fill these positions, no doubt some of them would be prepared to accept salaries lower than those proposed in the Bill. But I submit it to the Committee as an incontestable fact that we shall not be able to have a free choice, both from the Bench and the Bar, if we fix the salary of the Chief Justice at the amount named in the amendment. I would myself have fixed a lower salary than that provided in the Bill, if I had thought it possible to obtain that free choice by doing so. But I took the lowest sum possible. The salary fixed in the Bill is being paid in three other States, and only in one has a future reduction been authorized. What chance have we then of carrying out our desire, when, looking round at Bench and Bar, we ask ourselves whether the three or the five Judges—I hope it will be five—to be appointed are to be the best men that we can obtain? When we have found them are we to go to them cap in hand and request them to accept the position, because of the dignity it will confer? Can we say that we expect them to make so great a sacrifice of their incomes in order that we may obtain their services.

SIR LANGDON BONYTHON.—The Chief Justice of South Australia surrendered a practice of £6,000 per annum for an office carrying a salary of £2,000 per annum, and the dignity attaching to it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The salary which Chief Justice Way receives from the State is not the income upon which he depends. If he received nothing from the State he would still be independent. When the honorable member can show us a number of persons as able and as wealthy as is Chief Justice Way, we shall be in a happy position. But we shall be placed in an unfair position, especially at the outset of the Commonwealth, if we have to offer salaries lower than those actually paid in three of the States of the Union. The gentleman holding this position is to be the Chief Justice of the whole of Australia, but if measured by his income he is to be a man of less standing than are the Chief Justices of three of the States over all of which he presides, and all of which fall within his area. This is to be the status of the first Chief Justice of the Federal Courts which are to interpret our Constitution and our laws, and upon whose interpretation of the Constitution its future reading for a long time is certain to depend. I do not wish to delay the Committee, but would remind honorable members that the salaries we have fixed are far below the standard set by English salaries. It is true that they are above those paid in Canada and the United States, which were fixed a century ago; but they are not above the amounts which to-day have to be paid in Canada and the United States, where they seek to obtain the best men and do obtain them. We have no desire to constitute a court such as that in Canada, to which the chief legal journal of the Dominion has referred in the severe terms which have been quoted. We have no desire to see our court passed by because there is no confidence in its decisions. We have no desire to see it the Chief Court in Australia only in name, because men will not accept positions on the Bench.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The salaries paid in Canada are not one-half the amount of those proposed by the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Chief Justice receives £1,650, while the other members of the Bench are paid £1,450 per annum. But what is the statement that has been made concerning that court? Professor Harrison Moore states that—

Of the highest appellate tribunal in the country it was declared last year that it did not possess the confidence of the profession or the public; that litigants went there, not from any belief in the goodness of their cause, but "on the off-chance of a reversal by another set of Judges, gambling on the uncertainty of the law."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is a mere statement.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is made by the chief legal journal in the Dominion, and as Professor Harrison Moore points out legal journals, like members of the legal profession, invariably defend the Bench and uphold its dignity with all the strength at their command. If we desire to avoid this stigma, and to maintain our courts at all events on a level with the best Courts of the States—if we desire to secure for the first Judges of Australia the best men that Australia can produce—we ought not to reduce the salaries fixed in this Bill.

Mr. SAWERS (New England).—Although the question of pensions to be granted to the Judges of the High Court is not strictly before the Committee it is one that seems to influence many honorable members.

Mr. POYNTON.—It should be decided first.

Mr. SAWERS.—It may be necessary to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the Committee think that honorable members would have a free hand in dealing with this question after the clause relating to pensions has been disposed of, I shall have no objection to postponing the consideration of this clause for the present.

Mr. SAWERS.—I am not specially advocating the adoption of that course, but the intimation by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports that he intends to move the omission of the provision for the payment of pensions will certainly influence many honorable members. I shall be glad if the question of pensions is decided first; but in any event I shall give my vote on this clause with the clear determination of voting for pensions. We must remember that gentlemen who are raised to the Bench are generally well advanced in years, and that even if they received a fairly high salary they would not be adequately recompensed, as they would remain on the Bench only for a few years. It seems to me that the offer of a pension will be one of the attractions of the position. It goes without saying, that the object of the Government ought to be to secure the very best men to occupy the position of Judges of the High Court. I cannot overlook the fact that in New South Wales when the late Sir James Martin died not many years ago, the utmost difficulty was experienced in filling the vacant position of Chief Justice of that State. I am almost safe in saying, that for a time the office practically went begging. It was offered to various barristers but refused, and it was not accepted by the present Chief Justice until Parliament passed a Bill raising the salary from £3,000 to £3,500 a year. Honorable members for Queensland may remember that a somewhat similar case occurred in that State.

Mr. PAGE.—We remember that too well.

Mr. SAWERS.—I am not in a position to discuss the merits of the Queensland case, but in New South Wales the facts were as I have stated. If we look around the commercial world we shall find men at the head of firms or great banking institutions, for example, who receive salaries far in excess of those proposed to be given to our Judges.

Mr. DRAKIN.—That is so in Melbourne and Sydney to-day.

Mr. SAWERS.—I dare say that there are men at the head of commercial institutions in Melbourne and Sydney who receive from £4,000 to £5,000 a year. Then we have our Railways Commissioners. The Chief Commissioner of Railways in New South Wales receives £3,000 a year, while the Chief Commissioner of Railways in Victoria draws a salary of £3,500 per annum. A few days ago, when it was proposed to fill a vacant commissionership, it was found necessary to raise the salary attaching to the office.

Mr. PORTNOR.—But the commissioners are not appointed for life.

Mr. SAWERS.—No one is appointed for life. In New South Wales the commissioners were appointed for seven years, and the term was recently renewed.

Mr. PAGE.—Do they receive pensions?

Mr. SAWERS.—I do not say it is essential that our Judges should receive pensions, but the offer of a pension would be one of the great attractions of the position. I am willing to admit that this is a time for economy, and that we should not go to extremes, but I am inclined to support the Government. I hope that, in any event, the Committee will not consent to reduce the salary which will attach to the great position of Chief Justice of the Commonwealth below £3,000 a year.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The Attorney-General has just made an appeal to the Committee to look to the various States for guidance in this matter. He urged that we should be outbidden by the States, and that the current rates paid in Australia were higher than the amount fixed in the amendment. We have to remember, however, that these are not the current rates of to-day, but were really fixed in the boom time, when the mercantile, professional, and other classes were receiving very high emoluments. I would reverse the comparative statement made by the honorable and learned gentlemen, for £3,500 a year received to-day, is equal to £5,000 per annum paid seven or eight years ago.

Mr. WATSON.—Notwithstanding the Federal Tariff.

Mr. WILKS.—I am sorry to say that has been the position of affairs for the last seven or eight years. The purchasing power of money has become larger and larger, and those in receipt of a salary of £3,000 seven years ago were in no better position than those who now receive £2,000 per annum. While some urge that no reduction should be made in the salary proposed by the Government, it might be admitted that the purchasing power of salaries is greater than it was. I find that special provision for the payment of the salaries of our Judges is made in the Constitution. Section 72 provides that they—Shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may fix, but the remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

That is to say if we fix this salary to-night we shall have no power to diminish it during the term of office of the Chief Justice, although we shall be able to increase it. That is another reason why we should support the reduction proposed. If we find by experience that we cannot get the best men to be had in Australia, that the most active members of the Bar will not accept positions upon the High Court Bench, that the salaries we vote are not sufficient, and if we find that the work to be done by the High Court Judges will be so heavy as to involve a great demand upon their time, Parliament can increase the salaries. There is, therefore, no danger in agreeing to a reduction upon the amounts suggested by the Government. They ask that the salary of the Chief Justice shall be £3,500 a year. I intend to support an amendment making the salary £2,500, but whether that amount or £3,000 is the salary fixed, it must not be forgotten that we can diminish the salary proposed only once, and that is to-night. Afterwards, during the life time of the person appointed, it will stand at the sum fixed by Parliament unless it is found necessary subsequently to increase it. I think that £2,500 a year is a fair salary. It must be remembered that upon clause after clause of this Bill, the Attorney-General has been urging the Committee to confer greater powers upon the High Court in order to give employment to the Judges. We have every evidence that there will be very little for them to do, and that in itself will be an incentive to men to go from the Bar to the High Court Bench. The Judges of the Supreme Courts of the States have six times as much work as these Federal Judges will have to do.

Mr. WATSON.—How does the honorable member know that?

Mr. WILKS. — We know pretty well already the amount of work they will have to do. The honorable member is backing up the Attorney-General, who referred to the gambling that takes place in courts in Canada; but we know that so long as there is a higher court, they will gamble. I do not think the fact that the Judges will not be very highly paid will encourage gambling in law. I remind honorable members that the Prime Minister of this country receives a salary of £2,500 a year. He has no permanency, and no pension, and, in fact, occupies a very precarious position. He has to superintend the whole of the affairs of Australia, and although he will have the appointment of these High Court Judges, he only gets £2,500. Once we introduce comparisons of this kind, honorable members will see how absurd the Government's proposal is. If the argument be sound that to get the best men of the legal profession to accept positions as Judges of the High Court, we should pay a salary of £3,500 a year, we should pay the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth £5,000 a year. The present Prime Minister is a well-known lawyer, and is regarded in the profession as a lawyer of high standing, but we find him working for £2,500, with no chance of a pension and no permanency.

Mr. McCAY.—We are told that it is a permanent position.

Mr. WILKS.—It is permanent until the election. I agree with those who ask for a reduction of the salaries proposed. The Attorney-General has not shown how the confidence of the profession, or of the general public, will be shaken by a reduction, but we know how the public will be shaken by an increase of the salaries. I should like to hear some argument against the proposal to fix the salary at £2,500 a year. We are told that younger men at the Bar, getting £8,000 or £10,000 a year, will not be attracted by the offer of a position on the High Court, but this is the age of economy, and we must not fix as current rates the rates which existed in the boom period.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If I understand that it is the wish generally of honorable members to consider clause 53 before clause 52, I shall now move the postponement of clause 52 until after we have considered clause 53. Before doing so I may take the opportunity of reading one short extract which I missed, and which I intended to have used relating to the effect of the salaries paid to the Canadian Judges—

A letter to the Empire Review for March points out that the names of many of the Judges appear on the directorates of trusts, finance, insurance, or other corporations.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) agreed to—

That clause 52 be postponed until after the consideration of clause 53.

Clause 53—

1. A Justice of the High Court, if disabled by permanent infirmity from the performance of the duties of his office, shall be entitled to retire upon a pension to be continued during his life at a rate—

(a) equal to two-tenths of his actual salary at the date of his retirement if he has served for less than five years;

- (b) equal to three-tenths of that salary if he has served for five years;
- (c) equal to five-tenths of that salary if he has served for ten years;
- (d) equal to seven-tenths of that salary if he has served for fifteen years.

2. A Justice of the High Court who has served for fifteen years as a Justice of that court shall be entitled upon reaching the age of sixty-five years to retire upon a pension to be continued during his life at a rate equal to seven-tenths of his actual salary at the date of his retirement.

3. When any Justice of the High Court is entitled, by virtue of any right preserved by the Constitution, to any pension upon retirement, that pension shall be deemed to be in reduction, pro tanto, of the pension to which he is entitled under this Act.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports). — I hope this clause will be struck out. It seems to me to be a great mistake at the commencement of the Commonwealth to recognise discriminating pensions. It has been said that it is rather remarkable that those who are in favour of old-age pensions should oppose a proposal of this kind.

Mr. WATKINS. — Old-age pensions apply to everybody.

Mr. MAUGER. — But this is a discriminating proposal to which I object, and which I hope will be struck out. We have just had an illustration of the pernicious character of it in Victoria. One of our very esteemed Judges has been drawing a very handsome salary for a very long time past, and he now retires on his pension, and goes away to some other country to spend it, while we have to pay it.

Mr. THOMAS. — The State has had services rendered for it.

Mr. MAUGER. — I do not think the services were rendered for the pension, and I think the salary paid was quite sufficient to enable the person receiving it to acquire an annuity for himself.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — The honorable member would be quite satisfied if the money were spent in this country.

Mr. MAUGER. — I should be very much more satisfied than I am now, because then some of it would be distributed amongst those who have to pay it. Under present circumstances, those who pay the pension get no benefit from it. However, I object to the principle altogether, and I hope it will not be acknowledged in any way in connexion with the Commonwealth. It seems to me that a man getting one of the highest salaries paid in the Commonwealth, even if the amount proposed be reduced to £3,000, will be sufficiently paid to enable him to look after his own old age.

Mr. WINTER COOKE (Wannon). — I hope this clause will be allowed to remain. After all, what we have to consider is the end we are aiming at, and, unquestionably, we should desire to get the best men we can possibly get for the High Court Bench.

Mr. MAUGER. — Does the honorable member think that a pension will attract them?

Mr. WINTER COOKE. — Undoubtedly it will. We know, as a matter of fact, that we have not always been able to get, I will not say the best men, but the men earning the highest incomes at the Bar to accept positions on the States Benches at £3,000 or £3,500 a year. If, in addition to cutting down the salaries, it is further proposed to take away the pensions, we shall be still more in danger of limiting our choice. I shall speak again if I get an opportunity on the clause fixing the salaries to be paid, but I wish to emphasize the point that if the Committee decides that those who are to be offered positions on the High Court are not to receive pensions, we shall in all probability get inferior men, or at all events by no means the best men.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio). — My feeling is that this clause might be postponed until after the consideration of clause 52, because I cannot really vote fairly on the question of pensions until I know what the salary is going to be. I desire that the salary proposed shall be lowered, but I think that pensions are very necessary, not only to enable us to secure good men, but also in order to enable us to keep them, and to get rid of men who are incapable by physical or mental weakness. The great advantage of the pensions is that, when a man feels that his powers are failing, if a pension is provided he will know that upon retirement he will not have to live upon the small income to which his savings might reduce him. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports has previously contended that upon the abolition of pensions there should be a system of compulsory life assurance for all public servants. It is absolutely contrary to the principle of the law that public servants should be in want. There is a dignity attaching to the man who has served his country in the public service, which he should afterwards be able to retain.

Mr. HUME COOK. — We do not provide pensions for other public servants.

Mr. CROUCH.—Where we do not provide pensions for public servants, the honorable member for Melbourne Ports contends that compulsory assurance should be insisted upon.

Mr. MAUGER.—Surely a man in this position should know that he ought to provide for old age?

Mr. CROUCH.—I know that there have been men connected with the County Courts in Victoria who have been reduced to a very impecunious position. It is very unfortunate that a man whom one has had to address in terms of respect and deference should afterwards be coming round desiring to borrow a five-pound note. Any one who has moved in legal circles in Melbourne for fifteen or twenty years well know that some Judges have been reduced to that unfortunate position. Am I to understand that if the honorable member for Melbourne Ports can secure the omission of this clause he will propose the insertion of a provision requiring assurance?

Mr. MAUGER.—I think that a Judge should look after his own assurance.

Mr. CROUCH.—There must be a provision for a pension or for assurance if it is desired to carry out the policy which Parliament has always insisted upon, and which even the courts have from time to time recognised, that servants of the Commonwealth shall not have their salaries attached. A similar principle arises here, because men in these positions should retain the dignity previously attaching to them. I understand that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports referred to the case of a Judge who recently retired from the Victorian Bench, after a good many years service, because he found that his faculties were not as keen as they previously had been. There is another case of a Judge in another State who is said to be getting too old and too deaf. I shall not say in which State that case arises, but I have no doubt that such a Judge, if he had not his pension to fall back upon, would cling to his position far longer than he should.

Mr. MAUGER.—It appears he is still clinging to it notwithstanding the pension.

Mr. CROUCH.—If he does he is not in the pitiable position that he has to remain on the bench through fear of poverty. If we wish to get the best men to occupy these positions, and if we wish only to retain them so long as they are able to efficiently perform their duties, we shall provide for a pension. I support the clause, and I trust the Committee will not accept the suggestion of the honorable member for Melbourne Ports.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parker).—If the honorable and learned member who has just spoken would read the clause a little more carefully, he would see that it is distinctly in favour of the Commonwealth. It provides for a case in which a Judge is disabled by permanent infirmity from the performance of the duties of his office. The honorable and learned member for Corio will not contend for a moment that it is not in the interests of the Commonwealth that, when a Judge has developed some permanent infirmity which renders him incompetent to perform his functions as a Judge, some inducement should be offered to him to resign. We cannot provide in a Bill of this kind that a Judge shall occupy his position only so long as he is competent, in the estimation of the permanent law officers of the Crown, to discharge his duties, and therefore our only recourse is to provide that, when a Judge is afflicted with some permanent infirmity, a moderate pension shall be offered to him to retire and allow a more competent man to take his place. It is therefore proposed that—

A justice of the High Court, if disabled by permanent infirmity from the performance of the duties of his office, shall be entitled to retire upon a pension, to be continued during his life.

Then the rates are set forth. If the Judge has served for less than five years he is to be entitled to a pension equal to two-tenths of his salary. If he had been appointed at a salary of £3,000 a year, he would thus be entitled to a pension of £600 a year.

Mr. POYNTON.—How much would he get if he were outside?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That is not the question. We are framing a Bill by which we hope to secure the services of, if not the very best, certainly some of the very best men in the community. We want men upon whom four millions of people can depend for the interpretation of the Constitution. It cannot be said that anybody will be good enough to act as a Judge of the High Court, and we may rely upon it that by reducing the salaries we shall also lessen our chances of securing the best men. Even moderate men would not be attracted to positions of this kind if they felt that, in the event of sudden illness overtaking them, and rendering them unfit to longer continue their duties, they would be shelved, and left to take their chance in the hurly-burly of life. It will be to the interest of the Commonwealth to offer an inducement to Judges who may be thus disabled by permanent infirmity to give up their positions, and we may fairly give them a moderate recompense for the sacrifice they will in such a case be called upon to make. There is no parallel between the provisions of the clause and the case put by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, in which a Judge of the Supreme Court of Victoria retired at the age of 60 upon a pension of £1,500. The Bill proposes that a Judge who has served fifteen years on the High Court Bench shall be entitled to retire upon a pension—but only when he has reached the age of 65. Although human life is said to be lengthening, 70 years is still about the average span for the most healthy among us, and, therefore, it is only reasonable to provide: that when a Judge has reached the age of 65 years he shall be entitled, if he has served fifteen years, to receive a pension equal to 7-10ths of his salary. We are not thus legislating so much in the interests of the Judges as in the interests of the Commonwealth, because if 70 years be taken to be the maximum age at which most men fail to retain their full faculties, it is not extravagant to provide that when a Judge is five years short of the end of his natural life he shall be allowed to retire on a pension. We do not want upon the Bench palsied men—men who are really not in the possession of their full faculties, and who are incompetent to do the very difficult work which will fall to their lot. Therefore, instead of looking at this clause from the point of view of the Judge, it should be regarded as a safety-valve which will enable the Commonwealth to clear the Bench of Judges who have become broken down by age or permanent infirmity. I would point out also to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports that, if no pensions were provided for, it would be open for any Judge to remain on the Bench long after he had become incompetent, through illness, to do his work faithfully and well.

MR. ISAACS.—The Constitution provides for removal in such cases.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes; but unless a Judge were grossly incompetent no Government would take the extreme step of removing him.

MR. MAUGER.—Would not the same thing apply, even if pensions were provided for, if a Judge still desired to remain on the Bench?

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—No; because Parliament would be much more ready to take steps to remove a Judge when they knew that a pension was provided for in case of his lacking ability, through illness, to properly perform his duties. I submit, therefore, that it is fair that Judges who have arrived at an age within five years of the recognised allotted span of life should be offered an inducement to retire from the Bench, and make way for younger men.

MR. CRUICKSHANK (Gwydir).—This seems an opportune time to discuss the whole question of pensions, which is ever recurring in connexion with the discussion of Estimates. We should deal with this matter in the broadest possible spirit, and fix the salaries upon such a liberal scale that we shall encourage our best and youngest men to take up the positions of Judges. We should also endeavour to secure as Judges men of such an age that it will be possible to provide for them by way of insurance, instead of adding to the burdens of the taxpayers by granting pensions. We should not make the High Court Bench a place of refuge for barristers who desire to retire from the active practice of their profession. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports proposes that no provision shall be made for pensions, but I take a very liberal view of pensions in the case of Judges, because I feel that we must get the best men. I should, however, be in favour of offering the highest possible salary, fixing the amount of the pension in inverse ratio to the amount of the salary. Our Judges should be not only the best men, but the healthiest, and such as would most likely be able to render us good service for many years.

MR. WILKS (Dalley).—I listened very attentively to the arguments of the honorable and learned member for Parkes in regard to the proposed pension arrangements, but I should like to know why, if a Judge is suffering from some permanent disablement—the palsy, or an enlarged liver, perhaps—the amount of pension paid to him should be in inverse ratio to the length of his service? The clause provides that if the Chief Justice of the High Court becomes disabled before five years' service he is to receive a pension of £700 a year; if after five years' service, of £1,050 a year; if after ten years' service, of £1,750; and if after fifteen years' service, of £2,450. As a matter of fact, however, a Judge who becomes permanently disabled at 55, and thus wholly dependent upon his pension for support, has a longer life before him and will be worse off than a Judge who becomes permanently disabled at 65. It seems to me absurd that there should be any connexion between the salary and the pension.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The longer their services to the country the better their rewards.

Mr. WILKS.—Then am I to understand that their salaries alone are not to be regarded as paying for their services? If their salaries pay them for their services, we have no right in fixing their pensions to consider their length of service. I hope that the Committee is not prepared to abolish pensions altogether, but I would rather vote for their abolition than for a differential scheme like this.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I should like clause 52 to be settled before we go further. If the scale of pensions allowed for is agreed to I shall certainly vote for much smaller salaries. I think that pensions of a certain amount should be provided, so that Judges who become incompetent by reason of physical or intellectual misfortunes may have something to support them. I should not like any of the Judges of the High Court to be placed in the position in which we saw an old warrior here in Victoria lately. They had a great battle to get anything for him, though he was one of the greatest democrats that Victoria ever produced. His case made every man who had any human sympathy in his soul blush with shame at the meanness and parsimony of this State. We must make such provision that we shall not have Judges who have made financial mistakes reduced in penury in their old age. It is easy to say that men in such a position should provide for their future, but, as a rule, Judges are not financiers. They are law-givers, not money-grabbers. They are not sharp enough for the money-grabbing business. Consequently they may lose all they have through some financial mistake on their own account, or to help their sons. But no one would like to see an old Judge of the High Court of this great Commonwealth going round bare-footed. I heard Holman, of Indiana, the watch-dog of the United States Treasury for 40 years, say when he was bidding good-bye to his people, after a young lawyer had come to his district while he was away and put him out, that—paraphrasing Cardinal Wolsley—if he had served his family half as faithfully as he had served his electors, he would not have been indigent in his old age. I do not want our Judges to be indigent when they are old. I would not give large pensions, but I would give them as much as £500 a year. It is well known to every thinker that the great men, the intellectual giants of the world, are not those who make money. They have no time for that sort of thing, and do not know how to do it. They have not studied the methods of gathering in. But, before settling the pension question, I should like to deal with the question of salaries. If I knew that the three Judges were to get £3,000 a year each, without distinction, I would vote for a pension of £500 when a Judge had to retire by reason of intellectual or physical disability. That would enable him to live out in the country with his books, away from the stir and noise of city life.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—Honorable members have expressed the desire that the field of choice for the Judges of the High Court shall be made as wide as possible, although some have suggested that politicians shall not be permitted to occupy seats on the Bench. I draw attention, however, to the fact that under clause 53 pensions are payable to the Justices of the High Court at certain rates "if disabled by permanent infirmity." But it may be desirable to choose some one or more of the Judges of the States Courts.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Certainly not. We can fill the High Court Bench out of this Chamber.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The Executive should have the right to choose a Judge of a State Court, if they thought him the most suitable appointment. I would point out, however, that the Judges of the States Courts have pensions secured to them after a period of fifteen years service, or upon disability. But the provisions in clause 53, would make it necessary for a man who was taken over while in full possession of his faculties, and before the completion of fifteen years of service, to abandon some of his existing rights, as, unless he has served fifteen years in the State, he has no right to a pension at all.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—We do not intend to take them over.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I desire to leave the Executive free to exercise an untrammelled choice.

Mr. POYNTON.—Will the honorable and learned member vote in favour of a proposal to give the State Judges the first refusal of the positions?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No. I believe in allowing the Executive to have a free hand in this matter. If we are to grant pensions to the Justices of the High Court we ought to make provision whereby Judges of the States Courts, if appointed to the Federal Bench, shall not be placed under any disadvantage. Sub-clause (3) of this clause reads—

When any Justice of the High Court is entitled, by virtue of any right preserved by the Constitution, to any pension upon retirement, that pension shall be deemed to be in reduction pro tanto of the pension to which he is entitled under this Act.

That means that we can practically only appoint to the High Court Bench Justices who have actually served fifteen years in the States Courts, and who have thus acquired a right to a pension. If we decide to grant pensions to the Justices of the High Court we ought to provide that State Judges shall not be placed under any disability by reason of their having undertaken to serve the Commonwealth in a higher capacity.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs will carefully read the sub-clause in question he will find that the contingency which he has suggested has been anticipated.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But if he has not served nine years he will receive no pension.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The sub-clause provides that in the event of a State Court Judge being appointed to the High Court, and being entitled under the State law to a pension, such pension shall be deemed to be paid in reduction of the pension to which he may be entitled under this Bill?

Mr. ISAACS.—But that will apply only to Judges who are entitled to State pensions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The last portion of section 84 of the Constitution says—

Any officer who is at the establishment of the Commonwealth in the public service of a State, and who is, by consent of the Governor of a State with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, transferred to the public service of the Commonwealth, shall have the same rights as if he had been an officer of a department transferred to the Commonwealth, and were retained in the service of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—Can the Attorney-General say that a Judge is transferred by the consent of the Governor of a State?

Mr. DEAKIN.—He would require to be so transferred if he were appointed to the High Court Bench, in order that he might have preserved to him the rights conferred by the section I have quoted.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Department is not transferred by the State.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is a general provision which, in my opinion, may be applied to any Judge of a State Bench.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I find myself in somewhat of a difficulty upon this matter, because the direction in which I shall vote upon the pensions proposals contained in this clause, depends entirely upon the salaries to be paid to the High Court Judges. Personally, I am opposed to the payment of pensions, but on the present occasion I am bound to vote in favour of these provisions, because I feel that the Committee are inclined to pay smaller salaries than I consider are adequate. I merely mention this fact in explanation of my vote.

Mr. THOMSON.—May I ask the Attorney-General, for the information of the Committee, to compare these provisions with similar pensions provisions elsewhere?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I find that in New South Wales a Judge upon his retirement, on account of permanent disability, or infirmity, or after fifteen years' service, receives seven-tenths of his actual salary.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is no age limit fixed?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. That constitutes much more liberal treatment than it is proposed to accord to the High Court Judges under this Bill. In Victoria the pensions are based upon the regulations of the Imperial Act. I believe they provide that after fifteen years' service, a Judge upon retirement shall receive half salary.

Mr. THOMSON.—And nothing before?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think that if they retire before they have served fifteen years, they receive a proportionate amount of their salary. In Queensland, every Judge, after having served fifteen years, or on being disabled, is entitled to one-half of his actual salary. In Tasmania, a Chief Justice who has served fifteen years, and has attained the age of 60 years, is entitled to a pension of £750 a year, and the other Judges to £650. If disabled by permanent infirmity they may receive a pension of £500 a year apparently at any time.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—What do they receive in South Australia?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have not the retiring allowances for that State before me, but I am informed by the honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython, that puisne Judges received £1,300 a year upon their retirement. In Western Australia, after fifteen years' service, or upon attaining the age of 60 years, or being permanently incapacitated, the Judges receive a pension equal to one-half their salary.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—Upon the whole, I do not think it would be wise to object to the pensions provisions of this clause, though perhaps some modifications might with advantage be made in them. I notice that in America the age at which the Justices retire on pension is fixed at 70 years. Something has been said about allowing the retiring of the High Court Judges on pension, out of consideration to them, at 65 years of age; but it seems to me that what we must chiefly regard is their capacity to satisfactorily discharge the duties of their office. In America, I repeat, that the age limit imposed is 70 years, and I ask the Attorney-General whether he could not base the right of the High Court Judges to a pension equivalent to seven-tenths of their salary upon a similar limitation. In England of recent years, complaints have frequently been made in the public press regarding in cases the senility of the Bench. It has been repeatedly urged that it is very advisable to afford its Justices an opportunity to retire. It is said that they sometimes get lively, impatient, and somewhat petulant in their declining years, and that owing to the fact that pro rata pensions had not been granted, Justices who ought to have retired have not done so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member wishes to buy them off.

Mr. GLYNN.—There is no other means of getting rid of them except by both Houses of Parliament adopting an address declaring that they are incapable. It is very seldom, indeed, that Justices are got rid of in America by impeachment, or in England by the adoption of an address by both Houses of Parliament. But here, in a case of established infirmity, some inducement is offered to a Judge whose waning faculties suggest that he ought to enjoy the remaining years of his life where he would not be obnoxious to suitors, to retire from the Bench. Under these circumstances, I think it is advisable to vote generally for the pension provisions of the Bill, whatever the Committee may decide in regard to clause 52.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I intend to vote for the proposal to grant pensions to the Justices of the High Court, because it seems to me that the reason which has been put forward by the Attorney-General and other honorable members who have spoken in support of it, are unanswerable, that it would not be wise for the Commonwealth to offer lower salaries or pensions than obtain in regard to the Judiciaries of the States. We desire to place the High Court of Australia upon such a footing that it will attract the best legal talent from the States. At the same time, I cannot quite agree with the details of this pensions proposal. In the first place, I do not think it is the proper thing to give a pension to a Judge who has served only two years. And with regard to the proposal to give a Judge, after fifteen years' service, a pension equal to seven-tenths of his salary, I think it is, if anything, offering an inducement to a Judge who may feel a little lazy to retire.

Mr. GLYNN.—We had better make the age 70 years, as in America.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not say what form the amendment should take, but there is a necessity to provide for some pensions. I think that the first step should be to move the omission of paragraph (a), which provides for a pension to a Judge who has served less than five years.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Only after disablement or permanent infirmity.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not see at present the necessity for giving a pension to a Judge who has served only a year or two years.

Mr. WILKS.—Make it start from ten years' service.

Mr. WATSON.—I think it ought to be done in some such way, but I should like to hear the Attorney-General's reasons for proposing to give a pension for less than five years' service.

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—I cannot understand the remark of the honorable member for Bland, that we should not offer lower salaries than are being offered in any of the States. The whole argument in the Prime Minister's replies to certain questions I put this afternoon was that we were able to get the best men at 25 per cent. less than is being paid in the several States. I have no doubt that in connexion with the High Court we shall be able to get men of very wide experience both in law and politics who will serve us admirably for the salaries which we are prepared to offer, and without the extra inducement of a pension. I am opposed to the payment of pensions. We did the right thing in the provision we embodied in the Public Service Act for life assurance. In this case, where we are likely to offer a handsome salary, and where the men will enter the service of the Commonwealth later in life, after they have probably had for years a lucrative practice, out of which they ought to have made some savings, it is hardly right to ask the Commonwealth to grant them pensions. That is not done for ordinary business men. It is not done for the managers of banks, of trustee companies, or of other great financial or trading institutions.

Mr. FOWLER.—Frequently bank managers get pensions when they retire from active work.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I believe it is so in connexion with some banking institutions, but in the generality of cases men have to make provision for themselves out of their salaries. For the most part the men who will be appointed to the High Court Bench will have had excellent practices at the bar, or if they are taken from the Benches of the States they will carry with them their rights to pensions, and consequently we shall not be under an obligation to create a pension list on their account. We are under no obligation to follow the example of the States and to offer salaries beyond what it is fair to give.

Mr. WATSON.—It is not a question of what it is fair to give, but of what we must give in order to get the class of men we require.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I believe that we shall get the best of men for the salaries which are likely to be voted here without the additional inducement of a pension.

Mr. WATSON.—The fact that we got civil servants is no criterion, because there was quite a large number of civil servants to select from.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I admit that the circumstances are entirely different. But it is my opinion that we shall get excellent men of proved legal capacity as well as perhaps ripe political experience to offer their services to the Commonwealth. The peculiarity of the present proposal is that a Judge will be induced to remain at his post as long as possible in order to get the higher pension. If a Judge meets with a paralytic stroke after he has served for three or four years he will endeavour to remain on the Bench for seven or eight years, because at the end of that time he will get a larger pension than if he had retired at the end of five years, and so on right through the piece. I think it is a mistake to differentiate in this way. In any case, if there is to be a pension granted I think it ought to be paid, not so much as a reward for services rendered, as a compensation for some infirmity which has suddenly rendered a Judge incapable of performing his duty. What ought to be done, I submit, is to create a fund out of which the compensation, gratuity, or retiring allowance should be paid in a case of proved incapacity, occasioned by a sudden paralytic stroke or some misfortune.

Mr. THOMSON.—Up to what amount?

Mr. HUME COOK.—I should say that up to one half of the salary would be a fair thing; but that is a matter for further discussion. Judges unlike most other persons are not called upon to take a very large part in social functions, and therefore are not under any great obligation to spend money in the way in which other persons are. On the other hand, they are subject to certain limitations in the way of business. They cannot take up directorships, or any positions of that kind; but the salaries which are likely to be voted will be more than proper compensation for the restrictions which they have to put upon themselves, and for the social pleasures which they have to forego. I think that the proposal in the Bill in respect to pensions ought not to be carried, and that some other proposal might be put forward to provide for a case of sudden misfortune occurring to a Judge whereby he could make provision for his own needs. With respect to the salaries, I consider that it would be sufficient to give £3,000 to the Chief Justice, and £2,500 each to the other Judges.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (South Australia).—The Attorney-General correctly quoted me as saying that the pensions of the puisne Judges in South Australia had been fixed at £1,300 per annum, and I believe that that of the Chief Justice is £1,500 per annum. I should like to add that I believe an Act was passed about nine years ago abolishing pensions for future Judges in South Australia.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—The matter we are now discussing is of such importance that we cannot give it too careful attention. On the one hand, there is a natural desire, in which I fully sympathize, to prevent the system of pensions getting a footing in the Commonwealth service. On the other hand, there is a desire to keep British justice and Australian justice up to the high standard which it has hitherto maintained, and from which it would not be to the interests of the community to allow it to fall. In dealing with a question of this sort, we are more limited as to the manner of fixing remuneration than we should be in connexion with many positions in the public service of the Commonwealth. There are three ways in which remuneration is usually fixed. One way is to have regard to the importance of the work; and I am quite sure we cannot get more important work in the community than that of the administration of justice. When the lives and liberties of the people are at stake we have every reason to avoid the risks attaching to maladministration, even if in doing so we have to expend a little money. I do not say that the mere height of the salary would be sufficient to enable us to escape the evil of maladministration; but if we wish to get men in whom we have confidence—whom we believe will administer justice capably and honestly—we must be prepared to give what has been fixed in these States as the remuneration for such services. Another method of fixing a salary is to estimate it according to the rate which applicants will accept. If we adopt that method we can get the work done for nothing, because there are men, one or two of whom might even be acceptable, who would take the position for the simple honour attaching to it.

Mr. MAUGER.—A very bad principle.

Mr. THOMSON.—It would be a very unsafe principle to act on in connexion with our Judiciary.

Mr. MAUGER.—Either partially or wholly.

Mr. THOMSON.—Either partially or wholly; and no member of the Committee would for a moment consider the adoption of such a principle. Another way of estimating a salary is not to necessarily take the men who want the positions, but to offer a rate at which we can get the men we want. We have heard a great deal about the High Court. I was, and I am still, very desirous of limiting the expense of that court; but I would rather limit the expense by curtailing the jurisdiction and reducing the number on the Bench than by any cheese-paring in connexion with the salaries of the Judges. If this is to be a court which will command the respect that the Attorney-General expects it to command, we shall have to pay the salaries which the men we want will require. We cannot expect only wealthy men or philanthropists to be called to this court; we must expect men who are following their profession, and we may perhaps have to ask some of these to make a sacrifice when they take the position. If we say to the members of the Bar—"You are asked to do justice under all circumstances and all temptations, and we expect you to be so capable that the other Judges, from whose decisions there may be appeals to you, will never, whatever they may say of your judgments, venture to question your capacity," and if we further tell the members of the Bar that on their appointment to the Bench they must not occupy certain positions of profit outside their office, which are open to many other men, so that the Bench may be kept clear of any imputation of injustice, bias or prejudice, we must be prepared to pay liberal salaries. And in fixing what is liberal we must have regard to the salaries which are paid to the States Judges in Australia at the present time. Indeed, I do not see any other standard to guide us; and if the rate of remuneration were £2,000 in the States, I should be perfectly willing to adopt that sum for the Commonwealth, regarding it as an evidence of sufficiency to attract the best men.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The salary is £2,000 in some of the States.

Mr. THOMSON.—In one of the States, which contains a tenth of the population of Australia, the salary is £2,000; but I do not think that case affords any comparison.

Mr. WILKS.—Would the present rates be fixed in the other States to-day?

Mr. THOMSON.—It was in no boom year, but when things were worse in New South Wales than they are to-day, that some of the high salaries of Judges were fixed. It was in no boom time that a Bill was introduced in New South Wales to raise the salary of the Chief Justice to £3,500, as the only way of obtaining the man who was wanted.

Mr. WILKS.—That Chief Justice there is Lieutenant-Governor as well.

Mr. THOMSON.—He got additional pay as Lieutenant-Governor, and there is a provision for similar circumstances under this Bill.

Mr. WILKS.—That is more salary still.

Mr. THOMSON.—Some low rates have been quoted as prevailing in Canada and the United States, but if the Commonwealth Courts are to give no better satisfaction than do some of the Canadian Courts, and some of the subordinate courts of the United States, we should be a great deal better without a High Court, seeing that we could get more justice from our present Judiciary.

Mr. MAUGER.—There are always complaints about American justice.

Mr. THOMSON.—Those who suffer from it complain, and we know that the subordinate courts, at any rate, in the United States, where low judicial salaries are paid, are losing the country money owing to the class of men on the Bench. The honorable member for Bourke expressed the opinion that instead of providing in this way for pensions, we ought to have a fund devoted to paying, as allowances, any sums which Parliament might fix, though not more than half the salary. I do not agree with that idea for a moment.

Mr. WATSON.—It is practically a pension, in any case.

Mr. THOMSON.—It is a pension given in the most objectionable way. Some retiring Judges would get the allowance, perhaps through parliamentary influence, while other men, equally deserving, would be denied it through lack of influence. The granting of the pension might be a matter of the whim or prejudice of the moment. If we have pensions the amounts should be fixed. I agree with the honorable member for Bland that there might be some amendment of the clause in regard to the rates of pensions. I would suggest that after a service of five years the rate should be low, certainly not more than two-tenths of the salary, though I should be satisfied with one-tenth. Then the pension after ten years' service might be increased to three-tenths, and after fifteen years' service to five-tenths. I do not think that we need go beyond half the salary, and the suggestions I have made would reasonably support a Judge to whom circumstances had proved unfavorable, at a period of life at which he was unable to earn an income. It would be a most disastrous thing if after the liberties and lives of the subjects of the Commonwealth had been safe in the hands of a Judge for many years, through misfortune or possibly through not being allowed to do things in connexion with business which other persons could do, disaster came upon him and he was reduced to penury. Therefore, while as a rule I oppose pensions in the Commonwealth service as strongly as other members do, in the present case, entirely in the interests of justice, I cannot see my way to abolish the system.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I hope that no honorable member will oppose this clause from a misunderstanding of the position. The clause contains a proposal which appears to the Government to be a proper one; but, of course, those who vote in favour of retaining it are not bound to accept the particular rates set forth. I thought that some of the suggestions of the honorable member who has just resumed his seat had a good deal to be said for them, and I am quite prepared to give consideration to such suggestions. If there are some honorable members who oppose the giving of any pensions whatever, of any kind, or of any amount no matter how small, we must, of course, have a division on the clause.

Mr. MAUGER.—Could we not have it on the first line?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We could; but I understood that practically the whole of the Committee were agreed upon some provision to meet possible contingencies that might arise. If that view be accepted, and it becomes a question of the amount and the time of the pension, I should be very glad to consider suggestions. Nothing definite has been proposed as yet. I desire also to remark that in drawing the Bill I took the words "permanent infirmity" as probably covering the whole ground intended to be covered by the Constitution.

But it has been suggested to me that it is safer to use the precise words of the Constitution. Those words are "proved misbehaviour or incapacity." Proved misbehaviour would be dealt with in another way; and I should propose to make the clause read "permanent incapacity" instead of "permanent infirmity."

Mr. GLYNN.—Ought we not to have both words?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We might have both, but it is decidedly desirable to include the words used in the Constitution. I therefore move—

That after the word "infirmity" the words "or by incapacity" be inserted.

Mr. CROUCH.—What is meant by "permanent incapacity?"

Mr. DEAKIN.—Well, a Judge might become incapacitated for a day.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I think it would be much better to use the words employed by the Constitution. The suggestion of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, is a very sound one in view of the language used in sub-section (2) of section 72.

Mr. BATCHELOR (South Australia).—I am not quite clear as to what this sub-clause refers to.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It covers the language of the Constitution, sub-section (2), section 72—removal on the ground of "proved misbehaviour or incapacity." We had the word "infirmity" in the clause originally, and we proposed to add "incapacity."

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Would the sub-clause cover the giving of a pension on retirement on account of misbehaviour?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; a Judge would lose his pension in case of misbehaviour.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—I move—

That paragraph (a) be omitted.

I move this amendment with the view of proposing subsequently that after a service of five years, a retiring Judge shall be entitled to a pension of two-tenths of the salary, after a service of ten years to three-tenths, and after service of fifteen years to five-tenths.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall not oppose that amendment.

Mr. HUME COOK (Bourke).—Some of us desire to test the question whether there shall be pensions or not.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That can be done by voting on the whole clause.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Would it not be better to test the point by cutting out the words "upon a pension"?

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—With due respect to the Attorney-General I prefer to test the question before the sub-clause is altered. We ought to have a clear and distinct understanding. If the clause is whittled down an amendment against pensions is likely to be defeated.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—In order to test the question, I move—

That the words "upon a pension" be omitted.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The temper of the Committee has undergone a considerable change within the last few minutes, and the Government are now prepared to compromise. The difference between those who do not believe in the payment of pensions and those who support the clause as it stands has been greatly altered. The amendment moved by the honorable member for North Sydney was put forward, because he considered that a money payment would prevent temptation. The honorable member argued that the lives and liberties of the public, which are in the hands of our Judges, would be better cared for if pensions were granted.

Mr. THOMSON.—I did not say that.

Mr. WILKS.—That was the purport of the honorable member's remarks. The argument put forward in regard to the question of salaries applies with equal force to the payment of pensions. The Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, for example, does not receive a pension, nor does any honorable member of the House receive one; but the lives and the liberties of the public are in our hands while we are here. The difference between the work of legislation and of administration is very slight. I contend, however, that neither salaries nor pensions can be said to be a material factor in protecting the affairs of the country. The poorest man that Australia ever had in public life was the late Sir Henry Parkes, and yet he was the most determined in looking after the interests of the people. He was a man who retired upon the slightest insult being offered to his Government.

Mr. PAGE.—He went out once too often.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member is scoffing at the memory of the greatest public man who ever lived in Australia, and who, by the way, rose from the ranks of the workers.

Mr. PAGE.—That is a question.

Mr. THOMSON.—Members of Parliament are not prohibited from earning their living by following other occupations.

Mr. WILKS.—That may be so; but let us look for a moment at the position of officers in banking institutions. The honorable member for New England said that the managers of our banks receive very large salaries. We must not forget, however, that they have to provide for their own pensions out of their salaries.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Not at all.

Mr. WILKS.—In the Bank of New South Wales and the Commercial Banking Corporation a deduction is made from the salary of every officer—from the general manager to the officer occupying the most subordinate position—to provide for his pension.

Mr. THOMSON.—But the management contribute to the fund.

Mr. WILKS.—It is proposed that a certain pension shall be paid to a Judge who becomes incapacitated by permanent infirmity, not less than five years after accepting office. But if a Judge suffers from some physical infirmity after two years service, should he not be entitled to equal consideration on the part of the public as is the man who after five years service becomes incapable of remaining on the Bench? I see no wisdom in saying that the pension shall start after five years service. If it is right that pensions should be granted, let them start from the time that they are actually required. I can understand the Government proposal. They provide that if a man becomes paralyzed, or suffers some other infirmity during the first year of office, he shall at once be entitled to a pension. But under the amendment which has been temporarily withdrawn, a Judge would be entitled to no such pension if he became incapacitated within five years of his appointment to the Bench. For these reasons, I hope that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports will adhere to his amendment.

Mr. BATCHELOR (South Australia).—I have not spoken during the debate on this Bill, but there are one or two phases relating to the payment of pensions to which I desire to make brief reference. When we were dealing with the Public Service Bill, we discussed at length the position of the civil service, but throughout that debate no suggestion was made that we should give a pension to any class of our public servants. Notwithstanding what has been said during the discussion on this clause, I fail to see why any distinction should be made in the case of Judges of the High Court. As a matter of fact, when the Public Service Bill was before us, some honorable members went so far as to oppose a proposal that adults—married men—who had been in the service of the transferred departments for some years, should receive a bare living wage. They were opposed to the payment of a minimum wage, apart altogether from any question of making a retiring allowance to a civil servant suffering from physical infirmity. It would be a great mistake for Parliament to draw this distinction between one class of civil servants and another. I have every respect for the Judges of the States, and I am just as anxious that we should obtain the very best men available for the position of Judges of the High Court as is any honorable member; but I do not consider it necessary for us to hold out an incentive of this kind. If we offer adequate salaries our Judges, like other persons occupying prominent positions outside the service, will be in a position to purchase life annuities. We compel our public servants to insure their lives, and if in the case of our Judges some provision must be made for old age or physical infirmity, let us make it compulsory for them to purchase life annuities. Such a provision, however, need not necessarily be inserted in the Bill. I intend to protest as strongly as I can against the proposal that special treatment shall be meted out to one particular class of public servants.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I would remind the honorable member for South Australia, who has just spoken, that there is a great difference between a Judge and the other officers of the public service to whom he has referred, inasmuch as an ordinary member of the service can be dismissed straightway while a Judge cannot.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That does not count against my argument.

Mr. CONROY.—Sometimes a Judge may become slightly deaf or suffer from some other infirmity which it is extremely difficult to prove, although it is injurious to his capacity on the Judicial Bench. In such a case it might be possible to induce him to retire by the offer of a fairly large pension. If a man incapacitated in this way continues on the Bench, the cost to the community is infinitely more than would be the payment of a pension. That is one reason why we should grant pensions to our Judges. It is far better that a Judge suffering from deafness, or some other infirmity, should be able to retire voluntarily than that a Bill should be introduced setting one of the very worst precedents for the removal of a member of the Bench. In how many cases has this ever been required? When one listens to the objections raised against the proposal, one would think that we were dealing with vast sums of money, yet I find that under paragraph (a), the amount involved would be £600, under paragraph (b) £900, under paragraph (d) £1,500, and paragraph (e) £2,100, assuming that the proposals of the Government are carried into effect. If a Judge should develop some infirmity, it would surely be better to hold out some inducement to him to retire. I trust that the Government will be able to carry out their proposals in their entirety, or that they will at least be able to carry them with the modification which has been suggested.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—I am rather astonished to find that there is any apologist for the perpetuation of a system which in the past has been condemned throughout the length and breadth of Australia. I am also surprised to find some honorable members who are opposed to pensions for certain branches of the public service advocating that they should be granted to the very highest paid officials of the State. I fail to see any consistency in that. I agree with the honorable and learned member for Werriwa that we are making precedents, and the Committee should establish a precedent in this case which the States could well follow. We can also set a precedent in the matter of salaries, because these, in my opinion, are fixed too high in the Bill, and I shall have something to say upon that when we reach the clause dealing with them. It is our bounden duty to remove altogether from the Federal public service any hope that its members, and especially those receiving high salaries, will have pensions paid to them when they leave the service, though in some of the States the pensions paid nearly equal in amount the salaries which the officers have been receiving when in full service.

It is the duty of those who are in receipt of regular and sufficient payment from the State to make provision for the time when they will not be receiving salary. We can set an example, which some of the States very much require to follow, by wiping out altogether from our annual charges the pension list which, in the past and at present, is in the States proving a terrible burden upon the taxpayers of Australia.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parkes).—I should like the Committee to consider whether the position in which we find ourselves now is a fair one. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports is endeavouring to have a division taken upon this clause, without first trying whether it cannot be made acceptable to a majority of the Committee in the way suggested by the honorable member for North Sydney. The speeches made so far suggest that there is a very large number of honorable members who are disposed to accept this clause with some modifications, but the honorable member for Melbourne Ports has candidly said that he desires to take a division upon the clause as a whole, because he fears that, if the Committee has an opportunity of modifying it, it may be made acceptable, and he will lose his opportunity of strangling the proposal. The honorable member's suggestion is the same as if, upon the second reading of a measure, it were assumed that it would be unalterable, and that we should, therefore, take a division upon it in the condition in which it is first submitted to the House, and without the understanding that, in passing the second reading, we have an opportunity of making the measure acceptable in Committee. Why should we not modify this clause if there is some chance that it may be made acceptable to the Committee? It will be open to honorable members subsequently to express an opinion upon the whole clause after it has been modified.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—We do not go into Committee upon the Bill before we pass the second reading. We take the principle first, and then deal with the modifications.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The honorable member for Melbourne Ports is trying now to put the cart before the horse. He is endeavoring to take a final division upon a clause with the expectation and the knowledge that we shall not have an opportunity of making it acceptable to the Committee. We can safely agree to the second reading of a Bill, as we have done in the case of the very Bill now under consideration, on the understanding that we can amend any part of it in Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Suppose the second reading is lost.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—If the second reading is lost there is no chance of amending the measure afterwards, but honorable members frequently vote for the second reading of a Bill with the full knowledge that they would not accept it finally in the condition in which it is submitted. If the suggestion of the honorable member for Melbourne Ports is agreed to, the whole clause will be negatived, although I have formed the opinion from the speeches which I have heard that many members of the Committee at the present time are willing to accept the principle if the conditions are modified in the way suggested by the honorable member for North Sydney. If there is not a majority willing to have the clause in a modified form we shall find that out very shortly, but if there is, by adopting the course proposed by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, we shall be preventing a majority in the Committee accepting the principle in a modified form, merely because the honorable member has chosen to take the clause by the scruff of the neck, in order to kill it at the first stage of discussion. I submit that unless honorable members desire to do that in the face of the majority, an opportunity should be given to fashion the clause so as to make it acceptable.

Mr. A. PATERSON (Capricornia).—As I was one of the first to ring the pension note, I think I have a right to say a word on this question. As a matter of fact, I should like very much to see all Government pensions abolished with the exception of pensions to soldiers who have been crippled in battle. But I quite recognise that there is absolutely no hope of inducing the Committee to accept that policy in a case like this. From the remarks made by the honorable members for Bland and North Sydney, and the sympathy generally expressed by the Committee, I can see clearly that there would be no use in attempting to do away with these pensions. We could not expect capable gentlemen of the learning, attainments, and experience necessary to occupy such a position as that of Judge of the High Court without some such provision as this. I am strongly in sympathy with the views expressed by the honorable member for North Sydney, and I have thought it well to explain my position in this respect.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—I understand that if the principle of paying pensions be established, honorable members will be afforded an opportunity of voting on the amendment suggested by the honorable member for North Sydney, or some proposal in a similar direction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Question.—That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause—put. The Committee divided.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH presented a petition from the Chamber of Manufacturers of Western Australia, praying for the repeal of sub-section (8) of section 3, and of section 11 of the Immigration Restriction Act.

Petition received and read.

COMMONWEALTH POSTAGE STAMPS.

Senator PULSFORD.—I desire to ask the Postmaster-General, without notice, first, how the design for the new ninepenny postage stamp was arrived at, and secondly, seeing that the names of the six States are not arranged either in alphabetical order, or in accordance with their respective populations, what plan was adopted?

Senator LT.-COL. NEILD.—Nor are they arranged in accordance with the manner in which the States are named in the Constitution.

Senator PULSFORD.—I observe that New South Wales, the largest State in the union, is named last on the stamp.

Senator DRAKE.—The design was taken from a medal in my possession. It will be found that the name of the State which was founded earliest is placed nearest to mother earth. That is the order in which, I think, the stones in a building are generally placed.

Senator KEATING asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Does he intend at an early date, as announced in the public press, to issue Commonwealth postal stamps to take the place of present State issues?

2. If so, will he call for competitive designs for such Commonwealth issue; and, if not, why not?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. The Postmaster-General is issuing a postage stamp of a distinctly Commonwealth character. If such a stamp is adopted, it will eventually take the place of the existing State issues as they are exhausted.

2. He will wait the issue of stamps now in course of preparation to supplement those in use in two of the States before determining whether he will invite competitive designs for a new general issue.

STANDING ORDERS.

Senator PEARCE.—I wish to ask the Postmaster-General, without notice, whether, when the report of the Committee of the whole Senate is presented, the Government will have the standing orders reprinted, with the amendments, for the convenience of honorable senators?

Senator DRAKE.—I have no objection to the standing orders being reprinted as desired by the honorable senator. I presume that the matter will be attended to by the Standing Orders Committee.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH:
ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The PRESIDENT.—I have the honour to inform the Senate that, on Friday last, accompanied by members of the Senate, I presented to His Excellency the Governor-General the address in reply to his speech, and received the following answer:—

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE—

I am gratified in receiving your address in reply to the Speech delivered by me on the occasion of the opening of the second session of the first Parliament of the Commonwealth.

I note with pleasure your assurances of continued loyalty to the Throne and Person of our Most Gracious Sovereign.

I earnestly hope that the result of your deliberations in Parliament will be beneficial to the people of Australia.

TENNYSON,
Governor-General.

19th June, 1903.

PAPERS.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table the following papers:—

Correspondence relating to the Pacific Island Labourers Act.

Transfers approved by the Governor-General for the year 1902-3.

Regulations relating to Commonwealth Military Forces.

IMPORTATIONS OF TEA.

Senator BARRETT asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether, since the passing of the Tariff making tea free, any systematic inspection has been made in the State of Victoria by the Customs Department?

2. What method is employed in obtaining samples for analysis?

3. Have any shipments been condemned, and how many?

4. Has any tea been re-shipped that has been refused entry into this State as being unfit for human consumption?

5. Has any shipment during the period referred to that the Customs have condemned been destroyed?

6. Does the Department find any difficulty in dealing with low grade and inferior tea because of the abolition of the duty?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. A systematic inspection has been, and is made by the Customs Department of all lines of tea that are imported into the State of Victoria or any other State. Any tea imported into any State since the date of the imposition of the Federal Tariff can be transferred to another State without a second inspection, but all other tea is subject to examination.

2. Samples of all importations of tea are drawn from the bulk by the Tea Examiner, and tested before delivery can be obtained.

3. One shipment has been condemned by operation of law, and several are awaiting legal decision.

4. Two shipments of tea imported before date of making tea free were re-shipped to country of export.

5. No.

6. No. Exactly the same method of inspection has been carried out since the date of abolition of the duty as was in vogue prior to that event.

STATE GOVERNOR AND NAVAL SUBSIDY.

Senator DOBSON asked Senator Higgs, upon notice—

If he finds from a perusal of the paper on "The Navy and the Nation," read by His Excellency the Governor of Victoria, at the Fitzroy Town Hall, on the 11th June instant, that such paper expresses no opinion as to the desirability or otherwise of the Commonwealth paying an increased naval subsidy, will he still proceed with the motion of which he has given notice dealing with this subject and adhere to the language used in such motion?

Senator HIGGS.—In answer to the honorable and learned senator I have to say—

I have perused the paper read by His Excellency the Governor of Victoria, Sir George Sydenham Clarke, and I regret to find that I am confirmed in my opinion that the lecture was an incursion into the field of Federal politics. The title of the lecture, "The Navy and the Nation," is a misnomer. In a lecture on the navy, one would have expected to find some reference to and description of the type, names, &c., of the best warships now in use in the British navy, the number of war vessels, officers, men, &c. There is no such reference or description. The paper is a carefully-prepared document on naval defence, relating certain events in naval history, basing thereon certain ingenious arguments more or less sophistical, and deducing therefrom certain conclusions more or less romantic and exaggerated. It is singular that those arguments and conclusions oppose the case put by the supporters of Australian local defence, and coincide in a striking manner with the views expressed by the advocates of an increased subsidy to the British War Department.

Senator DRAKE.—I rise to a point of order. I wish to ask whether the honorable senator is in order in what he is reading as an answer to a question? It appears to be a speech.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Is it not "sufficiently ambiguous"?

The PRESIDENT.—I will call the attention of Senator Higgs to Standing Orders 116 and 117—

In putting any such question—

That is, a question asking for information—no argument or opinion shall be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain such question.

In answering any such question, a member shall not debate the matter to which the same refers.

I confess that I was not listening very carefully, and I may be wrong; but it seems to me that Senator Higgs was debating the matter. I do not say that positively, because, as I have stated, I did not exactly hear what he was reading.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Does not that standing order relate to debate on the part of the member who asks the question?

The PRESIDENT.—No.

In answering any such question a member shall not debate the matter.

That is to say, he shall answer the question and shall not debate the matter in reference to which the question has been asked.

Senator DOBSON.—On the point of order, I submit that the honorable senator ought to confine himself to answering the question that has been put to him. He should submit his written answer to you, sir, and let you decide whether it is in order.

The PRESIDENT.—I will ask Senator Higgs to start afresh.

Senator HIGGS.—I will do so—

I have perused the paper read by His Excellency the Governor of Victoria, Sir George Sydenham Clarke, and I regret to find that I am confirmed in my opinion that the lecture was an incursion into the field of Federal politics. The title of the lecture, "The Navy and the Nation," is a misnomer.

Senator DOBSON.—I rise to order—that is not an answer to the question.

The PRESIDENT.—I cannot say that the honorable senator is debating the question, so far.

Senator DOBSON.—He is not answering the question

Senator HIGGS.—I regret that the honorable and learned senator, who was so anxious for information, does not like it now he is getting it.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think that the honorable senator has infringed the standing order so far.

Senator HIGGS.—

In a lecture on the navy one might have expected to find some reference to and description of the type, names, &c., of the best war-ships now in use in the British navy, the number of war vessels, officers and men, &c. There is no such reference or description.

The PRESIDENT.—I think that is debatable matter. It relates to what, in Senator Higgs' opinion, should or should not form the subject-matter of the lecture.

Senator HIGGS.—Touching the point of order, I wish to say that Senator Dobson, in asking me this question, has placed me in a somewhat ambiguous position before the public. I was anxious in making my reply to give some explanation as to why I placed my notice of motion upon the business-paper.

The PRESIDENT.—If the honorable senator will follow the example set by Ministers of the Crown in answering the numerous questions which have been put to them during the last few years, I think he will be in order.

Senator HIGGS.—I saw the other day that, in answer to a question put by one of the members of the House of Representatives, the reply given by a Minister occupied about two-thirds of a column of the Argus. In preparing this lengthy reply I have evidently followed a bad example. But I propose to proceed until you call me to order. These interruptions are unseemly, especially on the part of an ex-Chairman of Committees. I state further—

The paper is a carefully-prepared document on naval defence, relating to certain events in naval history, basing thereon certain ingenious arguments more or less sophistical.

The PRESIDENT.—I think the honorable senator is now proceeding to argue the matter. He will see for himself that he is proceeding beyond an answer to the question which has been put to him. Certain standing orders have been adopted by the Senate, and I have to carry them out. Whether they are right or wrong is not a question for me to determine. As I have to carry them out, I will ask the honorable senator to aid me in doing so.

Senator Dobson.—Is Senator Higgs going to persist in his motion? That is the question.

The PRESIDENT.—The only question is, it seems to me—Does Senator Higgs intend to proceed with his motion?

Senator HIGGS.—Yes, Mr. President. I have read the type-written copy of the lecture of the Governor of Victoria, and I find that it is a paper on naval defence, supporting views which, to my mind, are the views of those who approve of the proposed new naval agreement.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator is arguing now.

Senator HIGGS.—That is the reason why I propose to continue with my motion. I find that the paper supports the views of certain political parties.

The PRESIDENT.—I think the honorable senator can say that, and I ask him not to say any more.

Senator HIGGS.—

In regard to the language of the motion I beg to say that, in carrying out what I conceive to be a public duty—

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think the honorable senator can argue as to the language of his motion. He is asked whether he is going to proceed with it.

Senator DOBSON.—I have questioned Senator Higgs as to the language of his motion.

The PRESIDENT.—I beg pardon; I am wrong.

Senator HIGGS.—

—I have no wish to unnecessarily wound the feelings of any one. My desire is to assist in upholding the undoubted rights and privileges of Parliament. Those rights and privileges were defined for us in 1688, at the time of the great English revolution, when the people expelled King James II. from the throne, and elected another in his stead. Amongst those undoubted rights is the right of Parliament to rule. The King now never makes a public utterance on a matter of public policy unless instructed to do so by a Ministry responsible to Parliament.

The PRESIDENT.—Does not the honorable senator himself think that he is out of order? I must ask the honorable senator's assistance in carrying out the standing orders. I put it to him: does he not think he is arguing the matter?

Senator HIGGS.—I do not think so. I am not dealing now with the lecture of the Governor of Victoria, but with the language of my motion. I wish to state my position and the reason for the language I have adopted; because I consider—

The PRESIDENT.—I have put it to the honorable senator several times that he should aid me in carrying out the standing orders, and I must now rule that the only questions which he can answer are—whether he intends to proceed with the motion of which he has given notice, dealing with the speech of the Governor of Victoria, and whether he will adhere to the language of it? He has already given reasons at great length, and he now proceeds to argue the question. Whether he is wrong or right as to his motion, I do not think he can do that under the standing orders.

Senator HIGGS.—Then I shall have to postpone the greater portion of my reply until my motion comes before the Senate. I only desire to add that—I am not wedded to the terms of the resolution, and if there is a sufficiently unanimous expression of opinion on the part of members of the Senate confirming the constitutional practice that State Governors shall not throw the weight of their vice-regal position and influence into the scale either for or against the supporters of any political views, I shall be willing, on leave being given, to make the terms of the resolution somewhat less pronounced.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator should do it of his own accord.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable and learned senator should not have asked me a question if he did not want to hear the reply.

POST AND TELEGRAPH ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Resolved (on motion by Senator DOBSON)—

That leave be given to introduce a Bill for an Act to repeal the 16th section of the Post and Telegraph Act 1901.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Resolved (on motion by Senator DRAKE)—

That leave of absence for three weeks be granted to Senator O'Connor on account of urgent private business.

METRIC SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT reported the receipt of the following message:—

Message No. 4.

MR. PRESIDENT,

The House of Representatives requests the concurrence of the Senate in the following resolutions, which were agreed to by the House of Representatives on the 19th instant, viz:—

1. That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the metric system of weights and measures should be adopted, with the least possible delay, for use within the Empire.

2. That the most convenient method of attaining the object stated in Resolution 1, is the passage of a law by the Imperial Parliament rendering the use of the metric system compulsory for the United Kingdom, and for all other parts of the Empire whose Legislatures have expressed, or may thereafter express, their willingness to adopt that system.

3. That these resolutions be communicated by address to His Excellency the Governor-General for transmission to the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

F. W. HOLDER, Speaker.

House of Representatives,
Melbourne, 24th June, 1903.

PUBLIC SERVICE: TEMPORARY EMPLOYÉS.

Senator GLASSEY asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Seeing that a number of persons have been employed for a considerable length of time in the postal and other branches of the public service of the Commonwealth as temporary hands, and seeing that such persons will, in accordance with section 40 of the Public Service Act, shortly be thrown out of employment, has any recommendation been made by the Public Service Commissioner with a view of employing these persons permanently?

Senator DRAKE.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

No such recommendation has been made by the Commissioner. There is no power under the Act to transfer temporary employées to the permanent staff. Under the provisions of section 40 of the Public Service Act, the services of temporary employées cannot be retained for a longer period than six months, or nine months in special cases where, in the public interest, such a course is necessary.

COLOURED ALIENS.

Ordered (on motion by Senator HIGGS)—

That there be laid on the table of the Senate a detailed return showing the estimated number of Chinese, Japanese, Hindoos, South Sea Islanders, and other coloured aliens in each State of the Commonwealth.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

Resolved (on motion by Senator DRAKE)—

That leave be given to introduce a Bill for an Act relating to Naturalization.

Bill presented and read a first time.

SUGAR BONUS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 18th June (vide page 1093), on motion by Senator DRAKE—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—I have read the debates which have taken place on this Bill, and I am entirely opposed to it. I think it is unnecessary, and most unjust in its incidence. After reading the speech delivered by the Postmaster-General, in moving the second reading of the Bill, it appeared to me that its object was to make those States, which up to the present time have used no locally-produced sugar, pay for it as if they really had consumed it. It was admitted that the supply of locally-grown sugar last year was insufficient for the requirements of the Commonwealth; it was admitted—and in this connexion I am referring to the debates in both Houses of Parliament—that if the supply were sufficient to meet the requirements of all the Australian States, there would be no necessity to resort to any legislation of this kind. But it was urged that because the production of sugar in the Commonwealth was at present only sufficient to supply the needs of New South Wales and Queensland—presumably at a lower rate than the other States have to pay—the remaining States which have obtained no benefit from this industry should pay a contribution to the highly benefited States of Queensland and New South Wales. Those are the two more favoured States, for Australian-grown sugar is chiefly produced in Queensland, whilst its next door neighbour carries on a huge industry in refining it. The strong argument that was used—and of all the meretricious arguments I have ever heard, it is the worst—was that South Australia, for example, derived great benefit from the fact that the Commonwealth had imposed upon the inhabitants of that State a duty of £6 per ton on imported sugar, instead of the duty of £3 per ton which previously existed. That is the immense benefit which South Australia has received; an extra £3 per ton is taken out of the pockets of the lieges there! It is true that in the palmy days of the industry in Queensland, and at a time when there was no law prohibiting the employment of black labour, South Australia found that a duty of £3 per ton was quite sufficient. When everything was halcyon that duty was found to be sufficient to preserve the revenue of South Australia. The duty was increased to £6 per ton—certainly not to assist Victoria and South Australia, but wholly for the purpose of aiding the industry by a tax which it was thought would be practically prohibitive. It is said that it is well to impose this heavy burden upon the people in order that we may gain the ultimate benefit that we expect to result from it. But instead of tending to the enrichment of South Australia, the duty of £6 per ton on imported sugar is really an impoverishment, because it has to come out of the pockets of the people before it can reach the coffers of the State. The State receives the money, but from whom does it obtain it? It takes it from the pockets of the people. Notwithstanding this fact, however, it is urged that South Australia is receiving a benefit from this increased duty, and we may expect to find that our wealth will be measured, not according to the moneys we receive, but according to the amounts that we have to pay away. Of all the ingenious juvenile arguments I have heard, this is about the worst. It is meretricious and futile on the face of it, but it is what the supporters of the Bill are driven to. It is practically the only argument they can use, because they admit that when the supply of sugar produced in Queensland becomes sufficient to satisfy the requirements of all Australia the existing law will work fairly and justly and that there will be no cause for complaint. I can conceive of no argument more strongly in favour of the present law than that. The States are to contribute their share of the £4 per ton, on a population basis, in respect of the locally produced white-grown sugar consumed throughout Australia, but very little of which comes to any of them at present, except Queensland and New South Wales. They have to wait until the industry has advanced sufficiently to enable the proposal to work on a fair basis, and they are to pay not only for being supplied, but to be supplied as well. New South Wales has been thrown into this proposal owing to the difficulty of discriminating between the sugar-producing States, and the impossibility under the Constitution of providing for a bounty unless its operation be general throughout the Commonwealth. This is the only way in which the proposal can be carried out, and because it is the only way it should not be done. If the only way to carry out this proposal is to work a monstrous injustice against one State, and in favour of another, that fact affords the strongest argument against the adoption of the course proposed. Until some better scheme is discovered we should not resort to what must be a palpable injustice. Why has this proposal been made? My honorable friends of the Opposition say that Victoria and South Australia are being legitimately punished in this way for having lent their support to the abolition of coloured labour. It is asserted that because South Australia and Victoria induced the Commonwealth to adopt the policy of a white Australia they must take with the adoption of that policy the responsibility of compensating those that have been injured by this new freak of legislation. That was the line of argument adopted by Senator Walker and one or two other honorable senators of the Opposition. I do not propose at this stage to discuss the policy of a white Australia. I have always thought that we have been far too hasty, and that we have done at the beginning of the Commonwealth what might have been left to be carried out some years hence. I have been against the policy from the first; but still it is the law and I am bound to accept it. Treating it as the law, I wish to see what right Queensland and New South Wales have to this special treatment. In what way have we so legislated as to give them a claim upon the Commonwealth for compensation in respect of the non-employment of black labour in this industry. Neither State has a tittle of a claim for more consideration than has been shown to them. New South Wales has admittedly none. Last year it produced one-fifth of the sugar grown in the Commonwealth, and it produced nearly the whole of it by white labour. Therefore that State has not been a victim to what has been described as the insane legislation which we have adopted in regard to the policy of a white Australia. Is Queensland a victim? Not in the slightest degree. When we passed legislation providing for a white Australia, we took care to enable Queensland to carry out all its existing contracts; to continue to import coloured labour up to the end of this year, and to employ that labour together with that which they had already at hand until the year 1907. Whether that legislation was right or not, what more could Queensland have asked? That legislation having been passed and that line of policy having been adopted, what right has Queensland to ask for more? It might have been more convenient for the planters to continue the employment of coloured labour, but numerous laws that we pass are more or less restrictive in effect. Laws relating to labour are notably so, for they tend to diminish the profits of those who employ it. But when an Act dealing with a great public question—dealing with the true policy of the State—is passed who ever thinks of making a demand for compensation for every man, woman, and child who, by reason of that legislation, will not derive such profits as they obtained before? If such a demand could be made, legislation could not be passed. The business of the Government could not be carried on. The claims upon the State would be intolerable. We always assume, in every instance in which an existing practice is varied to the detriment of any individuals, that those individuals have no claim for compensation. When the Act for the abolition of slavery was passed the position was different. Slaves were property and could be vended. I am dealing only with the matter from the point of view of the liability of a State to make compensation. Having deprived people of their property the Government granted the compensation which they thought they ought to give. But in this case we have deprived the Queensland planters of nothing. No man has a right to assume that all the conditions of labour which exist to-day will exist for all time, and to speculate on the assumption that the existing condition of affairs will never be altered. New laws are being passed every day interfering with the relations of capital and labour in every form, and I say that government would be intolerable if it were handicapped by having responsibilities thrown upon it in this way.

Senator DAWSON.—Surely the honorable and learned senator would keep the bargain until the time our notice expires.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—In 1907?

Senator DAWSON.—And we allow the importation of kanakas up to the end of this year.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I am dealing with the law as it is, and I say that the sugar planters have been treated with great liberality so far as it is concerned, and that they have no reason to claim any compensation. They have had no injury done them by this Commonwealth which, in my opinion, is a subject for compensation at all. The policy is one thing, but, admitting the policy, I think the administration has been kind and considerate in allowing the sugar planters to import kanakas during this year.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That is a part of the policy.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—It is a part of the policy if the honorable senator pleases. That is the policy we have adopted, and so far as one part of the policy is concerned, though disagreeing with and opposed to it I accept it, and, in respect of the major portion of the policy, I say that it has been kind and considerate. What claim have the sugar planters got? None whatever. Why is this provision made? To compensate them, because we have deprived them of that to which they were not entitled, or to which they were entitled only on the terms previously agreed upon.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We do not deprive them of black labour for four years more.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Exactly; that is what I am saying, and I thought I made myself clear. We declared for a policy of a white Australia, but considering that Queensland had a number of persons under contracts which would not expire for some time, and considering further that it might be harsh to put the law into force immediately, we, out of consideration for the planters, and in order to avoid doing them any injustice, allowed them not only to continue in employment those whom they had engaged until 1907, but also to introduce fresh kanakas during this year so long as they were all cleared out in 1907. I say that in doing that we exhausted their claim to consideration. The rest became a question of State policy on quite other grounds—the advisability of by some method or another promoting a native industry.

Senator DRAKE.—Does the honorable and learned senator understand that Queensland would have to pay more under this Bill in 1902–3?

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I do not see why she should have to pay more.

Senator DRAKE.—But she will, and the honorable and learned senator seems to argue as though Queensland under this Bill were receiving some relief.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I have no doubt that the better knowledge of the Bill possessed by the Postmaster-General would enable him to point out endless anomalies and monstrosities which I have not been able to detect. If this Bill will put Queensland in a worse position than she is in now, I am against it on that ground. Queensland, at the present time, is in quite a fair position. She gets a protection of £3 per ton for black-grown sugar, and a protection of £5 per ton for white-grown sugar, and surely that ought to be enough if the industry is any good.

Senator DAWSON.—That is a bad protectionist argument. The honorable and learned senator should cast his mind back to the Tariff debate.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—What I understood the Postmaster-General to say was that Queensland will not have as much protection under this Bill as she has now.

Senator DRAKE.—I say that under this Bill in 1902–3 Queensland would be in a slightly worse position, because she would have to pay rather more on the population basis than she would have to pay on the basis of consumption.

Senator STYLES.—How much? Only a few hundred pounds.

Senator DRAKE.—But Senator Downer is arguing on the supposition that Queensland is to derive some great benefit from the Bill.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—I can understand the confusing and confused interruptions that necessarily occur, because, as Senator Dobson has truly said, the matter is one of inexplicable difficulty. The puzzle, to my mind, is to find out why on earth the Government have introduced this Bill. The only explanation I can find is the fact that South Australia is paying £106,500 in customs and excise duties, and is not liable for any portion of the amount paid or payable in rebates. Victoria is much in the same position, but it has consumed white-grown sugar to the value of £1,250. I wish to know why the present rebate provisions of the Tariff Act should be unworkable? I find that it is said that we cannot possibly separate sugar grown by white labour from sugar grown by black labour. Why can we not? It appears to me that it should be merely a matter of supervision, and that it is quite practicable. I should think that the ingenuity of a clever Government might have found some way out of that difficulty without resorting to a subterfuge like this, which on the face of it works the injustice of giving New South Wales £4 per ton on a large quantity of sugar which she produces by white labour. One would think that the ingenuity of the Government would have been exerted to its utmost before they introduced a Bill in order to make two States who do not get more sugar from the producing States—because they cannot get it as the producing States use up all their sugar—pay for the disadvantage. They are to be punished for the failure of the producing States to supply them, and that in addition to the punishment which the Commonwealth inflicted upon them, by compelling their people to pay an exorbitant duty of £6 per ton on imported sugar, instead of a duty of £3 per ton which they paid previously. The reproach is all on the other side, and not upon Victoria or South Australia. The production of the other States has not been sufficient, though it was represented that it would be, and we hope it will be. I do not know how long it will take, but the circumstances at present are admittedly not as favorable as they were. We, in South Australia, now have to pay £6,000 a year, roughly, for the “benefit” of not being supplied with sugar produced in the Commonwealth. We may have to pay £12,000 a year, because, if last year’s production were doubled, it would not be much more than enough to supply the requirements of Queensland and New South Wales. We may therefore have to pay that £12,000 a year to assist an industry which does not benefit us by one penny, and assists only the States in which it is carried on. When the production had reached such a stage as to be sufficient to supply the requirements of all the States we are told that the rebate provisions of the Tariff Act would work very well. The Tariff Act works very well now, and the difficulty arises simply and solely because the producing States do not produce enough sugar to supply the Commonwealth consumption. More illogical and unjust legislation than that which is now proposed I have scarcely ever heard of. It proceeds from no disposition to remedy any wrong to Queensland, because she has suffered none; from no reason to complain of existing legislation, because it is good if properly and carefully administered; but it proceeds simply from a paltry jealousy of the States who do not take sugar produced in the Commonwealth, because they cannot get it, and a disposition to make those States pay for what they cannot get, and for what they will not be able to get for many a long day. But this Bill does not end there. There is another feature of it which is slightly unusual in fiscal legislation. This Bill is made retrospective. The revenue under the Tariff Act has meanwhile been collected in the ordinary course by the Commonwealth, and it ought to have been paid over from month to month, according to the Constitution, to the States entitled to it. It has not been paid over, but has been retained for somewhere about eighteen months. Now, at the end of that period, it is proposed to confiscate it by retrospective legislation. That is now proposed, though in the meantime Victoria and South Australia have proceeded with their legislation, on the understanding that this money was theirs under the combined effect of the law we have passed and the Constitution, and would come to them in the ordinary course. They have made their business arrangement on the understanding that this money is part of their revenue, just as much as if it were in their own Treasuries, and yet eighteen months later a Bill is coolly introduced to devote that money to some other purpose altogether. I do not say that we have not power to do this, because there are not many limits to our powers within our ambit of legislation. It is, however, an extraordinary proposal. I do not remember anything of the kind in my experience, nor have I read of such a proposal. We are asked to take money, illegally detained for eighteen months, away from the States to whom it ought to have been paid, after they have made their financial arrangements, and to say to them—“We intend to appropriate it for another purpose altogether.” We should hesitate long before we pass retrospective legislation of this kind operating upon funds that do not belong to us, and we should rather be prepared to endure a large loss than to lay down an important and dangerous constitutional precedent, which may lead in the future to even greater abuse. One word more as to the right of Queensland to complain. Queensland, the Northern Territory, and parts of Western Australia, are the only tropical portions of the Commonwealth. Let us see what the opinion of the people controlling those portions was when they legislated upon the subject. It is instructive to us who represent the States together to know what the States separately thought was the proper course to adopt, when legislating in their own behalf. I begin with Queensland.

Senator DAWSON.—The action taken in Queensland is very misleading.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—It is ; it has misled me. In Queensland in 1885 an Act was passed for the abolition of black labour from the year 1890, but that Act did not contain a single word about making any compensation to the planters. The Queensland Legislature in passing legislation dealing with their own planters, deprived them of the right to use black labour after 1890, but proposed to give them no compensation whatever for taking away their assumed right. That is very instructive, as showing the opinion of Queensland. The Act was repealed in 1892, two years after it was passed, but the repeal had no relation to that part of it. It was repealed on the ground that it was thought advisable to go back to black labour, and for no other reason. So much for the Queensland precedent. When South Australia started, it intended to work the Northern Territory with black labour. Country was taken up rather greedily by a number of persons, who were quite prepared to use black labour.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Who never intended to work at all.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Some of them did, but others did not. With some it was a mere speculation, but with others it was a bona fide intended settlement. Later on came this wave of feeling against black labour, and it was so strong that one of the Ministers, who is not 100 miles from the chamber, said he would rather have the territory an uninhabited waste than see any black people there. Quite regardless of the circumstances in which persons acquired property or anything else, legislation was passed to prevent the employment of any further black labour. No compensation was ever thought of. These are the only two instances in Australia in which there has been any legislation of this description, and in both instances it was recognised, quite properly, that except to the extent of putting persons in the same position as they were in before—that was, to get rid of persons they had to send back or to fulfil obligations for which they were liable and which they did not wish to repudiate—no claim could be made by anybody against the State merely because it passed legislation to prevent the employment of any particular kind of labour in the future. I know that in the Senate there is a strong feeling in favour of the Bill from different points of view. Some honorable senators desire to see it passed for the purpose of punishing States—and promiscuously the innocent with the guilty—that went in for white labour only ; and others because it will benefit their own States. We are all very apt unduly to look through rather a golden medium at anything which will benefit our own State. It is also hard to look in quite a friendly way at what is antagonistic to one's State. There are so many States interested in the Bill that I suppose it will be carried, but I wish to enter my solemn protest against it. I say that it will do a gross injustice to both Victoria and South Australia. Even at this last moment I hope that honorable senators who came here with a disposition to vote for the Bill will carefully reconsider the matter, and say whether, after all, the present Act is not adequate, and whether we should resort to the extreme step of passing a Bill of this kind for the purpose of helping Queensland—although, according to Senator Drake, it will not this year be helped at all—and of helping New South Wales—a State which is not entitled to help—and of punishing Victoria and South Australia simply because they have been compelled by the law of the Commonwealth to pay taxation, and by that means have got their Treasuries a little fuller than they would have been otherwise. I sincerely hope that, even at this late stage, the Senate will not carry the second reading, or, if it is carried, that the Bill will be so modified in Committee that many of its objectionable elements will be removed.

Senator DELARGIE (Western Australia).—I thought that after the very lengthy debate last session we had pretty well got rid of the question of fiscalism in this Parliament ; but evidently it is quite as green a subject as ever. We know that it has always been prolific of much discussion ; and the longer Parliament sits, the more prolific the discussion seems to become. I have heard some novel ideas advanced in the debate on this Bill. I have heard honorable senators affirm quite solemnly that rebate and bonus are practically synonymous terms. I cannot understand how any one who has given any thought to the matter can speak in that way. It must be obvious that instead of the excise being a bonus it is a tax on the sugar industry.

Any assistance which is given to the sugar industry has, first of all, to be collected in the shape of an excise duty. It is erroneous to say that we are giving any advantage to the industry when we give a preference to white-grown sugar over black-grown sugar. The industry has "to pay the piper," so to speak, no matter what else may be done for it in the shape of a protectionist duty. There can be no two opinions about the question that it is the industry alone which has to pay for any difference we make between one kind of labour and the other. I think that the address of Senator Downer was an extremely selfish one. It exhibited very little of the broad sentiment that he so often expressed when we were legislating for a white Australia. At that time he, quite as much as any one else, lauded the principle of a white Australia. But to-day, because his State has to pay a very small trifle, he looks at the question from quite a different stand-point. If legislation is to be passed in such a spirit, then it is good-bye to the higher sentiments which should actuate us. Senator Smith has said that the arguments of Senator Downer were not in accordance with protection. Of course, Senator Smith may be following the lead of Mr. Chamberlain, but he made a statement the other night that certainly was not in accord with the principles which he has enunciated here. I find that he has changed his opinions on fiscalism very considerably since he entered the Chamber. I do not know what the people of Western Australia will think of that change, more particularly the members of the Free-trade Association, of which he is president. When he spoke to the second reading of the Bill last week, he said—

It will thus be seen that, instead of any injustice being inflicted upon any State by reason of the imposition of this excise duty, a very great benefit is being conferred upon the States among whom the revenue so obtained is distributed. The imposition of the duty has been a distinct advantage to the various States.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—From the financial point of view.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If that is the honorable senator's idea of the advantage to the States from the financial stand-point, I cannot understand the position which he has so often taken up here.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I was speaking purely from the stand-point of the State Treasury.

Senator DE LARGIE.—No doubt the honorable senator, perceiving his inconsistency, wishes to improve his position somewhat in the eyes of the members of the Free-trade Association. He may think that they will have to look out for another president if this sort of thing goes on, and no doubt he is trying to improve his position with them.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The honorable senator is barking up the wrong tree.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I may have been barking up the wrong tree when I said that the honorable senator had changed his opinions on fiscalism, but I certainly think that the words I have quoted from his speech show that his position to-day is not consistent with the attitude which he has so often taken up here. The subject-matter of the Bill ought to be approached in a broad and generous manner. If the sugar industry is to be conducted by white labour, then some modification of the measure is certainly an essential. I am pleased to see that Senator Glassey has given notice of an amendment which I believe will make the measure more acceptable to the majority of honorable senators. If it is inserted, and white labour is used in the production of sugar for twelve months the sugar planters will be entitled to the bonus. Senator Downer has referred to the incidence of the tax. I hold that it is in no way altered by the Bill. It alters the method of collecting the duty, but that does not necessarily mean that there is any alteration in the incidence of the tax. I hold that, in view of the emphatic demand for a white Australia by the people at the general elections, they will have very little hesitancy in agreeing to any little price which they may be asked to pay for the fulfilment of that great ideal. The little expenditure which has been necessitated in order to provide a way of supplanting black labour with white labour is so trifling that he must have a very small soul indeed who would offer any objection. I know of no country which has got rid of, or is likely to get rid of, black labour at such a small cost. When we remember the millions that England had to pay to get rid of slavery in the Empire, and the millions that the United States had to spend in order to get rid of slavery in the Southern States, we may congratulate ourselves upon the fact that we are getting rid of black labour at a very small cost.

indeed. In his speech Senator Dobson exhibited an amount of sympathy for white labour that was rather startling to hear coming from his lips. It was quite unusual; and I am inclined to think that it was the kind of sympathy that is generally called "crocodile" sympathy. It was, I think, shown for the time being, merely as an argument, without any real sympathy being behind it. The same old wheeze was trotted out when the subsidy paid to steamship companies for the carriage of mails between Australia and Europe was being discussed. I take it that Senator Dobson's sympathetic remarks regarding the hardships imposed upon the white labourer in inducing him to work in the sugar industry were merely caused by the cost of white labour. I can assure him that if he wishes to do away with the disadvantages in connexion with any of the industries of Australia under which white workers labour, he will have plenty of opportunities. Indeed, he has had many opportunities of doing so in his own State. He was a Minister for a long time in Tasmania, but I am quite unaware of anything that he ever did during his occupancy of office to justify us in believing that he has any great sympathy for the white labourer, or to justify him in expressing such sympathy. However, if he will assist the labour party in this Chamber, I can promise him numberless opportunities for the purpose. Senator Neild has also expressed what I take to have been crocodile sympathy for the white workers. He referred to the wives and children of the sugar-growers in Queensland having to participate in the very laborious work of sugar production. But we know that the wives and children of farmers all over the world occasionally lend their assistance in the fields. I do not see anything startling in the fact that the farmers of Queensland, to some extent, adopt the same practice as is pursued elsewhere.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There is no other country in the world where women and children work in the sugar-cane fields.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not see a bit of difference between farmers engaged in the sugar industry and those engaged in growing wheat or any other kind of produce.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Or in digging potatoes.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There is no comparison.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is the same kind of laborious work. Queensland may be a bit hotter than other parts of Australia, but there are farmers in Queensland producing other crops than sugar. If we are to extend our sympathy to the one kind of producers I do not see why we should not sympathize all round. If, however, Senator Neild wishes to put an end to this kind of labour, he will have his opportunity of assisting the labour party to do so, not only in Queensland, but in other parts of Australia also. I hold that to provide a safeguard which will prevent black-grown sugar being smuggled through the Customs as sugar produced by white labour, we may very well agree to the provisions of this Bill. I feel quite certain that if we do nothing to lessen the amount of black labour in Queensland we shall, at the end of the stipulated time, have quite as much black labour engaged in the sugar industry in Queensland as there is now. We wish to see the employment of black labour lessened as much as possible. Unless we give the planters who have employed black labour some encouragement to employ white men instead, we shall have a very unsatisfactory state of affairs prevailing at the end of the term when we expect to see the kanakas decreased in number. The proposal of Senator Glassey will have the effect of giving an extra amount of assistance to the planters, while all other honorable senators should be willing to give to them.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—Senator Downer, in opening the discussion this afternoon, broke entirely new ground. I do not intend to follow him to a large extent, inasmuch as he absolutely denounced both the proposal of the Government and the suggested amendment upon their proposal. He set himself rather a vain task in attempting to prove that neither the one nor the other is necessary. I believe that the mind of the Senate is made up, that either the proposal of the Government or that of Senator Glassey—or, as a further alternative, that of Senator Millen—must be accepted. It is agreed that something must be done to relieve the present situation; and what we have to set ourselves to decide upon is either that we shall adopt the proposal of the Government or one of the two suggested alternatives. But I should like to remind Senator Downer and one or two of our other protectionist friends—particularly the protectionists from South Australia—that when they so heartily cheered Senator Downer when he complained that the £6 per ton on sugar is a protection to the sugar-growers in Queensland and New South Wales, and, therefore, a burden on the South Australian taxpayers, for which they receive no corresponding benefit, they forgot that, during the whole of the Tariff discussions which took place last session, it was time after time drummed into our ears that the Queensland and New South Wales senators who happened to be free-traders, and also representatives of the sugar-growing districts, should consider the interests of the other parts of Australia in return for the benefits that were to be conferred upon the growers of cane in the two States I have mentioned. When it was proposed to impose a high duty to benefit the Victorian iron foundries—a duty of 25 per cent. on mining machinery—and a high duty for the benefit of the growers of wheat and the producers of salt in South Australia, and also when so much was said about the claims of the Tasmanian hop-growers for consideration, an appeal was made to the New South Wales and Queensland senators. It was said that in these matters there should be reciprocity. But now Senator Downer says that, because sugar is not produced in South Australia, therefore the imposition of £6 per ton duty on foreign sugar is a tax and a punishment—he had the audacity to say that it was a punishment—imposed upon the poor, unfortunate taxpayers of South Australia. He forgot that last session he and the other protectionists reminded us, when they wanted duties on wheat, salt, mining machinery, and other commodities, that we should impose these duties for the benefit of Victorian and South Australian producers and manufacturers, in consideration of the duty on sugar which they were willing to support. I well remember Senator Styles making a personal appeal to me, as a free-trader representing a State where sugar is produced, that this £6 per ton duty carried with it an obligation to protect the industries of Victoria and other States. I did respond to that appeal, only I objected to the amount of reciprocity which they wanted. They wanted about ten times more than I thought they ought to get. But still I was willing to give them a fair thing. It is just as well to confront those senators with each other, and to bring before them the shadow of last session, now that Senator Downer urges that this £6 per ton duty is a burden on South Australia. It is also just as well to remind him and other enthusiastic protectionists that, when protectionists proposed to foster local industries, it was even urged that if the proposed protection was not sufficient it should be increased, in order that the protection might be such as to compel the public to purchase from the local manufacturer. I reply now, in Senator Downer's own words, that if this £6 per ton on sugar is not sufficient to make South Australian consumers buy sugar produced from cane grown in Australia, the duty ought to be £12 per ton.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We could not get it.

Senator DAWSON.—Senator Playford interjects that we could not get so high a duty. What was the great protectionist argument that was used last session? It was that, until you give a sufficient encouragement to the local producer, and make your Tariff barrier so high that the foreigner cannot possibly creep in at all, people will not risk their capital and their enterprise in local industries.

Senator BEST.—The honorable senator is talking of prohibition, not of protection.

Senator DAWSON.—What is the difference between them? I know that there is a difference in the science of economics between protection and prohibition, but I have failed to find that difference realized here. I have failed to find any marked difference between the protectionist party and the prohibition party in the Senate. I refer to these matters not as having any particular bearing on the question under discussion, but to remind honorable senators opposite that the ghost of the past rises up to confound them. In discussing this Bill I propose to offer some criticism on the statements which have been made upon the experience we have so far had of the white Australia policy. Honorable senators have taken advantage of the Bill to speak in general terms. As one representing the State that is most concerned in this matter I think that I shall not be intruding upon the time and patience of the Senate in giving an answer to those criticisms. It is astonishing to me what a mean and miserable opinion some honorable senators have of their fellow Australians. There are white men who, on every opportunity which presents itself—in fact, if a convenient one does not present itself they exhaust their ingenuity in manufacturing one—condemn absolutely and cast reflections upon either the character or the stamina of the white working men of the Commonwealth of Australia. That view is echoed and re-echoed in this Chamber on every opportunity which is provided. The discussion of this measure has not been lost sight of. Further advantage has been taken of it.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Who said that?

Senator DAWSON.—There are a number of honorable senators here who truly represent and freely express the opinion which is held and expressed outside the Senate. They hold the most mean and miserable opinions of the character and stamina of the white working men of this country.

Senator FRASER.—Nonsense.

Senator DAWSON.—I repeat that it is so, and for proof of my assertion I rely on the utterances and persistent actions of the particular men to whom I refer.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Prove it.

Senator DAWSON.—In all probability I shall individualize before I resume my seat. I was proceeding to point out, when I was interrupted, that I could understand this line of conduct on the part of one or two classes of persons. Some people have a particular personal purpose to serve. As long as they can reap large profits from the employment of an inferior alien race, the love of greed will induce them to do so, even though the employment of that race may mean the degradation of their fellow Australians who occupy a lower position in the social and industrial scale than they do. There is another class of people who condemn the white workers on general principles—who condemn them out of an unholy spirit of sympathy with those who say that any ambition on the part of the white working man is undesirable, and should be suppressed. There are others again who, in connexion with the sugar question, make bold statements denying the ability and stability of the white workers. They do so, not from pecuniary motives, or because they have any sympathy with those who are eternally opposed to the white workers and would like to crush them, but from pure ignorance. It is absolutely useless for honorable senators to say that persons who are utterly opposed on general principles to any ambition on the part of the white workers do not exist in the Commonwealth, and that they fail to find a voice and representation in the Senate.

Senator FRASER.—Rubbish.

Senator DAWSON.—I would remind the honorable senator that the experiences of every-day life prove my assertion. Our daily press, our Herald, and the official records of every State Parliament of Australia prove it. It is useless to deny the existence of these classes. They do exist, and unfortunately those who hold this mean and miserable opinion of their fellow white colonists get into power, while the great majority of the white working men of Australia fail to reciprocate their feelings. If they did, these men would not exercise the authority and power that they do at present. There is another class to which Senator Neild, who made some very wild statements during his speech on the second reading of this Bill, belongs. I refer to the class who make assertions from sheer ignorance of the facts. I am very sorry that Senator Neild is not present. I intimated to him that I intended to speak during the second-reading debate, and if he were here he might be willing to withdraw certain statements made by him, and thus probably save the time of the Senate by rendering it unnecessary for me to deal with them. The honorable senator repeated the old cry, which has been heard times out of number, that the white man cannot, or, if he can, will not work in the cane-fields of Queensland. I believe that Senator Dobson has given expression to precisely the same opinion. Those who hold this view say that the experience of the policy of a white Australia has proved that, at any rate in Queensland, white men will not or cannot work in the cane-fields. When Senator Neild was speaking I endeavoured, by way of interjection, to ascertain the particular case in which he said white men had failed to work, under fair conditions, in the cane-fields. I did not succeed in obtaining a reply to my query, and therefore, I have been compelled to look up the information for myself.

Senator Neild said, in reply to an interjection, that the experience of the Mossman Mill Company went to prove his assertions. He based his charge as to the failure of the white Australia policy, and his accusation against the character and stamina of the white workers of Queensland, on what he alleged were the true facts of the Mossman Mill incident, as published in a pamphlet signed by the manager and secretary.

Senator FRASER.—Were the statements in that pamphlet true?

Senator DAWSON.—They were absolutely untrue.

Senator FRASER.—It is easy to say that.

Senator DAWSON.—It is very easy for a man to make an accusation, and it is equally easy for another to give a denial to the charge, but I intend to furnish proof of my denial. When an honorable senator makes an accusation against a body of men, he should particularize in such a way as to render it possible to get at the facts, so that a reply may be made to his charge.

Senator FRASER.—The facts were given in that case.

Senator DAWSON.—Senator Neild made a general accusation against the white workers of Queensland, but refused to particularize. Upon being pressed for more details, he said that he was referring to the Mossman Mill case in particular, and that the experience of the directors of that company was that of many others. That was a very unfair statement to make, because if the honorable senator knew of other cases which were equally bad, he should have furnished the details so as to enable a reply to be made to his charges. It happens that the Mossman Mill Company published a pamphlet which they distributed very widely throughout Australia. I believe they sent a copy of it to every honorable senator, except those who constitute the labour party.

Senator BARRETT.—I received a copy.

Senator DAWSON.—Then the honorable senator is a most favoured individual. It is alleged that the Mossman Mill Company made an honest effort to adopt the white Australia policy; that they did all they could to encourage their farmers to harvest their cane by white labour; that one man who took a contract to cut cane by white labour was unable to fulfil it, and that he absconded and forfeited his deposit of £50.

Then it is said that another man, named George Taylor, undertook to complete the contract; that he lodged a deposit of £50 on the understanding that if he completed the contract the deposit lodged by him would not only be returned, but that he would also receive the £50 deposited by the first contractor. Senator Neild said that in spite of that additional inducement Taylor and his men failed to complete the work, and thus forfeited £100. There are a number of other matters relating to this case, but I wish to point out that Mr. Taylor has replied in the public press of Australia to the statements made in the pamphlet issued by the Mossman Mill Company. Further than that, he handed a sworn affidavit setting out the details to the Minister for Trade and Customs, who, after investigating the facts by every means within his power, stood on the public platforms, from one end of Queensland to the other, and refuted the statements made by the Mossman Mill Company. That fact has been allowed to pass unnoticed, while this wretched pamphlet, which has not a tittle of fact to support it, has been trotted out by Senator Neild, who made no attempt to learn the other side.

Senator FRASER.—Did the man complete his work?

Senator DAWSON.—I shall refer to the whole of the circumstances surrounding this case. Dealing first of all with the question of forfeiture I would point out that Taylor's gang of cane-cutters undertook by contract to cut what was alleged to be 6,600 tons of cane, more or less, and to supply it to the mill at the rate of 40 tons a day. They went to work and found that the cane was what is known as "grubby" cane. Any honorable senator who is at all familiar with the subject will know what grubby cane is, and it is singular that the very first cane that these men were called upon to cut was of that description. Grubby cane is very dry and hard, and as a rule it seldom pays for cutting. However, the men set to work, and after they had cut 1,200 tons it was discovered by the Mossman Mill Company that there were still some 7,600 tons cane left. They asked for a fresh agreement, and Taylor then contracted to supply the mill with 70 tons of cane per day. At that time labour was plentiful, and Taylor increased his gang to 35 men in order to supply the mill at the rate named. He continued to cut the cane up to the end of October, but suddenly he received the following letter from Mr. Harry S. W. C. Roberts :—

Mossman Central Mill Company Limited.
Mossman, vis Port Douglas,
24th October, 1902.

MR. GEO. TAYLOR, —
Mossman,

Dear Sir,—It being now necessary to reduce your cane deliveries to forty (40) tons per day, I am instructed to give you one (1) week's notice to do so, as specified in the agreement between yourself and this company.

Thus, after Taylor had been cutting cane at the rate of 70 tons a day, he received one week's notice, in accordance with one of the provisions of the agreement, to reduce the supply to 40 tons daily. He naturally reduced his staff, and went on supplying the mill at the lower rate. After going on under that arrangement for a time, he suddenly got a letter from another individual, dated 26th December.

Senator FRASER.—Who is that other individual?

Senator DAWSON.—The letter is signed "C. J. Cress, for the secretary." The secretary to the Mossman Mill would appear to be a very peculiar person, because the person signing the pamphlet is a Mr. O'Gorman, a Mr. Roberts signs the note giving notice of reduction as secretary to the Mossman Mill Company, and in this final letter we have a Mr. Cress signing for the secretary.

Senator GLASSEY.—The late secretary, Mr. Roberts, is now no more; he is dead.

Senator DAWSON.—Well, he has left his hand behind him, and I have the imprint of it here. In this particular document we are introduced to another secretary. It says—

MR. GEORGE TAYLOR, Mossman.

Dear Sir,—I am instructed to inform you that, according to cane deliveries for some considerable time past, which have only averaged 38½ tons per day, it is impossible for you to harvest all the white rebate cane as per your agreement before the termination of the present crushing season, thus causing the growers and the company a great loss. Owing to the average daily supply not coming near the amount of your contract, this company is reluctantly compelled to notify you that your contract is cancelled through non-performance of the conditions contained therein; therefore you are to discontinue work on Saturday afternoon, the 27th inst.

Yours faithfully,

C. J. CRESS, Pro Secretary.

Mr. Taylor goes on to point out that they finished their cutting and loading, and then knocked off. I want honorable senators to understand that they loaded their 40 tons a day, and then 70 tons a day. Then they received the intimation that they must reduce the quantity, and on the top of that, without any prior intimation, they are told that their contract must be broken because they are only supplying 38½ tons per day. This is in the face of the fact that out of the 6,600 tons of cane they originally contracted to trash and cut, over 6,000 tons had been dealt with up to this time, because the intimation they received was given three weeks before the end of the crushing season, when, according to the mill's own statement, there were only 591 tons of cane left. At the very time these men were told to knock off, they were cutting, according to the Customs receipts, 251 tons a week. Hindoos were employed to deal with the 591 tons that were left. The Customs returns supplied are very significant. I find in a document headed "His Majesty's Customs—Memorandum for George Taylor," returns for December 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, giving the number of trucks, their weight, and so on, and from the 22nd to the 27th December it appears that they supplied 209 trucks of cane, weighing 251 tons 4 cwt.

Senator PEARCE.—Or more than 40 tons per day.

Senator DAWSON.—That shows that the plea that they were not supplying the necessary amount of cane was all moonshine. Now, as to the forfeiture: When the company deliberately and designedly broke the contract Taylor went down to Cairns to get legal advice, and he followed that up by sending an intimation to Mr. Buchanan that if he did not within fourteen days return the £100 deposit, a writ would be issued for its recovery. In the meantime, all the men concerned in the contract with Taylor were anxious to get their money and get away to do some other work. They desired to come to some compromise, and finally the result was that Mr. Buchanan drew up a letter and said that if Taylor would sign it he would give them the £100, but if not, he would fight the issue of the writ. This was a proposal made to men whose money was in Mr. Buchanan's hands, and who desired to get away with it and make the best use of it they could. What was more natural than that they should say to the man representing them—"Take the money, accept the terms, and let us go about our business." Taylor then went to Buchanan and said—"I will accept the terms, and I will sign that letter on condition that it is not to be used for any political purpose." On that stipulation Taylor signed the letter, with the result that he got the £100, and the letter was no sooner signed than Buchanan published it broadcast throughout the length and breadth of the Commonwealth. Those are the leading facts concerning this matter, and I say that they show that it was a pure trick from beginning to end on the part of the company, in order to try and discredit the white Australia policy which had been adopted by the Federal Parliament. It does not redound to the credit of any honorable senator when he has these facts within his grasp to make use of his position to put forward one side of the case which is so manifestly unfair, without giving due credit to what may be said on the other. It is in that way that I view the statements made by Senator Neild.

Senator FRASER.—Has the honorable senator got the letter to which he refers?

Senator DAWSON.—The full letter is here, and I have in my possession the sworn affidavit of Taylor, which was afterwards confirmed by the investigations of Mr. Kingston's officers, and which Mr. Kingston was so satisfied about that he used it publicly on platforms in Queensland, when addressing the people of that State. In the most open way, every publicity has been given to the categorical denial made by Mr. George Taylor. Let me mention a circumstance to show the unfair methods which have been used. Mr. Kingston referred to this matter on the platform in Cairns—the very place where the incident is supposed to have occurred—when speaking to one of the largest public meetings ever held in that town, where, if what he said had not been correct, it would have been promptly contradicted. In making the contract with the farmers growing sugar—I think this was at the Mulgrave Mill—the farmers asked if they had the permission of the mill-owners to adopt the white Australia policy. They were told that they would receive the permission of the mill-owners on condition that they employed a gang of not less than thirty men. As Mr. Kingston said, that was a grossly unfair condition, because they should have been allowed to manage their own affairs, and they should have been allowed to say whether they required a large or a small gang. But that is not the worst of it. Another condition was that, while employing white labour, they must agree to pay for the keep and expenses of the kanakas in the meantime. So that, to carry out the white Australia policy, the conditions imposed upon these men were that they should employ white labour in large gangs, and should also keep the black labourers on the plantation at the time, without doing any work at all.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Were these statements by Mr. Kingston denied?

Senator DAWSON.—They were made by Mr. Kingston on the public platform in Cairns, and they were not denied. I should say that the statements were also made by Mr. Kingston when the planters sought to trap him at a dinner out at the Mulgrave Mill. When there by himself in the midst of them, he repeated the statements, and they had no answer to make to them. The right honorable gentleman also told a deputation of the Chambers of Commerce, and many representatives of the sugar districts who waited on him in Brisbane on his return from the north, that from 14 to 15 per cent. of the farmers in the Mackay district had already come under the white Australia provisions, and that he had their assurance that not less than another 50 per cent. were quite willing to come under them during the next year. In the face of startling facts of this description is it not absurd that an honorable senator representing a big State like New South Wales should try by making one-sided statements in this Senate to convince the outside public, who may listen to and heed his remarks, that the white Australia policy has been an absolute failure? Mr. Frank Kenna, who, at the present time, is the Queensland State member for the Bowen district, was down here not long ago, and he informed me that so well satisfied were the sugar farmers in the Proserpine district of the value of the white Australia policy that the few who had gone in for it did not intend to go back upon it, and that at the very least 60 per cent. of the farmers in that district would adopt the policy. Is it to be imagined that these men will go in for that policy if they cannot rely upon getting white men to do their work? I intended to say something with regard to the "fearful and dreadful" condition of health in which the adoption of the white Australia policy is likely to leave the white-working people of Queensland, but I shall only make this remark upon it. When honorable senators speak about the fearful conditions of climate and soil in North Queensland, they only cause a smile of contempt to cross the lips of people who have lived and worked in North Queensland. I was born there, and I have worked there all my life, and I never suffered so much in health as when I came down to the "beautiful" climate of Melbourne; I never suffered so much discomfort as I did during the time of Melbourne's "glorious" winter, such as we are experiencing at the present time.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator looks a great deal better than when he came down.

Senator DAWSON.—If that be so, it is due to the fact that the stamina which the climate of North Queensland puts into a man enables him to withstand even the Melbourne climate.

Senator DOBSON.—If the honorable senator goes back to Cairns he will be dead in a month.

Senator DAWSON.—I do not think so. I lived in the North nearly all my life, and it is an absurdity to say that white men cannot stand the North Queensland climate. I have no objection to Senator Dobson, or any other senator, saying that he is such a weak, puny, putty individual that he could not stand the climate of North Queensland, but I absolutely deny his right to say that because he is a weak, puny, and putty individual, therefore no other white man could stand the climate.

Senator FRASER.—The climate of Cairns is worse than that of Mauritius—in the cane fields.

Senator DAWSON.—I could wish with all my heart that honorable senators when speaking about North Queensland would speak with some knowledge, or, if they have no personal knowledge, that before they give utterance to wild statements such as that which Senator Fraser has just made, they would make themselves acquainted with the facts by some other means. There are any number of men in Victoria with whom Senator Fraser must be familiar who have been in the district of Cairns, and who can tell him otherwise. I may say that, as a matter of fact, I believe there is no spot in the whole of the Commonwealth of Australia which receives more money from tourists seeking for health and comfort in relief from business as does the little port of Cairns.

Senator FRASER.—It is, no doubt, a nice place for a trip in winter.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator surely would not dream of making a trip into the seventh circle of the Inferno, and he would, no doubt, try to get as near heaven as he could.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I have found it hotter in November in Melbourne than in Cairns.

Senator DAWSON.—There is another statement here from a cane-grower in the Mackay district named Shannon. I do not wish to say very much more upon this matter, but there are one or two striking paragraphs in a statement he made in an interview given to a representative of the Brisbane Courier, and republished in the Toowoomba Chronicle. I consider that the people of Australia are greatly indebted to both the Brisbane Courier and the Toowoomba Chronicle for their efforts to put the statements of each party before their readers. Of course we claim the Toowoomba Chronicle as a very sterling advocate of the white Australia policy. We do not claim the Brisbane Courier as an advocate of that policy, but we cannot help commending that journal for its fairness, because while it publishes statements to suit its own view, it spares no pains to publish statements from the opposite stand-point. It sent a representative to see Mr. Shannon when he went to Brisbane from the Mackay district, and to ascertain his opinion on the employment of white labour. From that interview I quote the following passages:—

What has been your experience with white labour? was the first question asked.—It turned out better than I expected, was the reply. I intend to make a success of it, if possible, and a good many others had the same desire. Putting it briefly, it worked well. It cost me about 4s. per ton for the harvesting right through, and that figure must be taken in connexion with the fact that it was a bad crop to harvest, as the cane was comparatively light, and a man had to cut a lot of cane to make up a ton of weight, and the weather was very distressing in October, there being bush fires about.

What white labour did you employ?—The best men we had were young Queenslanders, farmers' sons from the Brisbane and Logan districts. They worked remarkably well, were a sober lot, and spent no money. They took their cheques home. We had also some men of the class usually found on railway works—a really fine lot. Of course the work of keeping the cane clean was distressing, but the men stuck to it splendidly.

Was there any scarcity of labour?—No. For every man we wanted in December we could have got ten.

And about wages?—Well, I paid wages, and did not let any contracts. I went upon the principle of getting good men, giving them good wages, and expecting good work from them. I may say, broadly, that the men in the district cleared about 30s. per week each after paying for their food. The matter of the food comes in here. And this is what I consider an economic principle; good food and a good cook are cheaper than low fare and a bad cook.

Mr. Shannon a successful grower acts on the principle of feeding his men well and paying them good wages, with the result that they are thoroughly satisfied. He carried out the intention of this Parliament, made a good profit, and got good men to do his work. Senator Neild has stated that he intends to move an amendment to prevent applicants claiming the rebate who have sweated their wives and children. When he was pressed, by interjection, he refused to state who were the sweaters. He would make no definite statement which could be followed up, either to be confirmed or to be contradicted if untrue. That method of argument can only be characterized by a term which would be unparliamentary. He did say—and, in making this statement, he went too far the other way, unless he was prepared to go the whole way—that the sweating of the women and children on the cane-fields occurred in North Queensland, and that the only result we had achieved was doing away with the sweating of the kanaka, and sweating the wives and children of the sugar farmers instead. It was a most cruel statement to make, and, in my opinion, it was absolutely unwarranted. He made the charge, but he refused even to indicate the district where this state of affairs is supposed to exist, although I pressed him so often by interjection to do so that I must have nearly exhausted your patience, sir. The sugar districts in North Queensland are the Mackay, Proserpine, and Cairns districts. In the limited time at my disposal since the charge was made by Senator Neild, I have failed to find that there exists in any district the state of affairs which he alleged to exist. I give a point-blank denial to his assertions in that regard. It does not reflect credit on the honorable senator that he should make a statement of that kind, branding a class who have no opportunity of defending themselves. To say that it would not tend to the good character of the debate, if he gave the names was a most unworthy evasion of the subject, if it was not a deliberate shuffle from the position. He was not asked to give the names, but to indicate the districts, and that he declined to do. He went on further in his denunciations, which to some extent took the character of ravings, to say that he spoke from information gathered on the spot. On what spot? He would not give the slightest indication of what spot it was. I not only deny that the sweating of women and children goes on in Northern Queensland, but I deny that it goes on in any portion of that State, either in the sugar districts, or in any of the other agricultural districts. The honorable senator made a singular admission in his speech. In common with Senator Fraser and a few others, he holds that the white man cannot cultivate sugar cane in Queensland, because the work is too laborious and the climate is too trying. Now, before he resumed his seat the other day, he said that the farmers' wives and children cultivate the sugar-cane in that State. That is, the men cannot do it; but the women and children are doing it. Surely it is not necessary for me to point out the moral of an address of that description.

Senator FRASER.—I have always said that white men cannot do it in Cairns and the North. I maintain the accuracy of that statement until it is proved to be wrong. A year or two will tell whose opinion is right.

Senator DAWSON.—That is a plain candid statement. There was a time when the honorable senator was perfectly justified in making that statement; but now he is not justified in adhering to the statement, because white men are growing cane, are harvesting cane, and are successful in the industry; where a coloured labourer does not touch the cane from the time the ground is ploughed until the sugar is sent to the refinery.

Senator FRASER.—My answer is that only 15 per cent. of the Queensland planters now grow cane by white labour.

Senator DAWSON.—That is no answer to my statement. There are 15 per cent. of the men who had an opportunity of coming under the white Australia policy last year. But there is a very large percentage of the growers who have not been provided with an opportunity to do so, and there is also a large percentage who are either gifted or cursed—it is not my province to say which—with a type of mind similar to Senator Fraser's, and who are convinced that nigger labour is the only possible labour to make sugar growing pay. These men would never in any circumstances get clear of their dearly beloved nigger in order to give their fellow-colonists a decent show to make an honest living. We shall always, I presume, have with us these unconvinced and stubborn people. But, because they stubbornly refuse to do what is obviously the right thing, that is no argument against the wisdom of the policy which Parliament thought fit to adopt. Leaving that portion of the subject, I come more particularly to what we shall have to decide, I presume, by division. The Bill provides that, after the 28th February of this year, every grower who has employed black labour in the planting of his cane shall not be able at any time to reap the benefits of the bonus. Notwithstanding what he may do after that date in the shape of trying to honestly carry out the policy of a white Australia, the mere fact that a coloured alien has had a hand in the planting of the cane will prevent him from reaping the full advantage of the bonus. The reason advanced by Senator Drake, and others who have agreed to support the Bill, is that they make the date arbitrary in order to further that policy—as it were to compel the planters to immediately adopt the policy, and at the same time to inflict a punishment on those growers who have up to the present defied or flouted the will of this Parliament. I venture to say that the provision will have absolutely the contrary effect. I desire precisely what they desire—that every encouragement shall be given to the sugar-growers to adopt the policy, but I claim that when you stipulate that after the 28th February of this year everybody who has not adopted the policy at that date shall not be entitled to get the bonus, you cut away all the encouragement and inducement which the Parliament intended to hold out to the growers. There will be absolutely no encouragement or inducement to any farmer, be he large or small, to embrace the policy and employ white men. It is perfectly absurd to say that the provision is framed in the interests of that policy, while at the same time the Bill says that the planter may import, until the end of this year, kanakas to any number, subject to any restriction in the Queensland Act, and also enter into a three years' agreement. The Federal Act says to the planter—"Up to the end of this year you can employ kanakas to work your plantation for a term of three years, with the option of a renewal for six months," and then this Bill says—"We shall punish you for employing the kanakas you import." If it was the intention of the Government to say that the white Australia policy should commence on every sugar-field on the 28th February of this year, why did they not provide in their law that no further importation should take place after that date under a three years' engagement, with the right of renewal for six months. The thing appears to me to be perfectly absurd. Why, the Government are endeavouring by this very provision to do with the sugar farmers what Mr. Kingston himself so scathingly denounced at Cairns with regard to the Mulgrave Mill. He denounced the contract of the mill-owners which provided that the farmers must employ white men and keep the nigger in idleness. The Government by this Bill are making precisely the same provision—that the sugar planter must, after the 28th February of this year, employ white men, and keep their kanakas with whom they have engagements. The thing is absurd; it is nonsensical. Another matter to which I wish to refer—and I ask honorable senators to think of this very seriously—is that in reading the debates which took place in the House of Representatives, and in listening carefully to what was said in this Chamber, it seemed to me that the arguments revealed a misconception of the very nature of sugar-growing. The Minister for Trade and Customs himself repeatedly pointed out—and was followed in the statement by a large number of other members—that it was in the planting of the cane particularly that the employment of white labour should be encouraged, because, it was said, the planting was the most important and laborious portion of sugar-cane production. It was urged that the benefits of the white Australia policy would be felt more particularly in regard to the planting. Changes were rung upon that idea in a great many ways. The idea is absurd. A contrast between planting and harvesting may easily be drawn. In growing wheat you plant for one year only; but in growing sugar-cane you plant one year and may reap up to ten crops from the one planting. The general average throughout Queensland is six crops from one planting.

Senator PEARCE.—Does that mean in six years?

Senator DAWSON.—Yes; six crops in six years. In other words, from one planting you can, on an average, get one crop and five rattoons; but in the Mackay district I myself saw a crop being cut from the ninth ratoon. That crop returned 21 tons to the acre; and they grow rattoons in Queensland which only yield 15 tons to the acre. As a matter of fact the cane that was crushed at the Mossman mill, about which there has been so much talk, only averaged about 15 tons to the acre. The statement that the planting is the most important portion of sugar-cane production is an evidence that those who make it do not know much about cane-growing. The Postmaster-General cannot call to mind one contention of the opponents of the white Australia policy to the effect that a white man could not plough the ground and plant the cane. The argument has always been that it is after the cane is mature and ready for the mill, so far as nature can make it ready—that it is in the harvesting, the trashing, and cutting of the cane—that the presence of the kanaka is necessary. It was only then that the white man was alleged to be unable to work in the cane-fields. All along it has been recognised by all parties in Queensland that the great difficulty to get over is what the Minister for Trade and Customs was pleased to call the harvesting of the cane. The rebate which has been allowed was granted for the express purpose of enabling the sugar-grower to employ white labour to trash and cut the cane. Therefore, the contrast attempted to be drawn between the planting and harvesting of the cane is a most misleading one.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Still the Minister for Trade and Customs has been all through the sugar country.

Senator DAWSON.—He has never seen a cane cutting. I should like Senator Charleston to understand distinctly that it does not matter whether the Minister for Trade and Customs, or the whole of the Federal Government, have been through the sugar districts of Queensland every cutting season for the last twenty years; if they came back and said at the end of that time that the planting of the cane was the most important process, they would be saying something that was not correct. It simply is not so. If they fail to understand the true position it does not matter how many times they go there. My objection is that they do not go often enough to enable them to understand the process of cane production.

Senator DRAKE.—The members of the Government did not say that, they did! The critics of this Bill said that we were proposing to pay bonuses for sugar not grown by white labour.

Senator DAWSON.—I have looked up the debates, and the statement I have criticised was not only made by Mr. Kingston, but by many who supported him in the contention that the bonus was to be given for the planting of the cane, because they thought that was the most important portion of sugar-growing. The thing was so startling to me that I could not help making a note of it.

Senator DRAKE.—Was that in the House of Representatives?

Senator DAWSON.—Yes; and it is reported in Hansard. It was pointed out that under this particular provision, if the grower planted his cane with black labour and in the very next year he registered with the intention of continuing to grow his cane with white labour, he could not receive the bonus because kanakas had assisted in the planting. Mr. Kingston, by way of interjection, said—"No; unless he re-planted." What does that mean? Mr. Kingston said that the grower could come in under this particular provision provided he was ready to dig up his roots and re-plant.

Senator FRASER.—That would be a nice state of things!

Senator DAWSON.—I should say that it would be! These ideas can only arise in the mind of the Minister because of his misconception of the true position. He was evidently arguing from the stand-point that the growing of sugar is like the growing of wheat, where you plough and harrow your land every year and sow a fresh crop; whereas, as a matter of fact, the sugar-grower gets on an average six crops from one planting.

Senator CHARLESTON.—It is evidently a profitable business.

Senator DAWSON.—I have always said that I could not see, considering the price of cane and the amount paid for labour in the growth of it, how it was that the grower of cane by white labour required such a terrific amount of assistance to keep his head above water, while the wheat-grower can do without it. I have never expressed any other opinion, and do not desire to do so now. But I should like to draw the attention of the Postmaster-General to this point—that when he himself was in Queensland during the last recess, he and Mr. Kingston on the public platform both expressed the pleasure they felt at the success of the white Australia policy as formulated by the Government and adopted by this Parliament. They quoted from every platform where they spoke, the amount of money that had been paid in rebates, and they gave the number of farmers in different districts who had accepted the white Australia policy. They quoted with approval and joy the number who intended to come in under this policy. I know that it gave them much satisfaction to know that the small sugar farmers in Queensland looked upon the Federal Government as their saviour during the severe trouble that came over them last year, when this very rebate or bonus saved many of them from dire distress. It was a pleasant thing for the Government to know that they had been able to do so much good, and that they had created a feeling of gratitude in the minds of the sugar growers. The members of the Government made the most of this point at the meetings they addressed. They were entitled to do so. But did the sugar growers get that benefit under such provisions as are contained in this Bill? No; nearly every one of the farmers who came in under the policy we have inaugurated had planted his cane with kanaka labour. If, in the first instance it had been stipulated that no sugar grower in Queensland could reap any benefit from the white Australia policy if his cane had been planted by black labour, there would be very few farmers claiming rebate in Queensland or New South Wales. The very provision which the Government are trying to induce the Senate to accept in this Bill would have defeated their own policy, and would have prevented them from having the extreme pleasure of receiving the heartfelt gratitude of the sugar growers of Queensland. I sincerely trust that honorable senators will defeat the Government proposal in this respect, and accord their support to Senator Glassey's amendment, which meets the case fairly and squarely. Before sitting down I would point out two little matters in connexion with this subject, which should appeal to those honorable senators who are wavering upon the question, or who have not made up their minds one way or the other. Throughout the whole of this much debated issue of growing sugar cane successfully with white labour, many solutions have been offered, not the least of which—in fact I believe the one which should receive most acceptance—is that if you break up the large plantations and convert them into small sugar farms, managed by families, you will go a long way towards settling the labour difficulty and promoting the successful growth of sugar by white labour. That view has been held for many years. Arrangements were made by the Queensland Government on several occasions to induce planters to give up their large holdings, which they did not work successfully, and convert them into small farms. With that object in view, the present Chief Justice of Queensland, when a member of the State Parliament, erected two central mills in the Mackay district as an experiment. The result was that he demonstrated to the holders of large plantations in that district that a small farmer, with an up-to-date mill, could produce sugar under conditions more favorable to those employed by him, while, at the same time, reaping a larger profit than under the old system. These two central mills led the way to the action of the Queensland Parliament in erecting central mills in different districts, and that action was supported both by Senator Drake and myself. The mills were erected in order to encourage the farmers to take up small farms, and thus subdivide the large plantations. But how will the Government proposal operate in regard to the large plantations? The Government provide in this Bill that if the kanaka has once touched the cane no bonus shall be given in respect of the sugar produced from it, no matter how many times the land may have changed hands, and irrespective of what the holdings may be. If the holder of a large plantation, believing firmly as many of them do, that white men cannot successfully grow sugar, hangs on to his coloured labour to the last, and a number of farmers then take up portions of his holding and proceed to grow sugar according to the policy of a white Australia, what will be the result? The very measure we are now discussing will not enable those farmers to obtain any portion of the bonus, because of the fact that the prior holder of their plantations has employed kanakas to plant the cane. That is not the way to encourage the cutting up of large plantations. We shall really put an obstacle in the way of the adoption of that

SOURCE.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator is presuming that the planted cane will go over with the farm?

Senator DAWSON.—Exactly. If that were not done we should have to go back to the ridiculous proposition of the Minister for Trade and Customs, that all cane grown by coloured labour shall be dug up and replanted. There are many farmers holding small plantations who assert that they cannot grow cane successfully without the aid of coloured labour, while there are many others who desire to give white labour a chance. But if a farmer who decides to grow sugar by white labour buys a farm from a man who has planted with black labour he will not be allowed a fair opportunity to test the true value of the policy of a white Australia, because of the fact that the previous holder employed kanaka labour in putting in the cane. I trust that honorable senators who, like Senator Downer, object to the Bill altogether, will realize that either the proposal submitted by the Government or one or other of the amendments suggested by Senator Glassey and Senator Millen must be accepted, and that it is well that we should wait until the Bill gets into Committee before determining which of these we should accept.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I should like to make a passing reference to the words which fell from the lips of Senator Dawson in regard to myself. It is true that when the Tariff was before the Senate I appealed to him to help us to save the machinery industry of Victoria.

Senator BARRETT.—And all that we obtained was a duty of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. instead of 10 per cent.

Senator STYLES.—Yes. The result was that instead of helping us to fix the duty at 25 per cent, as we desired, the honorable senator supported a reduction of the duty to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Senator DAWSON.—I was in favour of machinery coming in free.

Senator STYLES.—That is the way in which the honorable senator responded to my appeal. I did not meet him in the same spirit when the sugar duties were under consideration. I voted and spoke in favour of a duty of £6 per ton on imported sugar, which was equal to 50 per cent. of the cost of the article, so that I was a consistent protectionist throughout. I did not hesitate to support that measure of protection, although Senator Dawson failed to respond to what he has described as my eloquent appeal on behalf of the machinery manufacturers of Victoria. Much has been said about the proposed rebate to be allowed those who grow sugar by white labour. These people, however, have not been ruined by the adoption of the policy of a white Australia. They have not suffered as some of the manufacturers of Victoria have suffered by the reduction of our duties. I desire to know when a Bill will be introduced to recompense the Victorian manufacturers for the loss they have sustained?

Senator PEARCE.—They are able to export machinery to America.

Senator STYLES.—I am not referring specially to patented machinery. It is true that we are exporting patent machinery to South America, but it consists of a special line of harvesters invented in Victoria, whence most good things come. I believe that Senator Dawson is thoroughly conversant with the sugar question. He has opened my eyes this afternoon to the real position, and I begin to wonder whether this Bill is necessary. He has proved that white men can and will work in the cane-fields of Queensland, and he asserts that they can do any of the work that the coloured races can perform. That being so, let the planters employ white men or give up their cane-fields. Why should we give them any assistance of this kind?

Senator PULSFORD.—Is not the honorable senator a protectionist?

Senator STYLES.—I can readily account for the attitude adopted by honorable senators who come from New South Wales—a State which will receive the lion's share of the benefit to be conferred by this Bill. If I had not known something to the contrary, I should have thought that this Bill had been framed by the Government of New South Wales rather than by the Government of the Commonwealth. I can well understand the silence of the Government of New South Wales, and of the usually noisy Mr. Philp. They have seen this Bill, and are perfectly satisfied. Senator De Largie brought forward the question of Federal sentiment. That is a good old "gag" to trot out when you desire to obtain something from the people of certain States, and do not intend to give anything in return. It appears to me, however, that we must regard this matter from the stand-point of the hard cash to be paid by those who derive no direct benefit from the Australian sugar industry.

Senator PEARCE.—Western Australia does not derive any benefit from it.

Senator STYLES.—I know that is so, but when one looks into the figures which have been furnished by the Postmaster-General he is somewhat staggered. It is proposed that the excise duty shall be distributed upon a consumption basis, while the rebate shall be paid per capita. Let me show what a nice little arrangement this is: Under this proposition New South Wales, which has grown sugar by white labour for the last 30 years, will receive, on the consumption basis, £168,000 excise in respect of the 56,000 tons of Australian sugar she consumes, while she will contribute £21,642 towards the rebate. Contrast these figures with the treatment to be meted out to Victoria. Victoria will receive £24,000 for the 8,000 tons of Australian sugar she consumes, while she will pay on a population basis £18,786 towards the rebate.

Senator PEARCE.—What will she derive through the Customs duty on sugar?

Senator STYLES.—I shall come to that point presently. In other words, New South Wales on a consumption basis—and I am not grumbling at that—will receive seven times the amount that Victoria obtains in the form of the excise duty.

Senator PULSFORD.—The honorable senator means that the consumers pay that amount?

Senator STYLES.—I admit that such is the case, but the money passes through the Commonwealth Department into the coffers of New South Wales. That State will receive seven times the amount that Victoria will obtain, while she will pay only £3,000 more by way of rebate—that is the Government proposition.

Senator DRAKE.—Where does the honorable senator find those figures?

Senator STYLES.—I have taken them from the printed statement circulated by the Postmaster-General. On page 3 of that statement it is set forth that £168,000 is the estimated excise duty received by New Wales on 56,000 tons of Australian sugar consumed there during the year 1902-3. It seems to me that Senator De Largie hit the nail upon the head, although he did so perhaps unwittingly, when he said that the consumption basis was the proper one to adopt. No doubt it is. If we are going to allocate the excise to each State in proportion to the consumption of Australian-grown sugar—and this is a fair way of looking at the matter—why should we not allocate the rebate according to the consumption of white Australian-grown sugar in each State? The position would then be altered.

Senator DRAKE.—It would alter from year to year.

Senator STYLES.—It must alter under the Government proposal. Surely the Postmaster-General does not suppose that the quantities which have been named are fixed?

Senator DRAKE.—They will vary very slightly.

Senator STYLES.—We are told that the Government scheme will work out all right by-and-by; that when sufficient sugar is produced in New South Wales and Queensland to supply the requirements of Australia, there will be no bother. It is natural to suppose that there will not be any trouble, because all the other States will do the paying under this arrangement; but are we to wait until that time arrives for fair play and justice to be dealt out to us? I have never heard of a more outrageous or unfair division. It is natural that honorable senators from New South Wales should smile, for that State will enjoy the lion's share of the benefit of this proposal. Let us see what it is according to Senator De Largie's idea. These amounts should be arrived at on a consumption basis. That seems fair, and I believe that it would be the correct thing to do, seeing that the Constitution provides that the customs and excise duties shall be allocated in that way. The excise calculated in that way would amount for New South Wales to £168,000, but that State would have to pay £44,400 rebate, instead of £21,642 as proposed by this Bill. In the case of Victoria the excise on the consumption basis would amount to £24,000, and the rebate upon the same basis would be only £2,500, instead of £18,786 as proposed under this Bill. Now as to the duty. Of course we get the import duty, but who pays it? It is the people of Victoria, South Australia, or Tasmania, as the case may be. In the case of Victoria the import duty is paid into the Treasury here, but the money does not come out of the pockets of the people of Western Australia; it comes out of the pockets of the people of Victoria.

Senator PEARCE.—Who pays the excise duty in New South Wales? Is it not the people?

Senator STYLES.—The people pay the excise duty, but it is their share of the rebate under this Bill that I am complaining about.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—And in any case the excise duty is much less than the import duty.

Senator STYLES.—It is only one-half of the import duty. There is another consideration which presents itself to a protectionist mind, and which I have not heard touched upon yet. According to the tables with which we have been supplied, we in Victoria must have sent something like £700,000 out of this State for sugar; while in Queensland they have kept the whole of their money paid for sugar in the State, and have also received money from other States. It is a matter for consideration whether this is not worth thinking about. Was it not one of the arguments in support of the imposition of a duty of £6 per ton upon sugar that we should keep the money in the country and give employment to our own people? Queensland and New South Wales have had all the advantage of the arrangement, whilst the people of Victoria have sent £700,000 to Mauritius or some other country for sugar, and they had to pay £6 per ton duty upon it when it was landed here. That has been the position of all the States with the exception of New South Wales and Queensland. In those States the difference between the revenue and excise duty, some £5 per ton, has acted as a protective duty. I do not grumble at that, nor, as one of the representatives of Victoria, do I grumble at contributing something towards the rebate proposed, but I do complain of the method of payment, and of the amount which it is proposed that each State shall pay. New South Wales produced 85 per cent. of her total production of sugar by white labour, and we are told that she has been doing that for many years, yet she has to pay between £21,000 and £22,000, or only £3,000 more than Victoria, and, whilst we only get £24,000 from the excise duty, New South Wales gets £168,000. I shall certainly oppose the proposed distribution of the rebate, and, speaking on behalf of my own State, I think the proposal of the Bill is most outrageous and unjust. The condition of things in South Australia is worse than in Victoria, only in a smaller way. In the case of South Australia there is an absolute loss, because that State got no excise duty at all. I should like to put two or three figures before the Senate to show the relative position of the States if different ways of dealing with the question were adopted. On a population basis, after paying the rebate, New South Wales would have £76,968 and on a consumption basis £123,600, whilst under this Bill it is proposed that she shall have £146,358 after paying her share of the rebate, as set forth in the schedule of this Bill. On a population basis Victoria would have £67,133, that is net, after deducting the rebate from the excise. On a consumption basis she would have only £21,500. I think that is the fairest way, but under this Bill she would only have £5,214. The difference between the excise she would receive on the 8,000 tons of Australian sugar she consumed and her share of the rebate would only be £5,214, whilst the difference in the case of New South Wales would be £146,358. I do not know that I can add anything to what I have already said.

Senator MCGREGOR. — The honorable senator has made out a very good one-sided case.

Senator STYLES.—If the case I have made out is half as much one-sided as the proposal in the schedule to this Bill, I must have done something out of the ordinary run of things. It appears to me that New South Wales, employing nearly all white labour, is to take the lion's share of the rebate, or as much as all the other States put together, and to do about one-third of the paying. New South Wales will under this proposal pay £22,000, which is about 36 per cent. of the total amount. That will be her share of the paying under this Bill. I complain that it is not fair to adopt the consumption basis in the apportionment of the excise to each State, and then to adopt a population basis for the allocation of the rebate. Either a population or a consumption basis should be adopted for both. I am not complaining that Victoria should be asked to pay a share of the rebate, but I say that she should not be penalized in the way proposed by the Government. If the schedule attached to this Bill was not prepared by the New South Wales Ministers it ought to have been.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—I wish only to say a very few words on this question, which has been very fully debated. I should like to remind honorable senators that this Bill has nothing to do with the question of a white Australia or with the question of free-trade and protection, both of which have been dragged into the debate. In the course of the remarks I may make I may tread upon the corns of some of the white Australia gentlemen, but it will be absolutely unintentional, because I have done something in my own State towards securing a white Australia, and at a conference held in Sydney I did what I could to induce the whole of the States to adopt uniform legislation to keep out black and yellow labour. I was one of those who assisted in that matter, though whether I took a principal part in it or not I do not know. My views on the question of a white Australia have been known for a great many years, and I have never seen occasion to alter them. But this not a question of a white Australia at all; it is a question of common fairness. We decided last year that we would give a rebate of £2 per ton to those persons who grew sugar from either beet-root or sugar-cane by white labour. That is absolutely the law in this country; but we are asked by the present Bill to say that we shall not give the amount by way of rebate, but as a bonus, which is quite a different thing, and which causes the incidence of the tax to fall differently upon the different States, and inflicts, as I contend, hardship and unfairness upon certain of the States, whilst it benefits unmistakably the State of New South Wales, which really ought not to get any benefit under the circumstances, to a greater extent than any other State in the Commonwealth, not even excepting Queensland. But what has taken place in the interval? Not only did we pass a law last session that this money should be paid by way of rebate, but we are under a Constitution which distinctly provides in the latter part of section 89 that—

The Commonwealth shall pay to each State, month by month, the balance in favour of the State.

What has taken place in the interval? The Government have not only disregarded the law we passed last year with regard to the rebate, but they have acted in contravention of the Constitution, and instead of dividing this money month by month as directed by the Constitution, they have kept it in a suspense account. They have, I believe, given a small portion away to Queensland, and a little to another State, but they have practically kept the whole of the amount in a suspense account, and they now ask us to deal with it in a manner quite different to that upon which we agreed last year. They are further proposing to make this Bill retrospective in its character, so as to deal with something which we settled last year. The Ministry have absolutely defied the Constitution, and they are asking us by this Bill to say—"We shall not call you to account for it, but we shall agree that what you did was right in the peculiar circumstances of the case." I contend that they did wrong all through the piece. They had no right to keep that money in the suspense account when the Constitution distinctly directs that they shall divide it month by month among the various States.

Senator PEARCE.—How long have they kept it?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It does not matter how long. It would not matter if they had kept it only for a day; but, as a matter of fact, they have kept it for many months.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Each State got the one-fourth the Constitution allowed it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I say that they had no right to do what they have done in defiance of the wishes of Parliament, as expressed in the legislation of last session, and in defiance of the Constitution.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Did not each State get the one-fourth which had to be returned?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Senator McGregor does not appear to understand the position. Section 89 of the Constitution provides that—

Until the imposition of uniform duties of customs—

1. The Commonwealth shall credit to each State the revenues collected therein by the Commonwealth.

It is then provided that the Commonwealth shall debit to each State the expenditure therein of the Commonwealth incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance as at the time of transfer of any Department transferred from the States to the Commonwealth. And then under paragraph (b) it is provided that the Commonwealth shall debit to each State—

The proportion of the State according to the number of its people in the other expenditure of the Commonwealth.

Having debited all the expenditure, the Commonwealth has then to give the balance to the various States, and the question of the one-fourth has nothing to do with this matter. The one-fourth is the limit of the amount that the Commonwealth can expend, and has nothing whatever to do with this case. Then the third sub-section of section 89 provides—

The Commonwealth shall pay to each State month by month the balance (if any) in favour of the State.

I have stated the position we are in, and I say that many Ministries have been turned out of office for less playing with the Constitution than that. Yet the Government coolly ask us to make this Bill retrospective. They should have divided the money received from excise amongst the States month by month long before this. If they considered that the arrangement for the payment of a rebate was not a good one, and that a bonus would be a more just and a fairer principle to adopt, they could then have introduced this Bill, but they should certainly not have made it retrospective. I have stated the position we have to face. If the Senate should consider a bonus fairer than a rebate it should say to the Ministry—"You ought to have acted in accordance with our instructions and the directions of the Constitution Act, and we shall not, under any circumstances, make this Bill retrospective in its operations." Coming to the question of a bonus or a rebate, the growth of sugar is confined to two States. The article having been grown in these States, and the expenditure having been incurred there for their benefit, surely the States which gain the benefit to be derived from the bonus ought to bear the burden? Why should we who gain no benefit pay under this bonus system? Look at the position of South Australia, which consumes no Australian-grown sugar. This year it will have to pay to the Treasurer £5,000 odd on account of this alteration of the law under which we understood that the rebate was to be paid by the States that grew or consumed the article.

We had not the slightest anticipation that South Australia would be called upon this year to provide this money. The Bill is wrong in principle. The Government ought not to have paid into a suspense account the moneys which they received from the excise duty. The Bill should not be retrospective in its effects. Let me now refer to two or three statements which have been made. When honorable senators are on their feet, they let out things which, I believe in their saner moments, they would not utter. I suppose that there is no man who would more strongly support this bonus system than Senator Dawson. Arguing not so much in favour of the bonus or rebate, as against certain statements by Senator Neild, and also on other points which are not affected by the Bill, he had finally to admit that they did not want the bonus. He considered that the poor wheat-growers in the various States who were struggling against adverse circumstances, and who were so hard up, were just as much entitled to the bonus as the sugar-growers in Queensland or New South Wales. Here we have an admission—made in an unguarded moment, I believe—that a bonus is not wanted for the sugar-growers. Senator De Largie has said that there is no difference between a rebate and a bonus. Evidently he has not read the excellent return which has been laid upon the table.

Senator PEARCE.—He said that there was a difference; and he added that he could not understand those who said there was no difference.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am very sorry if I misunderstood the honorable senator. It is the contention of Senator Millen, who is supported to a very considerable extent by Senator Dawson, that we should not fix a time when cane-growers can no longer come under the operation of the Bill—that it should operate right on from the 28th February until it is exhausted. Their argument is certainly a very strong one. In the first place it is that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the growers who have come under the Sugar Rebate Act originally planted their cane with black labour, and were precisely in the same position as those who may come under the law next year, having, in the meantime, dispensed with black labour. Their cane was, however, originally planted with black labour. They argue—and it appears to be a very strong argument—that if we give the bonus to the men who happen to come under the Bill on or before the 28th February last, we ought, in common fairness and justice, to give it to men who are willing to dispense with black labour after that date. If the object is to encourage the production of cane by white labour, we certainly ought to give the bonus to men who, through being under contract with kanakas, are not in a position to get rid of them until the lapse of twelve months, or eighteen months, or two years, or more. I do not know what the Minister will be able to say in reply to the case which has been put, but it appears to me to be absolutely unanswerable. I cannot see any difference between one class of planters and the other. If the object is to encourage the substitution of white labour for black labour, we ought to allow one class to come under the Act precisely as we allow others, because there is practically no difference in their position, having all planted their cane with black labour. If we do not take that course the planters who have been under contract with kanakas will not try to employ white labour in any circumstances, and the bigger estates will be worked instead of being cut up into small lots which a man could manage with the assistance of his family and a few labourers. On big estates the planters will undoubtedly use kanaka labour as long as they can. If the object is to extend the growth of sugar by white labour, and to ease down the trouble that may be occasioned at a time when nearly the whole of the kanakas will have to leave, we ought to simply say that the cultivation of the land for twelve months by white labour shall enable the planter to get the bonus or rebate, whichever may be agreed upon. In the interests of South Australia and Victoria, as well as for other reasons, I hold that it would be a great deal better to adhere to the rebate system than to adopt this entirely new system in the very peculiar circumstances in which it is proposed. I can hardly forgive the Ministry for a change of front for which I can see no possible reason, unless it is to placate a number of persons in the mother State.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—Like Senator Playford, I feel that senators representing other States than Queensland and New South Wales can hardly view the measure with any great satisfaction, seeing that the payments which originally came from two States have to be debited against all the States. I suppose that the Government have good reasons for proposing this change. They have certainly given us a very good reason in this respect, that had Queensland kept out of the Commonwealth, probably she would not have interfered for some years with this labour question. We must remember that it was the votes of other States as well as the votes of Queensland which practically settled the question, and that had the representatives of Queensland in the Senate and the other House all been opposed to the adoption of the white labour principle on the cane-fields, the representatives of the other States would have got up an agitation until it was carried out. In Western Australia we were all pledged to the abolition of kanaka labour in Queensland, irrespective of what its desire in that respect might be. We must feel that, to a certain extent, we have brought this trouble on our own head. The people of Western Australia brought it on themselves by demanding the use of white labour on the cane-fields.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Why should it be a bonus instead of a rebate? Queensland will lose £862 under the bonus system.

Senator PEARCE.—Because the rebate would fall primarily upon two States. Queensland will not sacrifice so much under the bonus system as she did under the rebate system. The honorable senator took some exception to the remark of Senator Dawson that he did not look upon the measure as being entirely necessary. He pointed out that, when he compared the wheat-growing industry with the sugar-growing industry, the latter seemed to him to be the more profitable; and Senator Playford seemed to draw the inference that the proposed bonus is not necessary.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Senator Dawson was on his free-trade fad at that particular moment.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator must remember—and I feel sure that Senator Dawson intended to point out—that those of us who voted for the rebate last session, as we shall vote for the bonus this session, did not vote in that way because we thought it was necessary in order to establish the sugar industry in Australia. If it were a question of establishing a new industry I should not vote for this Bill, because I believe that it could be established without the assistance of a bonus. It was established in Queensland, and worked under certain conditions—the presence and the use of a large quantity of cheap servile labour. The Commonwealth comes into existence, and at one fell swoop it cuts off vested interests, and says to the planters—“Within a certain number of years we shall abolish the use of cheap servile labour, and compel you to fall back on white, independent, and reliable labour. We recognise that in the displacement of coloured labour by white labour there will be an interference with the vested interests which have been recognised by the law of your State. In order to ease the blow, and compensate them for their vested interest in cheap labour, we propose to grant them a bonus. That is how I regard this Bill, and how I am sure Senator Dawson looks upon it. My view is borne out by the fact that the Bill is only a temporary measure, and that the rebate of excise originally proposed was only a temporary expedient intended to last till 1907, running concurrently with the Pacific Islands Labourers Act, which provides that the kanakas shall be deported from Queensland before that date.

Senator CHARLESTON.—We have kept them out of other States without such provisions.

Senator PEARCE.—In the State of Western Australia we have not required to keep out any kanakas by legislation. No attempts have been made to implant the sugar industry in the State I represent, but if any planters like to try the experiment in the north-western portion, they will be able to take advantage of the provisions of this Bill.

Senator FRASER.—The sugar industry in Queensland was started without any of these advantages.

Senator PEARCE.—The planters had the right to employ cheap servile labour, and also had the advantage of £5 per ton import duty on sugar. I take exception to some of the remarks that fell from Senator De Largie, but on quite different grounds from those which appeal to Senator Playford. I understood Senator De Largie to say that some people believe that a bonus and a rebate of excise are synonymous, and that he supported that statement. I am of opinion that they are synonymous in operation, but different in their incidence. The incidence of taxation is all we are altering now.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—Making the wrong man pay!

Senator PEARCE.—Whether it is the right or the wrong man who pays is a matter of opinion; but at any rate attempts were made to compel the consumers of sugar grown by white labour to pay for the transition from black labour to white in Queensland. Now we propose to make the whole population pay, whether they consume white-grown or black-grown sugar. That is the position.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—What the honorable senator calls payment, I call allowance.

Senator PEARCE.—It is a matter of payment so far as the taxpayer is concerned. The difference is that instead of those States which consume Australian grown sugar bearing the burden, the whole Commonwealth has to bear it, irrespective of the incidence of consumption. One statement which I should like to make in connexion with this Bill is that it does not seem to have struck the Queensland senators that this new arrangement places them in a more disadvantageous position than the old one did in one respect. This is a question which, undoubtedly, will be raised in 1907, with regard to the continuance of this kind of legislation. Under the old system, the parties to the continuance of the present policy—the parties who are most interested—were New South Wales and Queensland. But under this Bill greater opposition will be aroused to the continuance of the bonus, because of the fact that the whole of the States of the Commonwealth will have to bear the burden. This fact must ultimately affect the question of the continuance of the bonus, and must, therefore, be of great interest to Queensland. The representatives of Queensland should bear in mind that they are bringing that opposition into the scale against them whenever they come—if they do come—to ask for the continuance of the bonus. They will now have the interest of four States against them, whereas under the former arrangement no such opposition would have been aroused. Now, I wish to say a word with regard to Senator Glassey's amendment. That amendment is a natural consequence of such a Bill as this. But there is one contingency which will arise that I should like Senator Glassey to contemplate. We will suppose that a grower is registered as being entitled to the bonus, because for twelve months he has cultivated his plantation with white labour. We will suppose, also, that this is the last year for the profitable cultivation of his rattoons, and that next year he contemplates replanting. It may easily happen that the grower may say—"For twelve months I will cultivate with white labour, and so secure the bonus," but when it came to replanting, he might use coloured labour after having secured the bonus on his last crop. Then, having replanted with coloured labour, he might work his plantation for twelve months with white labour and claim the bonus again. Then he might say, "I will dispense with my kanakas or Hindoos" because he need not necessarily employ kanakas; he could employ Hindoos without having any agreement with them—and might register for the bonus for the next twelve months. It seems to me that we might allow a man by that clever bit of manœuvring to take advantage of this bonus for two years, at any rate, out of the four years, although he employed coloured labour during part of that time. That is a contingency which we should provide against. We should insert some such provision as that, after having registered as a grower by white labour, if a planter goes back to black labour, he should be disqualified from the bonus.

Senator FRASER.—If he returns to black labour, because he cannot help himself—what then?

Senator PEARCE.—I should say that, under no circumstances, if a planter returns to black labour, should he be allowed to secure the bonus.

Senator GLASSEY.—I do not want to encourage the perpetuation of coloured labour.

Senator PEARCE.—It seems to me that there are two years to be looked after—the year when the grower simply cultivates and gathers his crop, and the year when he not only cultivates and gathers, but plants his crop. It seems to be reasonable to suppose that in the year when the planter plants, harvests, and cultivates his crop he must employ far more labour than in the year when he cultivates and harvests his crop.

Senator STEWART.—He does not plant and harvest in the one year.

Senator PEARCE.—I know that. Sometimes, as we have been told, one planting will last for six years. The planter plants in one year, and harvests his crop, say, after twelve months.

Senator DAWSON.—Sometimes.

Senator STEWART.—Generally after about eighteen months.

Senator PEARCE.—Even if he could not harvest in the same year as he planted, what could he do? He could say—"In this year I have to plant and shall not get a crop. Therefore I shall not be able to obtain the bonus and shall go in for coloured labour." He will not harvest any crop that year, and therefore there is no inducement to plant with white labour. Indeed, the inducement would be to plant with coloured labour. Having done so, the planter could continue for twelve or six months, as the case might be, employing Hindoos or Chinamen, whom he would not need to engage under agreements.

Senator STEWART.—He would be disqualified for two years.

Senator PEARCE.—Having harvested the last crop which could profitably be taken off his plants, he could say—"I shall have to plant fresh cane this year, and will engage Hindoos or Chinese to do the planting." Having done so, he could dispense with them and employ white men. Having employed the white men for twelve months, he would be eligible for the bonus. I contend that we should provide against such a contingency by a clause to the effect that if, after having registered as a grower by white labour, a planter subsequently reverts to the employment of coloured labour, so defeating the meaning of this Bill, he shall be disqualified from the further benefits of the bonus. I would suggest either that a new sub-clause be added to Senator Glassey's amendment, or a fresh clause inserted altogether. Some such words as the following might be used:—

Provided that such bonus shall not be paid in the case of a grower who having previously registered under the Excise Act of 1901, or under this Act, as a grower of sugar by white labour, subsequently becomes a grower of sugar by black labour.

Perhaps Senator Glassey will look into the matter, with a view of seeing whether it is desirable to add my proposal to his amendment. I now want to take exception to the remark of Senator Playford, deprecating any allusion to the policy of a white Australia in dealing with this question.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have settled that question.

Senator PEARCE.—I thought so, too; but seeing that Senator Walker, Senator Dobson, and Senator Fraser last week in speaking on this Bill made a rigorous onalaught on the policy of a white Australia, and Senator Playford did not protest, but remained silent, it was only appropriate that a reply should be made.

Senator FRASER.—I merely said that the kanakas had nothing to do with the question of a white Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Fraser made a most vigorous attack on the principle of the white Australia policy, as contained in this Bill, and other senators who have supported this kind of legislation had the right to rebut that attack.

Senator FRASER.—It is a blunder from beginning to end.

Senator PEARCE.—No more thorough rebuttal has been made of any statement than that made by Senator Dawson this afternoon. If his speech needed amplification—and it does not—I have here an affidavit signed by Mr. Taylor bearing out Senator Dawson's statement. Mr. Taylor has published it in the newspaper from which Senator Dawson has quoted. He refers to specific statements in the pamphlet which has been alluded to. I put it to honorable senators who care to look into the matter that this pamphlet bears upon the face of it the imprint of a trick to defeat the white Australia policy. It was a most audacious trick. I am surprised that any reputable firm, or that the president and secretary of any association, should have identified themselves with such a pamphlet as this when they knew that the means of refuting it were available in Queensland.

Senator WALKER.—Why did Mr. Taylor sign that letter?

Senator PEARCE.—I will read to the honorable senator what Mr. Taylor says—

I asked for the deposit money, £100. I was sure of getting the money for the cane, and I asked the general manager for the deposit. He said he had nothing to do with it; it was in the hands of the directors. This was after I had seen Buchanan. I went and saw the acting secretary, Mr. Crees, and he said the directors had left it all to the chairman of directors, Mr. Buchanan. I asked Buchanan for the deposit money, and he asked me to sign a document, to the effect that we had not fulfilled the conditions, and that we were getting it by the grace of the directors. I saw the men and they would not sign it. They were shareholders with me in the deposit. I went back and told Buchanan, and said that I did not understand the word "grace." The men advised me to go to Cairns and get advice on the matter. I got advice, and from Cairns sent a letter. When I came back to the Mossman the men were all in a hurry to get away, and told me to make the best arrangements I could, but get the money. I then saw Buchanan, and he told me the conditions were the same as before. He wrote out a letter for me to copy, and I objected to several things, which he modified. One thing was "by the grace of the directors." He substituted "favour" for it. There was something else, but I cannot remember what it was. That is what I meant by "a much worse letter." I asked him what he wanted the letter for, and he said he only wanted to justify himself with the shareholders; he wanted to make no use of it whatever outside the mill company. He said he would make no political use of it. He told me that distinctly. There is no doubt about this. I am quite positive. I would not have signed the letter of 8th January had I known it was to be put in a pamphlet and issued.

I ask honorable senators to bear that fact in mind.

Senator FRASER.—When was that statement made?

Senator PEARCE.—No date is given.

Senator FRASER.—If it was written only a week ago it would be impossible for a reply to be available now.

Senator DAWSON.—I assure the honorable senator that the paper from which Senator Pearce is reading is the Minister for Trade and Customs' copy of the affidavit.

Senator PEARCE.—The affidavit continues—

The only thing I was sorry for was that I did not have the £100 myself, and I would have chanced it.

I ask honorable senators to consider the situation in which this man was placed. He was representing a syndicate consisting of some twenty men, who were all clamouring for their money in order that they might get away and add to their earnings elsewhere. With the distinct pledge of the manager of the company that he only wanted this letter to justify himself with the shareholders, and that he would not make any political use of it, is it a matter for surprise that this man, in order to avoid any trouble, should have signed that letter?

Senator WALKER.—Does the honorable senator justify the signing of such a letter?

Senator PEARCE.—I say that having regard to these distinct pledges and to the pressure of his fellow workmen who desired to get away, Taylor was quite justified in signing the letter. He continues in his affidavit—

I never wrote that letter of my own free will. He (Buchanan) is not telling the truth in saying I did. He wrote the letter and I copied it, and he said, "Those are the terms, and the terms only."

He goes on to say* that—

During the time the men were cutting, I think they averaged about 7s. 2d. per day.

In order to show how worthy of credence the pamphlet issued by the Mossman Mill Company is, let me draw the attention of honorable senators to the statement made at page 4, that—

The average number of tons of cane delivered per day up to the 3rd September, was 35·78, and, with the combined gang, 52·8, although in the latter case the contractor agreed to deliver not less than 70 tons per day.

There is a very ingenious piece of sophistry associated with that statement. The agreement for the delivery of 70 tons per day was not made until after the 3rd September, but that fact is not mentioned. The statement which appears in the affidavit, and in the letter to the press, that the gang was supplying more than 40 tons per day, is borne out by the Customs returns. Surely it cannot be contended that this man, who was a sub-contractor to a planter, had means of faking the Customs returns so as to cause them to agree with his own figures? The returns show that 250 tons a week were delivered, and that gives an average of over 40 tons a day.

Senator DAWSON.—That took place after the contractor had received a letter requesting him to decrease the daily supply.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes. The trap was very well laid. First of all, Taylor and his party were told that they must cut 40 tons a day. They did so. Then they were instructed to supply 70 tons a day. They carried out that instruction, and suddenly they received an intimation that they were to reduce the supply to 40 tons daily. Taylor then recognised that he would not require so many hands, and after he had allowed a number of his men to scatter to the four winds of the earth, he was called upon within a few days to increase his output. Was that fair treatment?

Senator FRASER.—If that statement is true it was very unfair.

Senator PEARCE.—I was satisfied that the honorable senator's spirit of fair play would lead him to look upon the matter in that light.

Senator FRASER.—I repeat that if the statement is true the treatment was very unfair.

Senator PEARCE.—Taylor has made an affidavit, and if the statements contained in it are untrue he can be prosecuted for perjury. He has also written a similar letter to the Queensland press. The other side have also had an opportunity to refute his statements in the public press, but they have not attempted to avail themselves of either course. I should like to point out that this incident occurred in connexion with a mill further north than any other in Australia.

Senator WALKER.—There used to be a mill further north than the Mossman mill.

Senator PEARCE.—It is now further north than is any other mill in Australia, and 6,000 tons of sugar-cane were cut and harvested there by white men in the heat of December. We might well say that this mill, instead of being called the Mossman Sugar Mill, should be known as the "Mossman Lie Factory." Such a term would properly designate its character. Before I resume my seat, I wish briefly to refer to what I regard as a very amusing paragraph which has appeared in the press relative to the rebate on sugar. I find that those who desire to make out a case for Federal extravagance, have set down the amount expended by way of rebate on sugar as new expenditure by the Commonwealth. In that way they have sought to bolster up their case for Federal extravagance. That statement has been made not only in the press, but by the Law Institute, while the supporters of what is known as "the reform movement" have made the same assertion on the public platform. In order to make up a total expenditure of £600,000 per annum, these people have included the £60,000, which represents the rebate on sugar, in their estimate.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I intend to support the second reading of this measure, for I think it is absolutely necessary in order that a very serious misconception may be removed. When the Bill providing for the rebate on sugar grown by white labour was passed, I was under the impression—and I believe that impression was shared by every member of the Parliament—that the cost of cleansing Australia of the kanaka and other coloured labour was to be borne, pro rata, by the people of Australia. It was discovered subsequently, however, that under the Act, that distribution could not be made. I must say that I was very seriously disappointed with the anti-Federal speeches which were delivered this afternoon in the Senate. It would almost appear as if the Federal spirit having leapt up to the heavens, so to speak, has collapsed, and is crawling wretchedly across the surface of the earth. We have no Federal spirit. We have honorable senator after honorable senator declaiming against the States which they represent being called upon to pay any portion of the cost of a white Australia.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They do not represent the opinions of their constituents.

Senator STEWART.—That belief is the only pleasing feature in connexion with the debate. I do not believe that those who spoke in that strain represented the views of their constituents. Does Senator Downer tell me that the people of South Australia object to pay their share of this cleansing operation?

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—The honorable senator may gather from my speech what they object to.

Senator STEWART.—It is one of those matters which I cannot understand. It is impossible to believe that the people of Australia, having come deliberately to the decision that the kanakas must be sent out of the country at any cost, and having made up their minds to bear a portion of that cost, are now anxious to avail themselves of some legal quibble, and crawl out of their responsibility. I was especially surprised to hear Senator Playford express the hope that this Bill would not be made retrospective. Does the honorable senator desire that Queensland and New South Wales shall pay the whole cost of this policy? If Port Adelaide were being strongly fortified, it would be just as reasonable for me to contend that South Australia should pay the whole cost of such fortification. The bringing about of a white Australia is just as much a national concern, and the cost of it ought to be borne by the whole community, just as is the defence of South Australia. That is the position I wish to submit. Australia is not to be made white in the interests of Queensland. This policy is to be carried out in the interests of the whole continent, and that being the case, the entire continent should be called upon to bear a share of the expense. I was very sorry to hear Senator Pearce give expression, in a faint way, to the anti-Federal spirit. He said that the people of Queensland might find in the end that this Bill would injuriously affect the industry, if the proposal were made to extend the period during which the bonus would be paid. That is a matter for the future. Let us do justice for the present, though the heavens fall. The consumption of sugar has really nothing to do with this question. What we are dealing with is the cleansing of this continent from the kanaka. The whole continent has taken the business in hand, and the whole of the people of Australia should pay the cost. I intend to support the amendment of which notice has been given by Senator Glassey, for I think it is much fairer than the proposal in the Bill. In view of the fact that our object is to bring about a white Australia I think we ought to give every encouragement to all those engaged in the industry to employ white labour. That is why I intend to support Senator Glassey's amendment. I trust that the majority of the Senate will also vote for it, because I believe that in that way we shall be promoting the interests of a white Australia much more powerfully than if we agree to the Bill as it stands. I intended to have something to say with regard to the utterances of Senator Neild and Senator Fraser, but after the complete and scathing exposure by Senator Dawson, I think that will be altogether unnecessary. There is, however, one matter to which Senator Neild referred, upon which I should like to say a word or two. The honorable senator told us that in some of the districts cane-growers were qualifying for the rebate by sweating their wives and children, by working them in the cane-fields. I met a number of women in the Mackay district, who, before the rebate was ever heard of, were in the habit of working in the cane-fields, and with their children also. We know that it would be impossible to carry on any kind of agriculture in Australia without the aid of women and children. If we are to pass laws prohibiting women and children from engaging in agricultural occupations, so far as this continent is concerned, we might as well shut up shop. For my part, I believe that work in the fields is a great deal better for the physical health, the comfort and happiness of women and children, than is employment in the slums of the city. I would much rather see them working in cane-fields, orchards, conducting poultry farms and operations of that character, than I would see them behind counters, sitting at sewing machines, or in the various occupations which they follow in our large cities. I may tell the honorable and gallant Senator Lt.-Col. Neild that, at one place in the Mackay district, where Mr. Bamford and I spoke, a unique honour was conferred upon us. After we had addressed a meeting, one lady got up and moved a vote of thanks to us. In doing so, she said that she had cut, planted, and loaded cane, and that she had also trashed cane. I can assure honorable senators that she did not look a bit the worse for it. I was a good deal surprised to hear that, but I was very much more surprised when another lady got up to second the motion, and explained that she also had cut, loaded and trashed cane, and had hoed it. I was assured that a number of women in the Mackay district had done this work, and some of them had gone into the fields, I am proud to say, rather than employ kanakas. I do not think it is desirable to continue the discussion on this Bill. I am very glad that the Government have introduced it, but I hope that the Postmaster-General, as the representative of the Government, will agree to the modification to be proposed by Senator Glassey, which, I think, is in the right direction.

Senator MACFARLANE (Tasmania).—I do not intend to say very much upon this Bill. It seems to me that the necessity for it arises from mal-administration. It was clearly understood when the Excise Tariff Bill was before us that the receipts from the excise duties were to go to the State of consumption. We are told now that the results arising from that arrangement are unfair. Another difficulty that is raised is that sugar grown by white labour cannot be traced to cane grown by white labour. That I think is the contention of the Postmaster-General.

Senator DRAKE.—That is so.

Senator MACFARLANE.—I have heard that, but I am not sure that it has been proved. If that is proved, a necessity for this Bill will have been shown, but, if that cannot be proved, there is no necessity for this measure. There is, I admit, a difficulty in paying £2 per ton to the cultivator of the cane before the excise duty of £3 per ton is collected upon the sugar. That is a difficulty which must be surmounted by administration if this Bill is not passed. Some honorable senators are complaining of a loss of revenue to their States. In my opinion that arises in the first place from the free-trade policy within the Commonwealth, and secondly, from the retention of the excise. I do not approve of this Bill, and I hardly think it is necessary; but I do recognise that the Commonwealth Parliament having passed the Alien Immigration Restriction Act and the Pacific Island Labourers Act, in equity the cost involved should be borne by the Commonwealth, and should be borne proportionately by the States of the Commonwealth. In my opinion nothing could be fairer than the proposal that the payment should be on the population basis. I do not agree with Senator Walker that this is richly deserved assistance to the State of New South Wales. I do not think the assistance is richly deserved, nor do I quite agree with other honorable senators that there ought to be any differential treatment of Queensland and New South Wales. That I think is impossible.

Senator DOBSON.—It is impossible under this Bill, but it would be just if we could carry it out.

Senator MACFARLANE.—It would be just, but I think it is impossible to give effect to it. At present I do not feel justified in voting against the second reading of this Bill, because I am not certain that the Postmaster-General is in error in the statement he makes as to the difficulty of tracing sugar grown by white labour. I hope that in Committee the bonus proposed will be reduced, as I think it is too high. I think also that we should provide that twelve months' cultivation by white labour should be sufficient to secure the bonus to the grower. Those are amendments which might well be made upon the Bill.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—Some of the Ministerial chickens are coming home to roost, and they do not appear to be very pretty birds. I listened this afternoon with a good deal of interest, and a sarcastic sort of pleasure, to statements made by eminent lights in the protectionist world, like Senators Playford, Styles, and two or three others, who do not seem to be quite happy. They are very much like a cockroach that has been spinning round on a pin, the pin being protection. They have got into trouble, and they do not know how to get out of it. Three or four years ago, before federation was consummated, the question of the finances of federation engaged a good deal of attention, and I pointed out the desirability of putting a good round tax on a limited number of items, so that the great mass of the trade of the Commonwealth might go free. I mentioned sugar as one of the few articles which might fairly be subjected to a heavy tax, and I said that a tax of £7 per ton would produce a sum considerably exceeding £1,000,000, and that with a Customs duty of £7 and an excise duty of £7 per ton, every penny paid by the people would go into the Treasury, and be there for the use of the Commonwealth. No sooner had I made these statements than Sir Edmund Barton went through the Commonwealth addressing various public meetings, and, with every hair on end, he represented what a fearful thing it was that I was proposing—that there should be a tax of £7 per ton on the poor people who consume sugar. He tried to terrify them with the immensity of the exaction which I proposed to make on the pockets of the consuming public; but he did not say I proposed that every penny the people paid should go into the Treasury. What did the Government do when they submitted their Tariff? They proposed not a duty of £7 a ton on sugar, but a duty of £6 a ton, the bulk of which ultimately—sooner or later—was to go anywhere but into the Treasury. That was the position, and to-day we have evidence that this is bringing about already a state of affairs which is causing State to rise against State, and interest against interest, and creating anything but that brotherly sort of feeling which, I think, we senators wherever we sit, desire to exist. Something has been said about the price of sugar. I believe there are some honorable senators who hold that, although a duty of £6 has been imposed, the people are not paying £6 a ton extra. I believe it has been openly said by several speakers in this debate that although the Customs duty is £6 a ton, yet sugar is not really enhanced in price thereby.

Senator HIGGS.—Not to the consumer.

Senator PULSFORD.—I am very glad to hear that statement made. It appears to me that a reasonable business man, or even a political man, before he committed himself to a statement such as that, would wish to know a little about the prices of sugar, not only in Australia, but in the great market of the world, and find out whether, if our Tariff had not been in existence, sugar would have been cheaper than it has been. The market which I suppose above all others controls the price of sugar in the world and indicates its value everywhere is the market for German beet sugar. In the year 1900, 88 per cent. beet sugar, which is used mainly for refining, was worth f.o.b. at Hamburg 10s. 11d. a cwt., and last year it fell to 6s. 4d. a cwt.; a fall of 4s. 7d. a cwt., or more than £4 a ton, which placed sugar at a price unprecedented in the history of the world. What is known as first mark granulated sugar—like that which we are accustomed to use of Australian make—was selling in 1900 at 12s. 6d. a cwt., and last year it fell in Hamburg to 7s. 9d. a cwt.; a fall of no less than 4s. 9d. a cwt. or £4 15s. a ton. If £4 be put on to a price and £3 be taken off, the addition made by the increase in price in these States can be very easily hidden. Again, in Queensland the price of sugar had been uninfluenced by any Tariff up to the date of the imposition of the Federal Tariff, but a reference to Queensland prices will show that the mere rumour of the imposition of a duty caused a gradual rise, and that, on the day after the Tariff was brought into the House of Representatives, the price was raised an additional amount, bringing it up to more than it had been two or three weeks before, of £6 a ton.

Senator HIGGS.—Is that wholesale or retail?

Senator PULSFORD.—I am dealing with wholesale prices, and everybody, I suppose, has common sense to know that wholesale prices are ultimately the basis of retail prices. If sugar rises in value £5 per ton, the retailers do not take half-a-penny a pound off their price. That is not the course of business, and it is of no use to discuss things which do not and cannot take place. A little confusion in the price of sugar may arise in one way. There has been a great deal of sugar imported into Victoria owing to the shortage in Australia, and in the port of Melbourne the Colonial Sugar Company are apt to cut their prices, in consequence of the competition with the imported article, rather more than they do in some of the other ports; but this does not amount to much. In Tasmania the duty had been £6 a ton, and it is £6 a ton to-day. In South Australia the duty had been £3 a ton, and it is double that amount now. It appears to me that the comparative failure of the Queensland crop has proved more or less of a blessing to several of the State Treasuries, and in this way has demonstrated the folly of the system which has been adopted by the Commonwealth Government. I should like to draw attention to their original estimates of the yield from the sugar duties, and it will at once, I think, make it quite evident, even to Senator Playford, that the position he has taken up is not a justifiable one. In their original estimate the Government anticipated that South Australia would receive £35,000 from the excise duty, and £12,000 from the Customs duty. Instead of £47,000 it has received this year £97,000, being more than double the original estimate. Surely in the circumstances it is rather an unseemly thing for that State to object to a settlement of this rebate payment on the new plan proposed. There has been a disposition on the part of some honorable senators rather to pooh-pooh New South Wales, and to suggest that it is wanting to get this, that, and the other, and not to pay anything. I find that in New South Wales, which has consumed 67,000 tons of sugar, the consumers have used so much sugar this year that they will have paid £400,000. That is a very large sum; but the State Treasury has only been enriched so far to the amount of £234,000, and if the rebate be deducted from that it will only then have received £188,000. Surely that is a very extraordinary state of things. Senator Styles is an adept in the art of putting things. I dare say that some honorable senators, especially Scotchmen, read some years ago a very interesting article by a Scotchman, under the nom de plume of A.K.H.B., on "the Art of Putting Things"—of making things look in a very different light from what they ought to do. There is the art of putting a thing, and there is also the plain way of putting a thing. I would suggest that Senator Styles has been adopting the A.K.H.B. style, and practising the art of putting things. I prefer to tell a plain tale. The plain record would be not a division, and a sort of comical comment on the duty which has been collected under one head, the excise, but the aggregate that has been collected from customs and excise duties. If my honorable friend had done that, all the force would have been taken out of the comments he made; in fact, he would not have been able to make them. I will take the case of Victoria. I should be very glad, if Senator Best is going to speak upon the matter, if he will look at the figures I am about to quote. I have turned up the original papers which the Government laid upon the table in introducing the Tariff. They estimated that Victoria would receive in sugar excise £114,000 and from imported sugar £60,000, or a total of £174,000. Owing to the comparative failure of the Queensland sugar crop, Queensland sugar has not been available for consumption in Victoria. Victoria, being geographically comparatively remote from Queensland, has been a large centre for importing sugar. The result is that Victoria has received a very large amount of revenue—more than £300,000.

Senator STYLES.—Who paid it?

Senator PULSFORD.—Who paid it? Have I not been showing that the consumers pay the duty? The consumers of Victoria paid £300,000 odd, and that sum has gone into the Victorian Treasury. If there had not been a protective duty in operation, hundreds of thousands of pounds more would have been secured. Cannot Senator Styles see that he is only furthering my argument? It appears that Victoria has received £130,000 more than in ordinary years the Federal Government anticipated that she would receive. I might say that that is a state of things which ought not to be allowed; that I claimed as a citizen of Australia that New South Wales should share in this large revenue obtained by Victoria. Mind, New South Wales would be sharing if the whole revenues of Australia were pooled; but they are not pooled. The consequence has been that Victoria has received this money, and New South Wales has not. That is obvious. New South Wales is paying a great deal more than any other State, because her population is greater. But it is Victoria that is getting this large sum of money into her Treasury. Whilst we say that we do not ask for a penny of the amount of £3 extra per ton from customs, we do say that it is a very fair and proper thing that the £2 per ton bonus which is going to be given for retiring the kanaka from Australia shall be divided over Australia. I am a little bit surprised that Senator Drake did not draw attention to the fact which I am going to mention. The original estimate laid upon the table of the Senate by the Government showed that they themselves anticipated that this charge would be distributed over Australia. But it was not so distributed. What have the Government done? It is their duty to administer the law; but I submit that it is also the duty of the Government to break the law—to break any law—when justice requires it.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—That is rather dangerous.

Senator PULSFORD.—I admit that it is dangerous. This is a reason why, in selecting men to fill high offices of State, we ought to be very careful. There never was a Ministry formed that had not, some time or other, to take into consideration the question whether circumstances had not arisen requiring the suspension of a certain law. None can deny that under the Constitution the excise collected ought to have been distributed. But circumstances arose which made it necessary that the Government, if they were to carry out the intention of Parliament, should hold the money until Parliament itself could say what was to be done. In breaking the law in that way the Government obeyed the law more than they would have done by paying the money away in the manner in which certain people say they should have done. I do not wish to debate the measure any further. I am prepared to support the second reading, and in Committee to assist in improving the Bill in one or two directions in which it is capable of improvement.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—My honorable friend who has just resumed his seat, or some extraordinary reason or other seemed to take what he called a “sarcastic elight” in observing what he regarded as some agitation on the Ministerial side of the Senate in connexion with the measure before us. I fear he is indebted to his fertile imagination for such an idea. Then — “still harping on my daughter”—he proceeded to give us the benefit of a learned dissertation on the fiscal question in general, and on the sophistries of free-trade; after which he went on—it was totally irrelevant, I admit—to indicate to us what were the prognostications of the Government some time ago as regards revenue. He wound up by inviting the Senate, by reason of the fact that some other States have benefited so far as revenue is concerned by the results of the legislation which has been passed, to believe that New South Wales had a right to share in the customs revenue of Victoria.

Senator PULSFORD.—Oh, no!

Senator BEST.—That is what my honorable friend said.

Senator PULSFORD.—Excuse me. The honorable and learned senator has misunderstood me. What I said was that the Victorian Government had received a great deal of money, but that I did not make any claim to the increased revenue that had come to them from imported sugar. With the protective incidence of the tax I did not interfere. I said that if we were so foolish as to agree to it we must bear the consequences. But I said that the £2 per ton rebate or bonus was a different matter; that it affected all Australia, and that it ought to be divided on a population basis.

Senator BEST.—Of course, I gladly accept what the honorable senator says by way of explanation. I can only assure him that I noted the fact that he stated that Victoria was sufficiently fortunate in having secured an additional revenue of £130,000 beyond what was originally anticipated, and then he went on to say that he claimed the right to share in that revenue on behalf of New South Wales. That is what honorable senators on this side of the chamber understood him to say; but I am obliged to accept the explanation of the honorable senator, and of course I gladly do so. But while he quotes as against Victoria this additional revenue that she has been receiving, he fails altogether to recognise certain facts—first of all that there is within the limits of New South Wales one of the most important and valuable industries of that State; an industry involving the employment of a large number of people, and a considerable expenditure of money; an industry which we should gladly welcome in our midst under the same conditions; and that that industry receives the benefit of the excise on sugar. The honorable senator, following out his system of logic, says that because Victoria has received an additional revenue of £130,000, or, in other words, because she has received a total revenue of £300,000, therefore her people should pay an additional £19,000 to New South Wales, that being the amount, upon a population basis, which, according to the Bill before us, Victoria will be called upon to pay. This Bill, as we have learnt, meets with the hearty and cordial support of my honorable friend.

Senator PULSFORD.—That £19,000 is not additional to the £300,000; it is out of that sum.

Senator BEST.—Both sums would come out of the pockets of the Victorian people. I am just showing the reasoning of my honorable friend. He argues that because we have received £130,000 in revenue from sugar more than was originally anticipated, we should therefore be called upon, against our inclination and our will, to disgorge £19,000 upon the extraordinary basis set out in this Bill.

Senator PULSFORD.—That is not correct; I did not say that “therefore” Victoria should do so.

Senator BEST.—That is the honorable senator's reasoning as I understood it. Were I to attempt to follow him in other directions, and particularly in regard to his remarks as to the effects of the protectionist Tariff recently passed—in alluding to which he seemed to take such a “sarcastic delight”—he should take an equally “sarcastic delight” in the fact that numerous industries have been established under this very Tariff in New South Wales; and further “sarcastic delight” in the fact that in leading lines New South Wales is now paying considerably less for her goods than she paid under the former free-trade Tariff of that State. These are matters to which I would ask him to turn his attention for the purpose of enjoying “sarcastic delight” if he desires to amuse himself in that way. Turning from the irrelevant matter into which Senator Pulsford's speech has drawn me, I should like to make a remark or two in connexion with the measure before us. The matter has been put with such force by my honorable and learned friend Senator Downer and my honorable friend Senator Styles, and the contrasts presented in the figures quoted by Senator Styles have been so striking, that I would ask the Government to consider the extraordinarily contorted results which the Bill is likely to bring about. In this connexion I admit at once the unfairness of introducing the question of a white Australia.

Senator GLASSEY.—That is the whole point.

Senator BEST.—According to my view, the question of a white Australia had no right to be introduced into the present discussion.

Senator DAWSON.—Who introduced the white Australia question into the debate?

Senator BEST.—I do not pause to inquire, but I am certain that the honorable senator had much to say upon the point.

Senator DAWSON.—In reply.

Senator BEST.—That may be so. The point I desire to make is that according to the figures which have been circulated, the white Australia policy costs the Commonwealth something like £60,000 per annum; that represents the rebate of £2 per ton on something like 30,000 tons of sugar grown by white labour in the Commonwealth. I consider the purchase of a white Australia is cheap at that price. I most cordially support that policy in every way; but the only question now involved is the basis or method upon which this £60,000 is to be paid. That is the question to which we are obliged, I submit, to confine our attention. The point is whether that amount should be paid by the States upon a consumption or a population basis. I venture to think that we may be equally earnest for a white Australia, and hold that it should be paid for by either process. When a measure of this kind comes before us we are justified in inquiring how it will affect the States we represent, and anything we can bring before the Senate, as the States' House, with a view of indicating that the operation of the Bill will have an unjust incidence so far as the several States are concerned, should be stated in order that that possibility may be avoided. I admit that the question is very complicated, and that the figures which have been circulated require the most careful and thoughtful consideration. In my judgment the only fair system upon which to pay this £60,000 is the consumption basis. According to the Constitution the excise itself is payable upon a consumption basis. The Constitution therefore lays down the principle upon which assessments of this kind should be made, in addition to which the present law provides for the payment of the rebates on the same principle. We have the advantage of a statement showing the distribution of the rebate upon a population basis as well as upon the basis of consumption. On the consumption basis, New South Wales, which possesses this enormous industry, receives by way of revenue an excise of £168,000 per annum. Upon the same basis—the rebate, of course, being actually part and parcel of the excise—she pays £44,400 by way of rebate. In this Bill, however, it is proposed that she should be relieved of a portion of what she calls a burden, and that she should be called upon to pay upon a population basis a rebate of only £21,642 per annum, notwithstanding that she is the producer of this sugar, and that the rebate is in connexion with the very excise which forms part and parcel of her revenue. In other words, by this Bill we are asked to make New South Wales a present of £22,758. It is true that in Victoria we receive £282,000 by way of duty on imported sugar, and that we consume only some 1,250 tons of sugar produced by white labour in the Commonwealth.

Senator MCGREGOR.—8,000 tons.

Senator BEST.—I admit that we consume a total of 8,000 tons of Australian sugar grown by black and white labour, but the Australian sugar grown by white labour which we consume is only 1,250 tons. Upon a consumption basis, therefore, we should only pay £2,500; but, according to the terms of this Bill, we are actually asked to pay an additional sum of £16,286. In other words, we are called upon to pay, upon a population basis, a total sum of £18,786. Victoria, who benefits least from this policy—although I do not strongly urge that point—is called upon to make this enormous contribution. It has been suggested that the distribution of the cost of the policy of a white Australia upon a population basis is the fairer one, and it has been urged that Victoria receives this additional revenue amounting to something like £130,000 in excess of former estimates. But the duty on imported sugar, from which we have received the sum of £282,000, is, to all intents and purposes, a revenue one, and protectionists never contend that revenue duties are not paid by the consumers. The people of Victoria have already paid £6 per ton customs duty for their sugar, amounting to this sum of £282,000 out of their own pockets, and they are also to be penalized to the further extent of £16,286. Because we have paid a duty of £6 per ton for our sugar in Victoria, while Queensland has paid only £3 per ton on some and £1 per ton on other sugar consumed by her, is it not rather unfair to say to the people of this State—“You did not consume Australian sugar, grown by white labour, but you should have done so; and although you have already paid £282,000 on imported sugar, we are going to penalize you to this additional extent.” I admit that, year after year, the revenue received from this particular item will vary, and may, perhaps, be more or less accidental. I agree that, two or three years hence, we may receive large consignments of Australian sugar grown by white labour, and, in that event, we shall be quite prepared to pay the rebate of £2 per ton upon it. But, in moving the second reading of the Bill the Postmaster-General stated that, if the production was equal to the whole consumption of sugar in Australia, these matters would be equitably adjusted, and that there could be no ground of complaint if we adopted the consumption basis.

Senator DRAKE.—I said “probably.”

Senator BEST.—Let us for a moment consider that contingency. As the result of the consummation of the policy of a white Australia—and I hope that we shall have it at an early date—Victoria would receive the excise of £3 per ton upon the 55,000 tons per annum consumed by her, or, in other words, a sum of £165,000 would be the excise that we should collect.

Senator DRAKE.—Does the honorable and learned member reckon £3 per ton upon the whole quantity?

Senator BEST.—I am assuming, by way of illustration, that the white Australian policy has been duly consummated, and that, as the result, the people of Victoria are being supplied with Australian sugar produced by white labour to the extent of our present consumption of 55,000 tons per annum. In that event we should collect an excise of £3 per ton. Upon a consumption basis, however, we should pay £2 per ton, or a total rebate of £110,000, while on the basis proposed in the Bill we should only rebate something like £18,786, or, say, £19,000.

Senator DRAKE.—It would be more than that.

Senator BEST.—It might be a little more than that, but I am only speaking generally for the purpose of argument. I would ask the Postmaster-General whether he, or any other honorable senator representing Queensland, would then insist upon the payment of this rebate according to a population basis.

Senator STYLES.—No fear.

Senator BEST.—They would do nothing of the kind.

Senator DRAKE.—The Bill substitutes the population basis, and a bonus is to be given.

Senator BEST.—I am aware of that fact; but it is because of the existing exigencies that the Bill has been introduced. I am seeking to show how ultimately it must seriously work against Queensland, and the unreasonableness therefore of a suggestion of this kind. I am urging with Senator Styles that the payment of the rebate upon a consumption basis would be fair and reasonable. I desire to show how, with the development of the policy of a white Australia, the payment of the rebate upon a consumption basis will prove to be fair and reasonable, and far better than the contorted suggestion that the contribution towards the rebate shall be upon the basis of population. The whole scheme of the Bill is unreasonable and unfair. I would moreover urge this aspect of the question: That the policy of a white Australia was really not devised for the benefit of New South Wales. It was Queensland that we had in view.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We had Australia in view.

Senator BEST.—I admit that from the broader national aspect we had Australia in view, but we had immediately in our minds the kanakas who were labouring, not in Victoria nor New South Wales, but in Queensland. The point I am making is that we are asked by this Bill to present New South Wales with something like £22,000 a year as the result of a measure which was never devised for the benefit of that State, but was chiefly passed for the benefit of Queensland. That we should be called upon to make a contribution of that kind is most unreasonable. There are one or two of these figures which I find some little difficulty in following. I notice that in the memorandum circulated by the Treasurer of the Commonwealth regarding the payment of the rebate allowed upon Australian sugar grown by white labour, the net collections of excise, after deduction of drawbacks, is stated as £224,428? Then I learn that the rebates already paid amount to £61,267.

Senator DRAKE.—That is the bonus to the growers, paid as they bring their cane to the mill.

Senator BEST.—Then I have misunderstood the matter to some extent. I understood that there had been no payments of rebate, but that the money was being accumulated in a trust fund. I observe, therefore, now that the balance in the trust fund, after providing for the deduction of £61,267, is £163,161. That sum is at present held by the Treasurer, but it should have been distributed in the ordinary course month by month, in accordance with the terms of the Constitution. I agree with Senator Downer that it is most unfair that this legislation should have a retrospective effect, and that the sum of £163,161 at present held by the Treasurer, and to which the States are entitled upon a consumption basis, should be distributed upon the basis of population.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator did not know before that it was not paid over?

Senator BEST.—I did not know of it until I saw it stated in the papers circulated.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator thought it had been paid over in rebates?

Senator BEST.—We were justified in thinking that it had been distributed amongst the States according to the terms of the Constitution and the existing law.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—It is no excuse for stealing that you have not been found out.

Senator BEST.—I am not unduly complaining, but I am urging that this sum of £163,161 which the Treasurer has at present in hand and which he seeks to make retrospectively subject to the terms of this Bill, ought not to be distributed in that way, but should be distributed upon the consumption basis. Even if the principle of this Bill is to apply to the distribution of the bonus in the future, I do not think that we have any right to confiscate this money in the way now suggested.

Senator DRAKE.—The Treasurer gives his reasons for not having distributed the fund.

Senator BEST.—That is so; but at the same time he indicates his desire that it should be distributed according to the population basis under the scheme now propounded in the Bill.

Senator DRAKE.—Because the other arrangement was unworkable.

Senator BEST.—I think that would be very unreasonable, indeed. If the Senate sees fit to pass the second reading of this measure, in all fairness it should not be permitted to operate upon the sum of £163,161 to which I have referred.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania).—I must admit that I find myself at a loss to follow Senator Best throughout his argument. I cannot understand how the honorable and learned senator should deprecate in such strong terms as he has used, the introduction into the debate upon the second reading of this Bill of the policy of a white Australia.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It is the basis of it.

Senator KEATING.—It is the basis of it. The attitude which Senator Best then assumed was well expressed by an interjection from Senator Pulsford that the honorable senator wished to have the play of "Hamlet" without the Prince of Denmark. The whole basis of this legislation rests upon the policy affirmed by the people of Australia at the first Federal elections, which has been adopted by the Federal Legislature, and which we are giving effect to now by endeavouring to establish within the confines of the Commonwealth, a white Australia. I did hope that honorable senators, in applying themselves to the consideration of this Bill, would be motivated by the consideration of the policy for the whole of Australia, and not for any one particular State, whether it be the particular State which an honorable senator represents or not. We have established by our legislation that in the sugar industry of the Commonwealth there shall not be employed after a certain time a certain class of labour. Those who opposed the establishment of that policy told us most eloquently that it would be impossible for the sugar industry to stand in Australia unless those who had vested interests in it were enabled to employ the cheap South Pacific labour. As a set off against that, in arranging the sugar duties we put an import duty of £6 per ton upon sugar coming into the Commonwealth, we put an excise duty of £3 per ton upon all sugar grown or produced within the Commonwealth, and to mark the distinction between sugar produced by white labour and sugar produced by black labour, it was arranged that those who employed only white labour in the production of sugar should get from the £3 per ton excise duty which they were called upon to pay a return of £2 per ton. I wish to know if honorable senators think that was a desirable principle to establish—the remission of £2 out of the £3 per ton excise upon Australian sugar grown only by white labour? If honorable senators admit that that policy and principle are correct the whole question resolves itself into this—Who is to bear the brunt? Who is to pay the £2 per ton? Experience since this policy was adopted has shown that, in the case of three of the States only, Queensland, New South Wales, and Tasmania, does the consumption of Australian grown sugar, and particularly that grown by white labour, bear any considerable proportion to the consumption of sugar imported to Australia from abroad? If we continue as we have done in the past, to debit to each State the amount of rebate of duty in proportion to the amount of Australian sugar grown by white labour which it consumes, it seems to me that we shall really be putting upon the Treasuries of those States a burden that they should not be asked to shoulder, whilst the other States of the Commonwealth, whose people are quite content to discard Australian grown sugar for sugar imported from Java, China, Mauritius, or elsewhere, and to receive the full Customs duty of £6 per ton upon it, are allowed to go scot-free. Senator Best in addressing himself to this question has said that he is in favour of the policy of a white Australia.

Senator MCGREGOR.—So long as it does not cost Victoria anything.

Senator KEATING.—Exactly. I was just coming to that. The honorable and learned senator has told us that he approves of the policy of a white Australia, and he says that the cost is something like £60,000 per annum in the remission of the sugar duties to maintain that policy. He has further said that he considers it cheap at the money. No doubt, he does, but he does not desire that Victoria should contribute one penny towards that £60,000.

Senator BEST.—That is not so.

Senator KEATING.—It is a beautiful thing to hear honorable senators, representing a State, coming here to indorse these principles as mere abstract principles, and saying, "A white Australia, yes, I approve of it. I think it is cheap at the money, we having nothing to pay for it." But are the people of Queensland, New South Wales, and Tasmania alone to bear the cost of the establishment of a white Australia? Surely very few people at the time of the first Federal elections, when the question of a white Australia was put before them, expected that we were going to carry out this policy without any additional cost to themselves, without any loss to their Treasury, or without any additional taxation being imposed upon them? Is it not regarded as a general and well established principle in fiscalism, particularly by those who adhere to the protectionist cult, that the imposition of duties is designed with the object of enabling us to employ within our own territory labour at a rate of wage which is much higher than the rate of wage adopted in the competing countries beyond and outside us? Precisely on the same principle we act in endeavouring to establish a white Australia, to secure that those interested in the sugar industry, and who more particularly were instrumental in the introduction of kanakas should be induced to employ none but white labour. We necessarily considered that, in order that they may be placed on fair terms of competition, even within the confines of the Commonwealth, with those who would send their sugar here grown by the cheap labour of other countries—the people of the Commonwealth must submit to a certain amount of taxation in the nature of protection. We have given, in fact, to growers of sugar in Australia who utilize black labour a protection of £3 per ton, the difference between the excise and the import duties. We have given to the grower of sugar in Australia who employs only white labour a protection of £5 per ton. That is the position. We have a differential protection of £3 per ton on sugar grown by black labour, and £5 per ton on sugar grown by white labour. Are people who prefer to consume Australian grown sugar to bear the cost of their consumption of the local commodity in preference to the imported article? Senator Best talked of penalizing the State of Victoria, but the honorable and learned senator would penalize those true protectionists in Australia who are prepared to consume Australian grown sugar produced by white labour in preference to the importations from the black labour countries abroad. We have been told by the honorable and learned senator, and by a colleague from his own State, that it is a foolish argument to adduce that, because Victoria, by reason of her large importations of foreign sugar has received a considerable amount of revenue into her Treasury, she should be asked to pay out of that revenue the sum of £22,000 to New South Wales. That is rather a disingenuous argument. Why it should be considered that Victoria, particularly, will pay out of her Treasury the sum that New South Wales will gain by the change of policy—from a distribution upon a consumption basis to distribution on a population basis—I am at a loss to imagine. The whole of the States will contribute to this in proportion to population, so that it will not be a case of Victoria, and Victoria alone, paying out of her revenue from sugar the whole of the sum which is to go into the Treasury of New South Wales!

Senator STYLES.—Why not divide the excise on the population basis also? If you pool one why not pool the other?

Senator KEATING.—The honorable senator knows very well that the excise duties are credited to the State in which the excisable article is consumed.

Senator STYLES.—Yes; under the Act.

Senator KEATING.—If 80,000 tons of sugar were produced in Queensland during the year, and if excise duty were paid on the 80,000 tons, and ultimately 12,000 tons of that quantity went into Victoria, the excise duty paid upon the 12,000 tons in Queensland would, in accordance with the Inter-State adjustment arrangement, be credited to Victoria and debited to Queensland. The principle that we are now going upon is this: That the representatives of the various States—not of Queensland alone—have decided that, after a certain date, there shall be no employment of a certain class of labour in this industry, and, as a set off against any disadvantage which would accrue to the cane-growers, we have adopted the differential protective system. Having done that as part and parcel of the one policy, I consider that we should adjust the cost amongst the States on the same principles which guided them in affirming and establishing the policy. Another thing to which Senator Best has referred is that in Victoria, and in other States, there has been, according to the return, a very small consumption of Australian grown sugar of any kind. We have to remember that it is a return of the approximate production of sugar in Australia in the year 1902-3. I hope that at a very early date we shall see a greater output of sugar in New South Wales and Queensland, that we may even see the production of sugar in other States, and that we shall endeavour as early as possible to see that the production of sugar overtakes the Australian consumption. And when that time comes about—and the whole of the circumstances will tend to the achievement of that result—these figures so far as they go will be of very little value as a guide for the adjustment of the cost of this policy even upon a consumption basis. I do not think that we can take the figures supplied by the Treasurer for that particular period as a criterion of what will be the event in the years to come. With an import duty of £6 a ton and considering the bonus or rebate an excise duty of £1 a ton on white-grown sugar, there should be a considerable impetus given to the production of white-grown sugar. With the £3 per ton protection which is given to black-grown sugar, there should be, at any rate during that period when it will still be permissible for the planters to employ black labour, a considerable impetus given to the production of black-grown sugar. Under these circumstances we may reasonably hope that the production of Australian sugar will tend, as the years go by, and in the very near future, to overtake the consumption. Therefore, as suggested by the Postmaster-General in his speech, it would be only fair to assume that very few of the difficulties which now beset some of those who do not find themselves in accord with the policy of the Bill would crop up. We have affirmed this policy as an Australian matter, and considering that the bonus represents the cost of the policy, and that no objection has been raised so far as I know to the granting of a remission of duty to those who employ white labour, we ought to adjust that cost amongst the people of the whole Commonwealth as a national obligation, and not to particularly penalize the Treasuries of the States in which a preference is shown for the consumption of the local commodity. I certainly hope that the Bill will pass its second reading.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I must confess that this measure has caused me a great deal of thought. I do not mean to pretend that it is not surrounded by a good many difficulties. Notwithstanding what has been said, one is inclined to look at the question from the State point of view. I have been asking myself first, how the Bill would affect Victoria from that stand-point; and secondly, what should be done in the interests of the whole people of Australia? The Senate is the States House, and the question of States rights crops up to some extent. It is, therefore, all the more difficult for any one to make up his mind. I certainly am not in favour of one part of the Bill. But taking the measure as a whole, I think it ought to receive my support. I intend to vote for the second reading, and, if possible, to alter its provisions in a certain direction. The debate has ranged over a very wide area. The question of the Tariff, as well as the policy of a white Australia, has been introduced. I am one of those who thought it was almost impossible to ignore those two elements in considering the question of a bonus on white-grown sugar. What did we do when we had the Excise Tariff Bill before us? We made a certain discrimination. Having regard to the peculiar circumstances in which Australia was placed, and to the limitations we had imposed upon the employment of black labour, we recognised that something had to be done. The question of a white Australia also came into play. Very early in our career we adopted, I think very wisely, the principle that in future Australia should be kept for the white race. Those two elements entered into the discussion on that occasion, and we tried to do what we thought was fair and just. The only State which appealed to my mind then, as it does to-day, was Queensland. It deserves consideration, because it is really the only State which has been affected very largely by our legislation. When we are asked to change the rebate to a bonus, I am confronted with the fact that, under the Constitution, we cannot make any difference as between State and State. I have to consider whether I should not vote for the Bill as it stands, or whether, if I take the rebate as the solution of the difficulty, I should inflict an injustice upon the very State which I have always thought should receive some assistance from this Parliament. Although it may not be a popular thing to vote £18,000 as proposed by the Bill, yet desiring to do justice to Queensland, and holding that it alone should not shoulder the white man's burden, I am compelled, distasteful though it may be from the State point of view, to vote for the measure.

Senator BEST.—That does not affect the question at all. The Bill makes a difference of less than £900 to Queensland.

Senator BARRETT.—Whichever way we look at the question there are inequalities. If I take the tables which have been presented for our guidance I find that, on a population basis, there are inequalities existing. And if I take the consumption basis

I find that there are inequalities also existing in that direction. No better plan than the one embodied in the Bill has been presented. Many States which have had to import sugar, which they could not otherwise have obtained, have had a considerable increase of revenue. In my opinion, those States ought to be able to pay something in return for that revenue in the way which the Bill proposes. I am free to admit that this measure, as well as other legislation, will cause much disturbance during the first few years of the life of the Commonwealth. It has caused a disturbance in every State in the Union. I was sorry to hear the remark which Senator Dawson made this afternoon, with regard to the position that certain honorable senators have taken up in other matters. I do not think it can be said that those who believe in protection took a miserable attitude when we were discussing the Tariff. I disclaim any such intention. Wherever there was an industry to be fostered or established, I tried to do my best in that direction. But what did we find? The representatives of some States were prepared to get the utmost protection for particular industries in their States, and when we appealed to them about the duty on machinery, it became a question with them of 7 per cent. or 10 per cent. I hope that if ever that question is reopened, no matter how unpalatable it may be to the interests of their States, they will try to do the fair thing in the interests of the Australian people. By carrying out the principles of this Bill, we shall settle a great question. If it is ever re-opened we shall be able to say "the States have suffered from a pecuniary point of view, and therefore we are not prepared to go back upon what we have done." I say with Senator Best that if, at the price of £60,000, or even £100,000, we can settle the question of a white Australia, we have secured it very cheaply, even though it does involve some inequality to Victoria.

Senator STYLES.—No one grumbles at that amount.

Senator BARRETT. — The inequalities that have existed, and still exist, have, as I have shown, been brought about by the abnormal conditions that have prevailed during the last twelve months. The next advantage which we secure is that under this Bill we not only establish the sugar industry, but make it a white man's industry. The people of Victoria have an interest in this, because, if we can expel the kanaka, the Japanese, the Chinaman, and other coloured aliens from the sugar industry of Queensland, labour upon the cane-fields may become very profitable indeed for men from the southern States who may go to Queensland. Thus, the policy we are now supporting will redound to the benefit of the people of Victoria. Putting aside the mere monetary disadvantages, and looking at the question from the broad Australian point of view, I consider that the two advantages that will follow from this policy prove that it is a wise one to adopt. The amendment foreshadowed by Senator Glassey is a very good one, and unless the Postmaster-General has good reasons to urge against it, I shall be prepared to support it—of course, with the further limitation foreshadowed by Senator Pearce, that after the bonus has once been paid to a planter, if he reverts to the employment of coloured labour in connexion with the growing of cane he shall not further participate in the bonus. The question has given me cause for a good deal of consideration, and the points raised have been of such a character, that at first I was not able to seize the salient features of the Bill; but after reviewing them with some care I consider that it is right to support the second reading.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—We have had a somewhat lengthy, but at the same time a fairly interesting and exhaustive debate upon this Bill. I need scarcely say that I shall give to its second reading my most hearty support. Here I join issue with my honorable and learned friend Senator Downer. I welcome the measure because I think it is just; he opposes it because he thinks that it is unnecessarily unjust. The Bill changes the system which has been adopted for the encouragement of the production of sugar by means of white labour—a policy which the bulk of the Members of Parliament thought was wise and just, and which, I am quite certain, will in the future prove to be a prudent and diplomatic policy. With that end in view, it was decided that those sugar planters who registered as growers of sugar by white labour, should receive a rebate of £2 a ton from the £3 per ton levied as excise. It has been proved, after experiment, that that method was unjust in operation, inasmuch as two States out of the six had to bear the whole of the burden, whilst the whole of the six benefited from the adoption of the white Australia policy. The States which have suffered are Queensland and New South Wales.

Senator KEATING.—And also Tasmania.

Senator GLASSEY.—Tasmania has suffered in another way. Hence the Government, in introducing this measure, propose that a bonus shall be paid instead of a rebate, and that the whole of Australia, which will benefit from the policy, shall pay for it. The speech of Senator Barrett is highly creditable to him. It shows that he views the matter not merely from a Victorian but from a broad comprehensive and Australian point of view. I was amused to hear the statement that this measure had no connexion with the white Australia policy. Senator Playford emphatically stated that it had no connexion with that policy, and Senator Best qualified that view by saying that the connexion existed only to a limited degree. In other words, those honorable senators welcome the adoption of the white Australia policy, provided it costs Victoria nothing!

Senator STYLES.—That is not so.

Senator GLASSEY.—Then I will say, provided it costs Victoria only a small amount.

Senator STYLES.—No; provided the rebate is fairly and justly apportioned on a consumption basis.

Senator GLASSEY.—The whole principle of our Constitution is that the taxation of the Commonwealth shall be in accordance with population.

Senator BEST.—Excise is on a consumption basis.

Senator GLASSEY.—So far as Victoria is concerned, the difference between the two methods of payment is as between £18,000 on a population basis and £2,500 on a consumption basis. The Victorian senators to whom I allude are not prepared to concede that Victoria shall pay the larger figure. That is rather a narrow view. There is about it a flavour of parochialism which ought to be deprecated by the Senate. Some very good measures have been passed at the instance of the present Government, and some of the best of them have been the series which had for their object the establishment of the principle of a white Australia. It is rather a narrow view for certain honorable senators to urge, that their States are not prepared to pay a little in order that this principle may be carried into effect at an early date. I need scarcely say that although I welcome the Bill, it is, in my opinion, defective. I have already indicated one of the defects by an amendment which I intend to propose. That amendment is not quite so full and comprehensive as it will be after the adoption of Senator Pearce's suggestion. Undoubtedly he put his finger on a weak spot. That is to say, if we carried my amendment in the form suggested, it would mean that if a planter who put in his sugar-cane with the aid of black labour, afterwards employed white labour, the bonus would have to be paid to him; but there is the possibility that after obtaining the bonus, the planter might revert to black labour for a term. I propose to obviate that danger by amending my amendment in such a way as, I think, will meet with the approbation of the majority of honorable senators. It has been contended, even during the present debate, that it is impossible to grow sugar to any great extent in Queensland, particularly in the northern portions of the State, without the aid of coloured labour. I have endeavoured on two or three occasions to combat that view, and I venture to say that I and other honorable senators have done so with a fair measure of success. I hold in my hand a return showing the number of those growers of cane who have registered under the present Act. It will be admitted, at any rate by all fair-minded senators, that, considering the short time the Act has been in force, it has been fairly successful. This return shows the names and addresses of persons in Queensland registered as white growers of sugar-cane, the acreage claimed by each, and also the amount of claim and rebate paid to each person for the year 1902-3. The Act has only been in force one year. I dare say that some obstacles may have been thrown in the way of its success by those who were opposed to the policy of abolishing coloured labour, otherwise the measure might have been more successful. For the purposes of this rebate Queensland may be divided into four parts. The extreme northern parts, including Cairns, about which we have heard so much from Senator Fraser and others, may be described as the No. 1 district. The No. 2 district includes Mackay; the No. 3 district embraces Bundaberg; while the No. 4 district comprises Maryborough, Logan, and the more southern parts. In the No. 1 or Cairns district, where we have been told that it is impossible to cultivate sugar successfully by means of white labour, 37 planters were registered in 1902 as growers of sugar cane by white labour. I should, mention, however, that this is the most recently settled district, and that there are consequently fewer growers there than in other parts of the State. The area under sugar cultivation was nearly 2,000 acres, and the rebate claimed and paid under the Act passed last year was £4,273 13s. 5d. I desire honorable senators to pay particular attention to the figures relating to the No. 2 or Mackay district, because it may be said that it is fairly far north, and is within the tropics. It has long been a settled part of Queensland, and embraces a wide area. In that district 519 growers were registered in 1902 as cultivators of sugar by means of white labour; the area worked by those persons was 12,333 acres, whilst the rebate claimed and paid under the Act was no less than £16,403 11s. 1d. It was stated by Senator Fraser, I think, that last year Queensland produced only a limited quantity of sugar. We may admit the correctness of that assertion; but it must be borne in mind that last season was, perhaps, one of the worst that was ever experienced in our State. The country had suffered from a protracted drought, with the result that the sugar districts, especially in the south and about Bundaberg, suffered materially. In that way we may account for the small amount of rebate which was claimed and paid. At the beginning of this year the area under sugar cultivation was something like 90,000 acres, whilst no less than 36,138 acres were registered as being cultivated and worked by means of white labour. Thus, nearly half the total acreage is now being worked by white men, whilst no less than 1,522 cultivators are registered under our existing law. I think that these figures afford some, if not a complete, answer to the statement that has been made from time to time in the Senate, that in Queensland, and especially in the tropical parts of that State, it is impossible to grow sugar except by the aid of coloured labour. If this policy is given a fair trial, and more particularly if the Government accept the amendment of which I have given notice, honorable senators who have opposed this legislation will come to the conclusion, two or three years hence, that the course pursued has been a wise one. If my amendment is carried, those who have worked their farms all the year round by means of white labour will have an opportunity of registering under the Act, irrespective of whether their cane was planted by black or white labour, while others will be able to register as their contracts with the kanakas expire. Without that amendment the Bill will be extremely defective, but with it, it will be found two or three years hence that the policy of carrying out the will of the people of Australia, so that this country shall be rid of the black labour which has tarnished the fair name of Australia for a considerable time, is a wise one. Those who have opposed this policy will then agree that their opposition has been in vain, and that the Government have acted prudently in carrying out the desires of the people in this respect. I wish to refer briefly to some statements which have been made by Senator Cameron, and particularly to certain allegations made by Senator Neild. It was asserted by Senator Neild that the sugar-growers had received a rebate on sugar grown by black labour, and not by white labour. That is a very bold and distinct statement. What evidence did Senator Neild adduce in support of it? I am bound to admit that the testimony which he brought forward must receive some attention. The honorable senator said that nominally the sugar on which rebate was paid was grown by white labour, but that in reality it was produced by coloured labour, and he asserted that he had received information to that effect from inspectors of cane-fields. That statement involves a very serious charge. Who are the inspectors of cane-fields? They are Government officials, paid to see that the policy of the people of Australia—administered by the Government as the executive authority—is duly observed. No rebate can be claimed in respect of Australian-grown sugar except on the production of certificates signed by these inspectors, setting forth that it has been produced by white labour. Yet Senator Neild asserts that he obtained this information from men whose certificates that this sugar had been grown by means of white labour were bound to be produced to, and accepted by, the Government before any demand for the rebate could be considered.

Senator DONSON.—The inspectors do not go to all the plantations to see whether black or white labour is being employed. They take the word of the planters.

Senator GLASSEY.—That statement must be considerably qualified.

Senator DOBSON.—It was made to me whilst I was in Queensland.

Senator GLASSEY.—So far as some of the cane-fields are concerned it is absolutely incorrect.

Senator DOBSON.—In certain cases it is absolutely correct. They cannot visit all the plantations.

Senator GLASSEY.—During an extensive tour which I made recently, I visited the Mossman and Cairns districts. I had a conversation with the inspector, and I can tell a tale wholly different from that narrated by Senator Neild in regard to the information in the possession of the inspectors. Indeed, I challenge the statement made by Senator Neild. I ask the Postmaster-General to ascertain from these inspectors how far it is borne out by the facts; whether they furnished the information given by the honorable senator, and if so, upon what grounds. If they supplied Senator Neild with that information, while at the same time they gave contrary information to the Government in order that the rebate might be obtained by the growers, the position is a very serious one. I am sorry that Senator Neild is not present. I have a very great regard for him, for in many respects he holds advanced views, but his assertion that the cane-field inspectors of Queensland have supplied him with this information demands some serious inquiry. I desire to allude to the statement made by Senator Downer that Queensland has no claim for compensation in respect of the adoption of the policy of a white Australia. This is not merely a Queensland matter. The question is one that materially affects the whole of the people of Australia. What would the people be prepared to give to root out the smelly holes of Little Bourke and Little Lonsdale streets? I confess that upon two or three occasions I have visited those places, accompanied by detectives and others, and that I have seen there more repulsive sights than I have witnessed even in San Francisco. The Chinese dens which exist there are to be found on a smaller scale in Cairns and Cooktown, and the question which we have to consider is how much the people are prepared to give in order to secure the carrying out of this prudent policy. Senator Downer, however, asserts that Queensland has no claim to compensation. He designates the bonus which is to be given by the people of Australia for the adoption of this policy, as a compensation to the State from which I come. I am sure the honorable and learned senator will excuse me if I say that I repudiate the assertion that Queensland receives anything in the shape of a bonus. The people of Queensland do not, by any means, lay a claim to compensation, but they do say that the people of Australia, as a whole, should be prepared to pay a fair sum for the adoption of this policy. Senator Downer says that the Bill is unnecessary, and that it will be unjust in its incidence. The honorable and learned senator also condemns the measure, because he says it gives compensation to Queensland for the loss of this particular class of labour. Senator Cameron goes a step further, and tells us that Queensland, having spoken so strongly at the Federal elections in favour of the adoption of this policy, has no right now to come here cap in hand and ask the other States to assist her in carrying out the policy. Honorable senators from Queensland do not come here cap in hand. The Government, after mature consideration, and after giving the rebate arrangement a reasonable trial with the view of fixing this matter upon an equitable basis, have come to the conclusion that the people of Australia should pay per capita for carrying out the white Australia policy, and that the whole burden of its cost should not rest upon the States of Queensland, New South Wales and Tasmania. Senator Downer supported this policy, and I give him credit for doing so, but it is not a proper or patriotic position for the honorable and learned senator to take up after assisting in the adoption of the policy, to tell us now that Queensland is asking for compensation for the abolition of this particular class of labour; nor is it patriotic for Senator Cameron to tell us that we have no right to come here cap in hand to ask the people of Tasmania to compensate Queensland for the loss of this labour. I need hardly say that I repudiate these statements. I do not condemn honorable senators for representing their own States from their own point of view in a reasonable manner, or for endeavouring to preserve their people from being burdened with taxation. But honorable senators from South Australia and a majority of honorable senators from Tasmania, came here to support the policy of a white Australia, and now when a little has to be paid in order to carry out the policy, those honorable senators say—"While we are favourable to the adoption of the policy and believe it to be wise in the interests of the people of Australia, we are not prepared to pay for it." Is that a manly or a proper position for honorable senators to take up at this eleventh hour? I do not think it is. Although the Bill is defective to some extent, I welcome it as an effort to place this matter upon a more equitable basis than did the measure providing for the payment of rebates which we passed last year. As I have already said, I hope that when we get into Committee we shall amend the Bill in such a way that it will not retard the complete adoption of the policy of a white Australia. I am satisfied that if we accept the measure as it is proposed we shall find that instead of effecting the clearance of this particular class of labour at an early date, we shall only be encouraging the planters to keep their kanakas to the last hour which the law will allow. But that is not the only danger. Supposing we get rid of the kanakas, unless we affirm the principle embodied in my suggested amendment, we are likely to have another class of coloured labour employed which will be far more objectionable. I refer to Hindoos, whom we have not yet passed a measure to exclude from Australia. If the Bill is amended as I propose, with the addition of the amendment suggested by Senator Pearce, it will be a fair and a reasonable measure, and will, I believe, do much to further the complete adoption of the great principle of a white Australia. If the Bill is not so amended, I am satisfied that valuable as it is in principle, it will not be effective in clearing the Commonwealth, and the State of Queensland particularly, of coloured labour, at as early a date as is desirable.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—Before the Postmaster-General replies to the debate, I should like to say a word to justify my position, because it seems that most of the representatives of South Australia hold views opposed to my own, though I am thoroughly convinced that the people of South Australia are entirely with the Government in the present circumstances. I think I made my position fairly clear when speaking upon the Address in Reply, and there is very little remaining for me to deal with; but I should like to call the attention of honorable senators who are opposing this Bill to one or two facts. It has been stated that this Bill has nothing to do with the policy of a white Australia. I differ from that contention, because it is really a corollary of the white Australia movement. I should like to ask those honorable senators whether, when they were proclaiming themselves in favour of a white Australia, they imagined that they were going to get a white Australia without any cost to the States to which they belong. I do not think there is a man or a woman who has thought the question out in any of the States of the Commonwealth who is not entirely in accord with those who are supporting this Bill with a view of making an equitable distribution of the cost. We have been told that South Australia, particularly, took all possible steps to preserve herself from the contamination of the coloured races, and that Queensland did nothing of the kind. Did not the people of South Australia know the conditions existing in Queensland when they entered the Federation? I should like to ask some questions of certain honorable senators who were not here, and who very often are not here when they are wanted, like Senator Lt.-Col. Neild. I believe that that honorable senator is a soldier. I have no desire to cast any reflection upon the police force, but I think the honorable senator ought to be a policeman, because he is never here when he is wanted. Did not these honorable senators know very well when we were entering into the Federation, that we were entering into a union with the State of Queensland, which has great potentialities. Do we not know that they were prepared to take advantage of the great wealth which that State possesses, in a Federal union? I am sure that when we were passing the Alien Immigration Restriction Bill and the South Sea Island Labourers Bill, every honorable senator firmly believed that the rebate suggested in connexion with those measures was practically a bonus. There was not a single honorable senator who ever raised his voice in objection to the State to which he belongs paying a fair share under that arrangement. The whole question is: What is a fair share? Senator Styles says "Hear, hear." I should like to ask the honorable senator a few questions. I do not wish him to answer them, because he might answer them evasively; I shall answer them for myself, and I shall endeavour to do so straightforwardly. When the duty of £6 per ton was imposed upon sugar for the purpose of encouraging a white Australia, the intention was that it should affect every State equally, that the people of every State should contribute fairly towards the maintenance of a white Australia, it did not matter whether it was in Queensland, New South Wales, or anywhere else. It was then generally supposed that in the course of a few years New South Wales and Queensland would produce enough sugar to meet the requirements of the whole of Australia. Undoubtedly that day will come, and I hope in the very near future. Knowing this we were prepared to sacrifice a little in the way of duty. Then, in order to provide against an extraordinary loss of revenue when that day did come, we imposed an excise duty of £3 per ton; that was really a revenue duty. But so strong was the inclination in favour of a white Australia that the majority of honorable senators said—"To bring this about as soon as it possibly can be brought about, we will give all growers of sugar, who are prepared to employ only white labour, a rebate of £2 per ton." Every honorable senator and every member of the House of Representatives who supported that provision did so in the conscientious belief that every portion of Australia would bear its fair share of the cost. The Government believed, at that time, that it was quite possible for them to distribute whatever amount might be earned in that way all over the Commonwealth. But suddenly they found that section 89 of the Constitution was a bar in the way of their doing so. Everybody acknowledges that. There is not an honorable senator here who will deny that it was the general impression that it could be done. But the Government suddenly discovered that it could not be done. And now we find that provincial members of the Senate and of another place discovering a loop-hole whereby their particular States might escape paying their fair share towards the maintenance of a white Australia, jump at it. But I say that they have jumped at this loop-hole without the concurrence of the people whom they represent, and that is particularly so in the case of the people of South Australia. I should like to call the attention of Senator Styles to the fact that the people of Victoria consumed last year 47,000 tons of sugar imported from outside the Commonwealth, and 8,000 tons of Australian-grown sugar. New South Wales, on the other hand, consumed 60,000 tons of Australian-produced sugar, and 11,000 tons of imported sugar. But these consumptive individuals, who ought to be in a sanatorium, now say that they want everything done on the basis of consumption. Senator Styles says that under this Bill New South Wales has to contribute only £21,000, and Victoria £18,000, while Victoria consumes 8,000 tons of excisable sugar and New South Wales 60,000 tons. Let New South Wales pay on the basis of consumption, and it will pay an enormous sum whilst Victoria will almost entirely escape. Would that be a fair proposition? Let New South Wales take £180,000 from the revenue it derives from excisable sugar, and add that sum to the £60,000 it derives from imported sugar, and it will be found that it derives a revenue of about £240,000. Let Victoria add the £282,000 it derives from imported sugar to the £24,000 it derives from excised sugar, and it will be found that it gets a revenue of about £306,000. If you are going to do your business on the basis of consumption, do it both ways, and see whether Victoria or New South Wales, in proportion to its revenue from the same article, which was all considered in the adoption of the white Australia policy, will pay the most. I would ask the representatives of Victoria whether it would be better to have the amount which it has to pay fixed on the basis of consumption. Whenever honorable senators consider fairly the amount of revenue derived from sugar duties they will find that it will be much fairer for Victoria to base her contribution on population than on consumption.

Senator STYLES.—New South Wales has the sugar industry, and spends the money amongst its own people, and we have not the industry here.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Victoria produces a great many articles with which it has been supplying New South Wales during the last twelve months, and probably it has profited a great deal more than New South Wales has done.

Senator WALKER.—Has not Victoria got the beet-root sugar industry?

Senator MCGREGOR.—The beet-root sugar industry is only within the bounds of possibility: the people of Victoria are too slow to develop it in a great hurry. Approximately the consumption of sugar in Australia is about 200,000 tons. Supposing that New South Wales and Queensland were able to produce enough sugar to supply the States, and in a very short time I have no doubt that they will be in that position, how would the basis of consumption come out then? Victoria would have to pay £60,000; New South Wales about £70,000; and South Australia between £20,000 and £30,000. But those conditions do not exist, and even when the operation of this Bill shall have expired the production of sugar will not amount to the consumption. When we consider that the Bill is only to operate for period of four years, and that it will probably have the effect of bringing about a white Australia much sooner than we could do under any other conditions, then I hold that it is the duty of those who have advocated that policy to do all they can in that direction. There are many other aspects of the question which might be debated, but as I know that the Postmaster-General is anxious to say a few words, and to close the debate to-night, and as there will be opportunities in Committee to explain the position that different senators like to take up, I have no desire to detain the Senate. I hope that the second reading will be carried, and that in Committee nothing will be done to destroy the efficiency of the Bill, and that any amendment which may be carried will have the effect of improving it.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—I do not desire to detain the Senate more than a few minutes at this hour; but I think that I ought to say a few words with reference to the argument in which Senator Playford charged the Government with having violated the Constitution, in not having distributed this amount of excise. I do not think he intended the Senate to give full force to his words, judging from the genial manner in which he spoke. In the paper which honorable senators have in their hands, the Treasurer has given a full explanation of the reason why that amount has not been distributed. He points out that under the Constitution he is required to distribute the excise amongst the States on the basis of consumption. Section 93, to which Senator Playford did not refer, requires that the distribution shall be made, having regard to not the State where the duty was collected, but to the State where the excisable articles were consumed. The Treasurer commences to collect these amounts, and then he finds that, according to the strict reading of the Excise Tariff Act, he has to distribute the money according to the consumption of white-grown sugar and black-grown sugar in the several States; but, as he tells us, the black-grown sugar and the white-grown sugar are both sent to New South Wales, where they are refined and inextricably mixed, and thence distributed amongst the States. He says that a technical compliance with the Constitution is absolutely impossible, because, when he finds that a certain quantity of sugar has been transported from New South Wales to any State, he cannot state what proportion is white-grown sugar and what proportion is black-grown sugar. Senator Playford says that it can be ascertained by taking averages. In this paper the Treasurer has worked the thing out on the basis of averages. He reckons that the sugar which goes from New South Wales to the other States is as four of white-grown sugar to one of black-grown sugar; but still that is a mere guess, and he would not be justified by the letter of the Constitution in adopting that guess as his basis of distribution. As there is that uncertainty, he pays in the amount to a trust account pending a settlement of that question. Then he watches the operation of the excise receipts during the twelve months ending 30th June, 1903. He finds that not only is this a very uncertain method of distribution—that is to say, it is uncertain whether he would be justified in distributing the money according to the letter of the Constitution, even if he were able to do so—but as a means of distributing the burden over the whole of Australia, it would be absolutely unreliable. He has shown by his action that he held himself free to advance money from that fund to any State that required it. Queensland had £25,000 advanced to it, and he was quite prepared to advance from the fund any amount that might be required by any State so long as he did not advance such an amount as to dissipate the balance he held until he was satisfied as to the exact basis on which he was justified in making the distribution. I think every one will agree that the Treasurer, in taking that action, was quite justified. He was in the position of a trustee for the various States that had consumed this sugar, and he was justified in holding that money in a trust account until he could be perfectly sure as to the correct basis of distribution. Then, during this year, watching the movements of sugar and the payments of excise, he finds that the consumption basis for the distribution of the burden would lead practically to absurdities. Many honorable senators have spoken as though we were discussing the question of whether Queensland and New South Wales should bear the burden of paying the bonus, or whether it should be distributed on a population basis; but that is not so. The Excise Tariff Act does not provide that Queensland or New South Wales shall pay its own bonus, but it provides that the bonus shall be paid on the basis of consumption. Not only has that law led to an absurdity, but it is absolutely unreliable, so that it is impossible for any one to forecast from year to year what proportion any State would be called upon to bear. Putting New South Wales and Victoria out of sight for a moment, let us consider the question from the point of view of Tasmania and South Australia. Evidently Senator Downer was under a misapprehension when he said that a time might come when the northern State would produce so much sugar that it would be able to supply the southern States, including Tasmania. It so happens that out of a total consumption of 7,000 tons, Tasmania has been getting 1,800 tons of white-grown sugar from either Queensland or New South Wales, or from both according to this calculation—actually consuming so much of Australian white-grown sugar that its contribution to the payment of the planters is greater than it will be on the population basis. On the other hand, South Australia, just as far as Tasmania from the sugar-growing countries, is in this position: that out of its total consumption of sugar only about 500 tons was Australian grown—a quantity so small that it is not taken into consideration in some of the figures. We may say that practically the whole of its sugar has been imported. That is the result of 1902-3, but in another year the conditions may be entirely reversed. How could that be a fair or a reliable basis of making the calculations? It might be worth the while of a State to export its locally-grown sugar, and to import in order to get rid of the burden. That is not altogether fanciful, because it was suggested by the Premier of New South Wales, in a letter which he wrote, and to which the memorandum by Sir George Turner, printed in the parliamentary paper on sugar excise, is a reply. Sir George Turner deals with the subject in this way—

I quite realize that it is within the power of the sugar importers and refiners to so manipulate matters as to have black sugar instead of white consumed, and to secure the import into New South Wales and Queensland of foreign sugar, instead of the same being sent to the other States as at present; and, no doubt, if it be in the interests of these gentlemen they will do so. This cannot be avoided, and the other States must run the risk.

Then he goes on to say that though this might possibly be done he could hardly understand the Governments of New South Wales and Queensland acting in collusion with the merchants and retailers to alter the natural course of trade. We do not suppose that they would do so, but the fact that it may be done exposes the whole absurdity of apportioning this burden on such a basis, which appears to me to be not only unfair but totally unreliable. Therefore, the Government propose, instead of treating the matter as a rebate, as it would be under the Excise Tariff Act, to repeal that portion of the Act and give the money as a bonus. I venture to say that in treating it as a bonus and distributing the burden over Australia on a population basis we are carrying out the wishes of the people of Australia and the intentions of the Legislature when they took action on the subject last year.

In Committee:

Clause 1 agreed to.
Progress reported.

Senate adjourned at 10.7 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 24 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Mr. FOWLER presented a petition from the Western Australian Chamber of Manufacturers, praying the House to repeal subsection (8) of section 3, and section 11, of the Immigration Restriction Act.

Petition received.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I desire to make a personal explanation. Unfortunately I was away last night when the division on clause 53 of the Judiciary Bill, which deals with pensions, was taken, because I did not know that that clause would be reached. I had paired as usual against the Government, but had I been present I should have voted most heartily with them for the retention of pensions for the Judges of the High Court.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

Mr. O'MALLEY asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

Whether, in view of the large surplus of the Commonwealth revenue, as shown by him yesterday, he will immediately bring in a Bill establishing a system of national old-age pensions?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

The surplus mentioned by the honorable member has been distributed among the several States, as mentioned by me yesterday; and it is believed that without it, embarrassment to their finances would have taken place. Moreover, if the large sum mentioned could have been withdrawn from the above purpose and applied to the carrying out of a system of old-age pensions, it is more than doubtful whether it would have proved sufficient to pay throughout the Commonwealth pensions on the lines adopted in New South Wales and Victoria.

OVERTIME: POSTAL OFFICIALS.

Mr. FULLER asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether the Postmaster-General is aware that claims have been submitted by certain clerical officers of the General Post-office, Sydney, for payment on account of overtime work performed during last year; and that such overtime was earned in accordance with State Public Service Regulations in force at the time?

2. Whether the Postmaster-General can assign a reason for the fact that these officers have not yet been apprised of any decision on their applications, which were made some months ago?

3. Whether the Postmaster-General will cause action to be taken with a view of meeting the legitimate claims of these officers before the end of the current financial year?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answers to the honorable and learned member's questions are as follow:—

1. The Postmaster-General is aware that such claims have been submitted. It does not appear, however, that all the overtime claimed was earned in accordance with the State Public Service Regulations in force at the time.

2. The reason why the officers making the claims were not apprised of the decision at an earlier date was that inquiries were being made in all States as to the existence of any similar applications, and that information was being obtained as to whether they were in accordance with the regulations.

3. The Deputy Postmaster-General of New South Wales was informed as to the decision of the Postmaster-General some days since, with a view to the legitimate claims being paid before the end of the current financial year.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is the Postmaster-General aware that the overtime allowance for dealing with the English mails has not yet been paid this year to the officers concerned in Sydney?

2. Will the Postmaster-General take steps to see that these due amounts are paid as early as possible?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The Postmaster-General is aware that a claim for overtime allowances for dealing with the English mails has not yet been paid to officers in Sydney.

2. The Postmaster-General has taken steps to see that due amounts are paid as early as possible.

RULINGS—

Chairman of Committees (House of Representatives):

Bills.—All the provisions of an amended clause are open to debate; and it is quite competent for the committee to adopt other means of bringing the clause within its original intention, 1298

When a blank is created in a clause, an amendment to fill the blank becomes an original proposition, to which an amendment may be moved, 1353

An amendment similar in part to one which has been rejected is not out of order, 3230

A motion to recommit a clause can only be moved in the House, 3892-3

Debate.—The remarks of a member must be relevant to the question, 1017, 1023, 1301-8, 2563, 3892, 4514, 4523, 4690, 5804, 5815, 5817, 5820, 6272-95

It is not in order to discuss a vote taken at the previous sitting of the committee, 1305; or at the same sitting, 5986

A member is not entitled to make a considerable pause in his speech, 1715; to discuss the motives of ministers or other members or the action of ministers, 4518; to anticipate the discussion on a question in another committee, 5812, 5816-7; or on a notice of motion, 5970

The absence of the minister in charge of the bill should be complained of in the House, not in committee, 4523

When an amendment to a clause has been moved, the debate should be confined to the amendment, 4681-2, 5971-7

A member should be allowed to speak without interruption, 5968, 6287

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to use an offensive illustration, 1138 to apply to any member the term "economical dog," 1138; "rat," 1139; "stone-waller," 5935 to say that agreement to amendments has been got by a fraud, 3892 to imply that a minister should be placed in the dock and made to answer for his conduct, 4523 to charge the Opposition with a piece of organized political hypocrisy, 4530; the House with the commission of an outrageous wrong upon any section of the people, 4969; the Government with a treacherous act, 4856 to reflect on a vote of the House, 4968

The withdrawal of unparliamentary words must be unconditional, 4523.

Quotations and References.—It is out of order to allude to a debate in the Senate during the current session, 2025

A member is at liberty to make an incidental reference to a debate of the present session in the House, 4968-9

Seats.—Private members are not entitled to occupy the seats reserved for ministers by the standing orders, 4512

Supply.—An amendment relative to States debts is out of order, because no question can be raised of which notice has not been given in detail by the estimates, 4387

By the courtesy of the committee it is competent for a member on the first item to discuss any matter which is contained in the estimates, but not to anticipate the discussion on a notice of motion to appear or appearing on the business paper, 4856-60

The practice has been to submit the estimates in divisions; but it is competent for a minister to move that the remaining estimates be agreed to, and for members to discuss any item therein, 6398

See CHANTER, Mr. J. M.

Chairmen of Committees, Acting (House of Representatives):

Debate.—The discussion on an amendment must be relevant, 5827-9 (Mr. Kirwan), 5889 (Mr. Batchelor)

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to describe a majority as brutal, 4533 (Mr. Salmon); or to use words offensive to a member, 5027 (Mr. V. L. Solomon)

A remark which is considered offensive should be withdrawn, 5158 (Mr. Kirwan)

Supply.—The administration of the Government should not be discussed on the estimates for a department, but on a specific motion or the motion to adjourn the House, 5107 (Mr. McDonald)

It is irregular for a member to discuss the budget after the general debate on the first item of the estimates has been closed; but with concurrence it may be done, 5132-5 (Mr. McDonald)

With concurrence the estimates for a department may be put en bloc, 5190 (Mr. McDonald)

Chairman of Committees (Senate):

Amendments.—An amendment is not out of order because it deals with the same subject-matter as a contingent-notice of motion on the paper, 3633

An amendment cannot be withdrawn when there is a dissentient voice, 3633

Appropriation Bill.—Each division of the estimates for a department will be called by the Chair until a senator expresses a desire to discuss an item or to move a request, when the discussion will be confined to the item; and after all the divisions for the department have been so dealt with the total vote will be declared as passed, 5952-3

Some latitude is allowed in discussing the first division of the estimates for a department; but once that discussion has been closed the rule of relevancy applies, 6005

The second schedule of the Appropriation Bill (No. 2) will be submitted in parts, according to the abstract, 6534

Bills.—When a whole bill is recommitted all its clauses are open to amendment, 1861

A decision, reversing the order of certain words in a clause, may be taken as an instruction to transpose the words wherever they occur in the bill, 4495

A provision for the formation of cadet corps is authorized by the Constitution and is in order, 4882

A proposal which has been rejected cannot be discussed in the same committee, 5001

At the "reconsideration" stage an amendment contradictory of a previous decision cannot be entertained, 5637-8

It is not competent for the committee on a bill to decide a question by means of an exhaustive ballot: the standing orders would have to be suspended to do so, otherwise the ordinary method of procedure must be followed, 6184-5

It is the duty of the Chair to protect the rights of those senators who have intimated their desire to move amendments, 6190-1, 6340

An amendment which is contrary to the terms of the Constitution is ultra vires, 6187

An amendment which is not within the scope of the bill is out of order, 6202

The insertion of a new clause cannot be moved after the preamble has been reached, 6202

An amendment which is relevant to the subject-matter of the bill must be received, 6331

It is not out of order to move that the Senate amend to omit "Tumut" and insert "Bombala," disagreed to by the other House, be amended by inserting "or Tumut" after "Bombala," 6340-4

Debate.—When a senator introduces an illustration of his argument he should not go into details, 864, 1001

A senator is entitled to be heard in perfect silence, 1376

It is disrespectful to the Chair for a senator to whistle, 1378

In discussing the amendment before the Chair it is not out of order to urge that if it is carried another amendment may be proposed, 1932

A senator may speak out of his place in the chamber, 1861

The discussion on a question must be relevant, 2208, 3294, 4229, 4541, 4891, 5002, 6003, 6185, 6336, 6345, 6355

The rule of relevancy applies to a point of order, 4223, 4229, 4568

It is disorderly for a senator to come in conflict with the Chair, 4229

On the first of a series of motions a general discussion may take place; but to the others the rule of relevancy will apply, 5225; and the resolutions, as passed, will not be open to debate, 5256

Interjections.—Every debate should be carried on in an orderly way, 1932, 5942, 6186, 6190, 6196-7

Recriminations are disorderly, 5267, 6196

A disorderly interjection should not be taken notice of, 6199

Language, Parliamentary.—It is quite in order to describe the statements of a senator as inaccurate, 1390 to say that the effect of the amendment will be to wreck the policy of a white Australia, 1484; or that senators do not want to hear the speaker, 6192 to speak of moving numerous amendments in order to carry a principle, 2194

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to describe the action of a senator as cowardly, 1391 to impute to a senator lack of intelligence, 1485; untruth, 1681 to reflect upon a senator, 4229, or upon the Chair, 4884 to say the Ministry and their supporters are capable of jobbery and dishonesty, 4829-30

Naval Agreement Bill.—The amendment of Senator Matheson to clause 2 is out of order

RULINGS—Chairman of Committees (Senate)—
continued.

because it would have the effect of eliminating the parties to the agreement and so reversing a principle which was affirmed by the second reading of the bill, 4222

The amendment of Senator Higgs to clause 2 is in order, because it is relevant to the subject-matter of the bill, and the committee is entitled to attach a condition to its approval of the agreement, 4224, 4229

Points of Order.—It is not the practice for the Chair to rule on a point of order which involves the interpretation of a statute, 4563

Quotations and References.—It is permissible to quote from the report of a previous discussion on the same bill, 1383; or an article which does not reflect on a debate in the Senate, 5631

It is irregular to quote the report of a speech made in Parliament during the same session, 1688; or to refer to a debate on the bill in the other House, 4233

A reference to pairs is irregular, 2204

Relevant figures may be quoted by a senator in his argument on a clause, 4882-5

Regulations.—Where it is desired by a senator that the Public Service Commissioner should amend a regulation he should submit a proposal, not for the instruction of that official, but for an alteration of the regulation, 2583

Requests.—The Sugar Bonus Bill is a proposed law which the Senate has a right to amend subject to certain limitations in section 53 of the Constitution. The proposal of Senator Glassey for the alteration of the body of clause 2 involves further payments out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund than those provided for in the bill or "proposed law," and consequently increases the "proposed charge or burden on the people" therein contained; therefore it comes within the third paragraph of section 53 of the Constitution and was put from the Chair as a request, because it was not competent to the Committee to make an amendment of the kind. Clauses involving increased burdens on the people, and Bills relating to the annual services of the Government and providing for taxation are proposed laws in regard to which the Senate can make requests. But even if such clauses are not a proposed law in regard to which it is specially authorized to make requests, it has an inherent right to make a request in regard to them, following out the principle of making requests in regard to bills which it cannot amend. Having regard to the character of the measure the duty of the Senate, in the case of Senator Glassey's first proposal, is to make a request; but his further proposal to add a proviso to the clause should have been put by the Acting Chairman not as a request but as an amendment because it has no right to request the other House to make an amendment which it can effect itself. The Senate could not receive a message from the Governor-General for the origination of this increased taxation, 1694, 1857

The Senate is not bound to formulate a request in the exact form of Senator Glassey's amendment, 2491

continued.

Rulings.—A ruling of the Chair cannot be discussed or referred to unless it is objected to in writing, 4882, 6185

Standing Orders.—The adoption of a new standing order cannot be proposed until the consideration of the printed code is completed, 662, 758

An amendment inconsistent with the context is not in order, 672

An amendment to a later part of a standing order precludes a senator from moving to amend an earlier part, 757

An amendment requiring the vote of a special majority to carry a question does not contravene section 23 of the Constitution in which the word "questions" relates to questions involving matters of principle and not of procedure, 980

Vote of Senator.—When the Senate was notified of his election by the State Parliament it was necessary for Senator Saunders to again take the oath of allegiance and therefore he is not entitled to vote, 4574

A senator may vote against the direction in which he spoke, 5954

See BEST, Senator.

Chairman of Committees, Acting
(Senate):

Order of Reference.—Every question referred to a Committee must be considered; and it cannot go beyond the order of reference, 2576

Requests.—The carrying of a request in regard to the Sugar Bonus Bill precludes the Committee from making an amendment, 1399

See DONSON, Senator.

President, The.

Amendments.—It is out of order to amend the first paragraph of a motion after the second paragraph has been omitted, 1470

An amendment to a motion must be relevant, 2815, 5571

An amendment must leave some part of the motion remaining, 3403

An amendment should be so stated from the Chair as to give senators an opportunity of voting on all the issues involved, 5570-1

A senator cannot move more than one amendment to a question, 5573

Anticipating Discussion.—The standing order referring to anticipation of debate does not apply to debate which may take place, but of which there is no notice on the business paper, 3605

It is irregular to anticipate the discussion of an order of the day, 3700, 5373; or a notice of motion, 5362, 5366

When a motion to dissent from a ruling has been made and the discussion adjourned to a later day, as provided by the standing orders; the President, before calling on the mover of the motion, may re-state and formulate his ruling, 4631

A senator may refer in one speech to bills which are connected with each other and would be contained in one measure, except for the provisions of the Constitution Act, 5765

Bills.—After a bill has been read a second time a senator may move that it be referred to a select committee, 4118

Business of the Senate.—Before the address in reply to the opening speech has been adopted the Senate ought not to transact business which is not of a formal character, 69

A minister may move to postpone the consideration of Government business, but it is the practice to call upon private senators to move the postponement of private business in their charge, 2580

The Senate cannot take notice of pairs, 3429

A suspension of the sitting can only be determined by the Senate, and may be on motion without notice, 6000

Committees.—A Committee of the Whole can only recommend the Senate to adopt standing orders, and until its report, with or without amendments, is adopted, the resolutions of the committee have no effect, 660

Without an instruction a select committee on a bill could not inquire into a constitutional question, 4121-2

A select committee on a bill cannot bind either a Committee of the Whole or the Senate, 4123

Constitution Act.—Except, perhaps, where the conduct of the business of the Senate is concerned, the Chair ought not to be called upon to decide a question involving the interpretation of the Constitution, 1595

Debate.—The rule of relevancy applies to a motion for production of papers, 522; for second reading of a bill, 1100, 2856, 5545; for going into committee, 3617; for referring a bill to a select committee, 4118, 4123; for adjourning the Senate, 4707; for discharging an order of the day, 4792; a point of order, 4696-4700, 5446; a motion to adjourn over a sitting day, 5005

A senator must speak relevantly to the question, 1730, 2282, 2295, 3412, 3425, 3837, 3903, 3904, 3940, 4096, 4651, 5344, 5567

A motion to adjourn a debate is not debatable, 1916; and cannot be moved by a senator who has spoken to the main question, 5751

A debate on a ministerial statement when there is no motion before the Senate is irregular; but leave may be given to certain senators to speak, 2591

A senator who has been speaking for a considerable time should endeavour not to exceed the latitude of debate, 3940

When a senator replies the debate is concluded and cannot be adjourned, 4125

The third reading of a bill may be debated, 4297

It is improper for senators to discuss a question across the chamber: only the speaker who has risen in his place can address the chair, 4874

No standing order provides that the rule of relevancy shall be departed from on the motion to close the sitting, 5005, 5451-3, 5744

If a debate is initiated in the Senate it cannot be finished in committee, 5223-4

When a ministerial statement is concluded with a motion to adjourn to an unusual hour, its subject-matter may be either commended or condemned; but a senator should speak as briefly as possible and not indulge in strong language, 5442; and his remarks should be relevant to the subject-matter of the ministerial statement, 5448

It is irregular to have two discussions—one in Committee and one in the Senate both on the notice-paper—on a question, 5561

On the first reading of a bill which the Senate may not amend, any matter may be debated; but only its subject-matter should be discussed on the second reading, 5223, 5770, 6352

Personal allusions should not be made, 6183

Divisions.—When a division is called for each senator should take his seat at once on the side on which he wishes to vote, 4715, 5567

Governor-General.—The President stated that he would not read the opening speech to the Senate unless it is so desired, 9

Interruptions.—The standing orders strictly prohibit interruptions, 391, 2292, 4704, 4819, 6054-7, 6227; but a legitimate question may be asked, 3947

A senator should not allow himself to be led away by interjections, 2832, 3412, 4089, 4293, 5344, 6054-7

It is irregular to interrupt a senator with a question when he is addressing the Chair, 5223

Interruptions of a personal character lead to retorts, and do not tend to preserve dignity of debate, 6058

Language, Parliamentary.—It is permissible to use strong language against a bill, though not against an Act, unless its repeal is being sought; but it is not quite in order to say a bill was introduced to give a strong party advantage to the Government, 4741

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to say a senator was the most self-seeking of the members of the Judiciary Committee of the Convention, 516; should tell the truth, 518; would support the Government in rascally proceedings, 2293; gets hold of secret information by backstairs methods, 3690; has been guilty of untruth, 4713; has interjected against his conscience, 6052 to speak disrespectfully of the Governor of a State, 1723 to ascribe to a member of the other House the well-known habit of quibbling, 3683 to doubt whether a senator's statement will be believed, 3689 to say the Prime Minister had betrayed the land of his birth, 4080; or had been guilty of hypocrisy, 4704 to describe the statement of a senator as untrue, 4713, 6183; or cowardly, 6183 to refer to a senator as a political dingo, 6054 to use strong language, except in seeking its repeal, against a law, 4730, 4741; or against a decision of the Senate, 5338

to impute improper motives, 4741

Motions.—A complicated question may be divided by order or leave of the Senate, 2566-7; but each senator can make only one speech, although the subdivisions of the question are put separately, 2570, 5574

The Senate ought to be asked to decide whether a question should be considered in committee before the mover begins his speech, if it is considered desirable to discuss the question in committee, 3614, 5223-4

A senator is not permitted to withdraw a motion, and then without notice to move another motion, 3901

An unopposed motion may by leave be put towards the close of a sitting, 4040

Motions for Adjournment.—A resolution to "now" adjourn means an adjournment until the next sitting day, 4658

A motion by a private senator that the Senate at the time of its rising adjourn until an unusual hour ought to be made before the business of the day has been called on; but when a motion of privilege has been brought forward before the business of the day has been called on, a similar motion may be made at the conclusion of the privilege debate, 3901

The four senators who rise in support of a motion for adjournment are the judges of the question of urgency, 4700

A question cognate to the subject-matter of an order of the day may be discussed on a motion under standing order 60; but the rule that debate shall not be anticipated applies to the motion, 4700

The failure of the President to open a letter giving written intimation under standing order 60 before business was called on should not prevent a senator from exercising his right under the standing order, 5833

Papers.—It is for the Senate, not the Printing Committee, to decide whether a paper shall be printed, 4789, 4805

A minister cannot, by command, lay on the table a copy of a notice of motion, concerning the conduct and procedure of the Senate: it is not a paper within the meaning of the standing order, 4790-1

Personal Explanation should contain no argument, 1464, 3317

Petitions.—It is improper for a senator, when he is presenting a petition, to make any statements, except such as are laid down in the standing orders, 4544

The names of the signatories to a petition may be read if desired by the Senate, 5524

Points of Order.—As a general rule it is not proper for the Chairman of Committees or the President to give a ruling on the interpretation of the Constitution, but where a ruling is absolutely necessary in order to carry on the business, it ought to be given, 4563

Private Business.—Under new standing order 70 a senator may place on the business-paper for a subsequent day any notice of motion or order of the day in which he is concerned, 4457

Privilege.—It is a breach of privilege for any person to use words which impugn the character of all members of the Senate, 3679; and where the utterer of the words is stated to be a senator, he should be afforded an opportunity to be heard in his place before any action is taken, 3680

Questions to the Chair.—It is not the duty of the Chair to answer a general question,

3132; but merely to deal with points of order or procedure as they arise, 3132, 4073, 4652

Questions upon Notice.—In answering a question a senator cannot debate the matter to which it refers, 1247-9

No argument may be inserted in a question, 2187

Detailed information should be obtained by a motion for a return, 2364

The only obligation upon the Chair is to see that notices of questions are in order, 3697

Under the new standing orders notices of questions should be handed in to the clerk, 4456, 5627

No inference or imputation should be made in a question, 4789

Quotations and References.—There is no standing order on the subject; but the practice is not to comment upon a judge in his judicial capacity unless on a motion for his removal, 1730

It is irregular to quote from a debate of the current session in the other House, 2922, 4082; or from a former debate in the same session in the Senate on another question, 4702-6

It is out of order to debate the subject-matter of another question on the order paper, 3903

A senator may allude in general terms to the attitude of the Government on the bill in another place, but he may not quote from the debate in that House, 4082

A quotation from a comic opera ought not to be advanced as an authority which should influence the Senate, 4094

No standing order prohibits a minister from reading an official document relating to the subject-matter of a discussion, 5348

It is irregular to refer to proceedings in committee until a report is made, though in peculiar circumstances the rule may be relaxed, 5560

Requests.—Reasons for pressing requests cannot be sent to the other House except by the express desire of the Senate, 6243

Resolutions.—A resolution cannot be rescinded during the same session, except with the concurrence of an absolute majority, and after seven days' notice, 3134, 5745

A motion to ask the concurrence of the other House in any resolutions cannot be moved without notice, except by leave, 5355

A proposal for communicating a resolution to the other House may be moved either as an addition to an amendment or as an amendment to the main question, 5571

A motion to inform the other House of non-concurrence in a resolution cannot be moved without notice, except by leave, 5574

Right of Speech.—When a senator desires leave to continue his speech on another day, unless he is prevented from so doing by other business of the day being called on in pursuance of the standing orders, or of sessional order, the standing orders should be suspended for that purpose, 3646

The mover of a motion is entitled to speak to an amendment; but his remarks must be relevant to the amendment ; and after it is disposed of he may exercise his right of reply, 5345

When a debate is interrupted in pursuance of a sessional order the senator then speaking does not lose his right to continue his speech, 5384

Every senator who has spoken to the main question may speak to an amendment ; other senators may speak to both the main question and the amendment ; and when that amendment has been disposed of, every senator may speak to a subsequent amendment, 5336-7

A senator who has moved an amendment cannot speak again to the question and move another amendment, 5573

A senator may not speak to a notice of motion which he does not intend to move or to the question for the consideration of a bill in committee, 6184

Rulings.—The President has as much right as any other senator to speak on a question ; but he will not take part in a debate on a motion to dissent from his ruling, although he ought to be permitted to if he desires to alter or modify the ruling or to clear up any matter which had been left vague, 4631

An objection to a ruling must be stated in writing, and the debate adjourned to another day, 5005

Supply Bills.—The first reading of a Supply Bill may be debated, and the discussion need not be relevant to its subject-matter, 5223

Vacation of Seat is caused by the absence of a senator for two consecutive months without leave, 6000

Vote of Senator.—It was not obligatory on Senator Saunders to take the oath of allegiance twice over, and therefore his vote in committee on the Defence Bill should not be disallowed, 4577, 4643, 4653

See BAKER, Senator Sir Richard

President, The Deputy.

Business of the Senate.—It is not competent for the Senate, without suspending the standing orders, to anticipate any orders on the paper for a future day, 3236

See BEST, Senator

Speaker, Mr.

Amendments.—An amendment to a motion before the House should not anticipate or cover the same ground as a motion already given notice of to appear on the next business paper, 908

An amendment to a motion cannot be moved after the mover has replied, 3785, 6404

An amendment must be relevant, 5437

An amendment dealing with the site of the Federal Capital is not in order on a motion for fixing the method for choosing the site, 5797, 5813

An amendment which is not a direct negative or irrelevant to the motion is in order, 5303

An amendment to an early part of a motion should be put in such form as not to exclude an amendment by a member who desires to move to amend a later part, 5288

An amendment, consequential upon a decision of the House, will be made, although not formally moved, 5436

A member cannot move to amend his own motion, 5437

An amendment to consider a complicated question in committee may be moved, 5800

A member who has spoken and stated he has an amendment to propose in words proposed to be inserted when a blank is created may move accordingly when the blank has been created, 1170

A member having spoken to a question cannot at a later stage speak again to move an amendment, 2609

If a member gives an intimation to that effect in his speech upon the general question, he will be at liberty to move an amendment, but without making a speech upon it, to a later part of the question when an amendment to an earlier part has been disposed of, 5285 ; but the terms of the amendment should be intimated at the time ; and if a copy is handed in the Chair will put the amendment in its proper order, 5414

Any member who has not spoken to the main question may move an amendment, 5414

Appropriation (Works and Buildings) Bill is not a measure providing for the ordinary annual services of the year, and therefore the amendments by the Senate are not unconstitutional, 6145

Bills.—A motion for recommitting a bill must be made before the question for third reading is put from the Chair, 1716

After the third reading has been put from the Chair the time has passed at which any amendment in the bill could be proposed, 4080

Business of the House.—Until the address in reply is adopted, only formal business (which does not include an unopposed motion) may be dealt with, 125

On "grievance day" the first order of the day must be either Supply or Ways and Means, and it has to be called on within two hours of the meeting of the House, 4318

When the standing orders have been suspended to enable certain business to be done, that business, though opposed, may be taken after 11 o'clock, 5935

The discussion on a formal motion for adjournment must be interrupted at half-past four o'clock ; but the orders of the day may be postponed until after the further consideration of the motion for adjournment, 6377

The Appropriation Bill having been laid aside, it is competent for the House, after rescinding previous resolutions, to reconsider the estimates, a second message from the Governor-General is not necessary, 6399

Debate.—It is not customary to debate the motion for first reading of a bill, but on the motion that the second reading be made an order of the day for a later day a member may ask any question relating to the bill, 5866

The remarks of a member must be relevant on a motion for leave to introduce a bill, 1767, 5652 ; to fix the date for second reading of a bill, 587, or resumption of a debate, 1514, or consideration of a message, 1963, 6401; for second reading of a bill, 716, 741, 912-4, 2527, 2791, 3369, 4052, 4253, 4284, 4398, 4400, 4441, 4450, 5687, or third reading, 1893, 4590-1, 5661; to receive and read a petition, 1011; to adjourn the House under standing order, 1115, 2960, 4844-7; to give precedence to Government business, 2305, 2309; to disapprove of electoral divisions, 3589; for a conference re Federal capital site, 5326-7

A member is not entitled to go beyond the scope of the question, 1501, 1519, 1649, 2761, 3555-6, 3589, 3645, 3653, 3655, 3662-3, 3763, 3770, 3773, 3775, 3862, 3871-2, 5286-7, 5309, 5326-8, 5391, 5403, 5434, 5796, nor to anticipate the discussion on a motion, 2522, 3555-6, 5687, 5796, or a bill, 1440, 2791, 4322, 4345, 4844-7, 6414, or on fixing date for stage of bill, 5652, or on matters to be dealt with in committee, 5797, 5813

In a motion for a conference to consider the selection of the seat of Government a member may not discuss the merits of a site, but may discuss the insufficiency of the number of sites on the list, 5286-7, 5424; the discussion should be confined to the terms of the "machinery" motion, 5299. On an amendment as to the price of land it is competent to discuss the question of deciding the site on the basis of points, 5389, or the question of relative values here and there, 5390

The subject-matter of a petition cannot be debated on the motion that it be received and read, 1011

In a motion for leave to introduce a bill a member may discuss the lax methods of the Government in regard to the bill, 1767

In speaking to the second reading of a bill, a member should address his remarks as speedily as he can to the consideration of its provisions, 4052

In the second reading of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill a member is permitted to refer to a strike only so far as is necessary to illustrate his argument, 4253

The conduct or action of a member should not be discussed on a motion for second reading of a bill, 4450

In "grievance day" a member, though taking considerable latitude in ventilating a grievance, is not out of order, 4335

In the motion for adjournment, it is not improper for a member to refer incidentally to the subject-matter of a bill on the notice-paper, so long as he does not discuss the bill, 6411

At the "report" stage on a bill, a member is entitled to discuss the votes and proceedings in committee but not to refer to any matter which took place outside the committee, or to votes that were not given in the committee, 6300-2

When a member has been called by the Chair, and has risen, he must either proceed with his speech or resume his seat, 743

Except by leave, no interpositions to debate can be permitted, 745

Where an amendment has been moved both the original motion and the amendment are open to debate by any member who has not exercised his right of speech, 1649; provided that the mover has not replied, 6404

Liberty of debate is not curtailed by the moving of an amendment, 4321

Documents.—Unless it is stated to be of a confidential nature, or such as should more properly be obtained by address, a document relating to public affairs, quoted from by a minister, may be called for and made a public one, 4614

Interruptions.—The repeated interruption of a speaker is irregular, 51, 463, 466, 1014, 1997, 2002, 2165, 3456, 3645-6, 3653, 3658, 3664, 4588, 4592, 5300, 5302, 5407

Interjections across the chamber and conversations having no reference to the subject on which a member is addressing the Chair are distinctly disorderly, 1712, 2226

Interjections are especially irregular when ministers are replying to questions, 1961

The fairest opportunity should be given to those who ask or answer questions, 5960

In order to facilitate debate interjections not calculated or so frequent as to interrupt the speaker are overlooked, 3664

An ordinary interjection is out of order when it is too long, 3735

It is irregular to converse across the chamber, 3978, or to reply to a disorderly interjection, 4361

A member cannot make a speech while another member is speaking to the question, 4260

A request from the Chair to desist from interjecting must be complied with, 4454, 4586, 4592

Language, Parliamentary.—In his relation of a private conversation elsewhere a member is not precluded from quoting the words which were used, 4588

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to describe the statement of a member as grossly unfair, 317; absolutely untrue, 447, 2761, 4420; false, 3202; most untruthful, 3784; cowardly, 5696; cant and hypocrisy, 6381 to say a member has deliberately misled the electors, 246; humbugged or deceived the electors, 368; had to do what he was told, 3786; says that which he knows is not true, 4406; has been humbugging the electors, 4591; was treacherous and false to federation, 6379; that the truth must not be spoken in the House, 6379 to impute improper motives, 346, 4533, 4623; untruth, 4413; personal animus, 6381

to characterize a member as stupid, 1518 to accuse the Government of a conspiracy, 3649; a dastardly attempt, 4440; roguish acts, 4587

to reflect upon a vote of the House, 3866; or upon Parliament, 4602 to describe the conduct of a minister as gerrymandering, 3740; a proposal before the House as a political crime, 4361; the action of any members as a backscratching proceeding, 4421; a majority in the House as brutal, 4533; any members as jackals, 4592

A member is required to withdraw a remark which is considered offensive, 3786, 4364, 6381; or is a reflection upon a vote of the House, 3868

An imputation of improper motives must be withdrawn even though no objection be taken to the use of the words. Other words which are considered by a member to be a reflection upon him or upon any section of the House must be withdrawn upon attention being called to them, although they might not otherwise be considered offensive, 4533

The withdrawal of unparliamentary words cannot be debated, 3202, and should be made by a member, not from his seat, but standing, 4592

Members.—It is irregular for a member to stand in any of the passages or gangways, 2521; or to turn his back to the Chair when speaking, 4423; or while sitting down to address the Chair, 5386

No standing order requires a member to accept an assertion by another member; but the practice among gentlemen is to accept assurances as to matters of fact, 3756-7

A member is not prohibited from reading a newspaper in the chamber, 4335

Motions.—A motion approving of an extension of a mail contract does not require to be considered in committee, 1656-7

Notice is required of a motion relating to the supply of draft bills and other documents to the press before they have been laid before the House, 1758

Each paragraph of a complex motion will be submitted separately, when desired, 5414

Papers.—It is not competent for a private member to lay a paper on the table, 4365

Personal Explanation.—A member can only offer an explanation when no one is addressing the House, 47

A personal explanation cannot be debated, 443
By leave, a member may make a personal explanation regarding a petition in which he is misrepresented, 1011-12

A member cannot make an explanation in regard to a petition he has presented unless he has been misrepresented, 1012

It is competent for a member to explain any circumstances in regard to which he has been misrepresented, but not to debate any matter, 4365

Petitions.—A petition to the House cannot be amended, 1011

Until its subject-matter is known to the Chair, a petition cannot be ruled out of order, 1011

Notice has to be given of a motion to print and circulate a petition, 1519

Where a petition from a corporation is not under seal it can be received only as from the persons whose names are attached to it, 2011, 2299

The motion for reception and reading of a petition will be divided when required, 2299-2300

Privilege.—A question of privilege relating to a statement in a newspaper must be raised in accordance with standing order No. 285. No breach of privilege is involved in the publication of a draft bill or a paper belonging to ministers and not to the House, but a very wide departure from parliamentary practice is involved. The practice is that such documents should not find their way into the press until they have been laid before the House, 1758-9

Questions without Notice.—It is not out of order to ask if a minister has any objection to lay certain papers upon the table, 234-5

A member cannot debate the subject of a question he is asking, 1013, 1014, 1102, 1962
The reply to a question cannot be interrupted by a member for the purpose of asking another question, 1014

Every member may ask any ordinary question and the Government have an equal right to answer it or to ask for notice, 1523

A question cannot be asked until petitions have been presented, 1758

A member is not obliged to answer a question relating to a matter of which he is not in charge, 3728-9

A member should not when asking a question read a very lengthy extract, but may move the adjournment of the House, 5048

Questions upon Notice.—A reply involving much detailed information is not out of order, but is contrary to custom; such a question should take the form of a motion for a return, 1185

Quotations and References.—A member is not permitted to read a document which has been read at a previous stage of the debate unless he desires to present a new argument or interpretation, 295

A member may quote as a part of his reply a letter in which he is asked by another member to call attention to a misconception of the arguments he used in discussing the second reading of the bill, 839

A member is entitled to refer to a bill on the business-paper as evidence of ministerial delinquencies, 1440

A reference to the Senate is out of order, 3870
It is irregular in discussing one bill to refer to another bill on the business-paper, 2791

A member may not refer to a previous debate of same session, 2329, 3862, 3864, 3869, 3870-1, 3878, 4361, 4421, 4439, 4806, 4845; but he may make an incidental allusion to its subject-matter, 3863

It is out of order to refer to, quote from, or even incidentally allude to a previous debate of the session, 4322-3

Previous debates of the session cannot be referred to, but any facts elicited during such debates may be referred to, 4398

A previous debate of the session, even when it relates to the same question, cannot be referred to; but a member may refer to the figures which he used in that debate, 4436

A member may refer to the decisions of the House preliminary to the introduction of a bill, and to any facts apart from the debates terminating in such decisions, 4588

The proceedings on a bill in committee cannot be referred to on the motion for adjournment, 4692

On a motion for adjournment to discuss the action of the Government in dropping a bill, only an incidental reference to details of its provisions is permitted, 4844, 4847

Reference is not permitted to an interjection which has been ruled out of order, 5434

Requests for Amendment.—The alteration of clause 2 of Sugar Bonus Bill should have been sought by the Senate by request and not by amendment, in accordance with the third sub-section of section 53 of the Constitution, as the amendment would increase a proposed charge on the people, 1963

Right of Speech.—By leave a member may continue his speech on a subsequent day, 496, 745-6, 1513, 3397, 3674, 5783; and such leave must be asked for, not moved for, 3674

A member cannot reply to a personal explanation by another member; but if he has been misrepresented in any way he may explain his position, 1012

On a formal motion for adjournment, a member cannot exceed the allotted time, except by leave, 1118, 2951, 2958

A member who has spoken to both the main question and an amendment to create a blank with a view to insert words may in his speech formally state an amendment to be proposed by him in such words, and when the blank has been created may move accordingly, 1170

The mover of a substantive motion cannot make a second speech, except to close the debate, though by leave he may make a statement, 2605-6

Where a member during his speech asks a question and resumes his seat and a ministerial explanation has been made he cannot continue his speech, nor can he make an explanation unless he has been misunderstood, 2606

Strictly speaking, when a member resumes his seat, his right of speech has terminated, 4602

A member who has spoken to the question is not entitled at a later stage to speak again to move an amendment, 2609; but he may speak to any amendment before the House, 5414-5

If a member in his speech on the main question intimates his intention at a later stage, when some other amendment has been disposed of, to move an amendment, he cannot speak to that amendment, 5285, 5415

Ordinarily no member may make a statement except when there is a motion before the Chair; and if there is to be a general debate on a ministerial statement the Prime Minister must submit a motion, 2617

The right of reply when exercised closes the debate, 2762, 3785, 3864, 4348, 6404

The right of reply can be exercised while an amendment to the question is pending, 6404

A member is not entitled to move the adjournment of the debate after he has been speaking to the question, 3863, 5657; but with concurrence it may be done, 5222

A member after debate has been closed by reply of mover cannot speak to a motion when put as amended, 4349

Vacant Seat.—Where a dissolution of the House is imminent, a writ for an election to fill a vacant seat will not be issued if it is not possible for the member elected to take his seat, 5574-8, 5653
